THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commences its New Year's gallery of portraits with those of two right royal men. Humble they are in their own estimation, claiming no pedigree from the records of an earthly peerage, proud of their citizenship in a land where kings are thought lightly of, but in that day when crowns are distributed by the King of kings, and when each crown is lustrous with the jewels of souls saved by the instrumentality of the wearer, the two American evangelists will stand forth conspicuous by reason of the thousands in both hemispheres who have been won to Christ through God's blessing on their labors. The names of Moody and Sankey are known the world over, but comparatively few people know much of them personally beyond the success with which it has pleased God to honor them.

Dwight Lyman Moody was born at Northfield, Massachusetts, on February 5th, 1837, and is now forty-six years of age. When he was about four years old, his father, who was a stone-mason, suddenly died while upon his knees in prayer. All that was left for the widow's support was a little home on the mountain-side, with an acre or two of land; but even this was encumbered with debt. A month afterward another boy and girl were born.

Mrs. Moody had a calm, unquestioning trust in the love of her Divine Father, and bravely carried her burden of poverty and toil until her little ones grew old enough to help her.

BOYHOOD.

Among the rich inheritances of Mr. Moody in his boyhood were a vigorous constitution, boundless confidence and animal spirits, and a will strong enough to break down all opposition and carry him on to success. His mother has said, "He used to think himself a man when he was only a boy." When only six years old he hired himself to a neighboring farmer to drive the cows to and from their pasture on the mountain. While working on a farm, more or less, until seventeen years old, he was educated at the common school of the village. He started to seek his fortune in the great world soon after his seventeenth birthday. He first went to Clinton, but finding no business to his mind, he proceeded to Boston. A little while before, his uncle, Samuel Holton, had visited the old home, and Dwight had asked him for a clerkship in his boot and shoe store in Boston; but learning something of his disposition, he had refused, fearing to take him to the city, where there seemed to be ninety-nine chances in a hundred that he would go straight to ruin.

One day, however, much to Mr. Holton's surprise, his nephew suddenly made his appearance in his store. The boy began to beat about the city for a situation, but at the end of a week he was much mortified at his want of success, though he was not discouraged. He announced his purpose of shaking off the dust of Boston from his feet and trying what he could do in New York; but having by sound advice and the force of circumstances been induced to solicit again in his uncle's store, he was kindly received by that gentleman, who consented to appoint him as a salesman, on the following conditions: First, he was to board at a place to be selected by his uncle; second, he was not to be out in the streets at night, or go to places of amusement which his uncle did not approve; third, he was regularly to attend the Mount Vernon Church and Sunday-school.

The young man agreed to all that was required of him, and he kept his agreement. A home was found for him in a Christian family who lived in very humble style, and he entered upon his duties on a very small salary. In the Sunday-school young Moody was placed in of Mr. E. Kimball. For a time he sat out the lesson with evident weariness and impatience, and his teacher felt he was failing to interest him. But one Sunday, when the lesson happened to be about Moses, he listened with considerable attention, and at length broke out with this question, which was the first remark he had ventured to make, that "Moses was what you would call a pretty smart sort of man, wasn't he?"

Presently the Holy Spirit began to work graciously upon him. Under the earnest and simple sermons of his minister, Dr. Kirk, and the personal instructions of Mr. Kimball, his heart began to soften, and remembering the lesson taught him by his mother, he began to pray the Lord to "help him to be good."

One day Mr. Kimball called upon him at his place of business, and putting his hand kindly on his shoulder, inquired if he would not give his heart to Christ. That question gave a point to his petitions. He began to seek the Saviour in earnest, and in a little while he felt the assurance of the pardon of his sins. Years afterward he used to say, "I can feel the touch of on my shoulder even yet."

On May 16th, 1855, he applied for membership in the Mount Vernon Church, and went before the deacons to be examined as to his faith and doctrine, and they recommended him to delay a public profession of his faith until he could more clearly apprehend the fundamental truths of Christianity. On presenting himself again on March 5th, 1856, he was received into the full communion of the church.

LEAVES BOSTON.

In September, 1856, the young man struck out for the West, full of ambition to make his fortune. On his arrival in Chicago, where God had a glorious mission awaiting him, he found a situation as clerk and salesman in the boot and shoe store of Mr. Wiswall. He then joined the Plymouth Congregational Church, and at once commenced work as a home missionary. His first effort was to hire four pews in the church and keep them full of young men every Sunday. He also attended a Sunday morning Bible-class in the Methodist Church. Here he found congenial fellowship and labor with its Mission Band—a company of young men who used to visit the hotels, saloons, etc., on Sunday mornings, distributing tracts, and inviting people to attend Divine service.

His success with the four pews in the little church gave him the clue to a line of work in which he afterward became famous. There was no abatement in his interest in Sunday-schools, and finding, in his missionary explorations, a little Sunday-school in North Wells Street, he offered to take a class in it. He was informed that the school had a full supply of teachers, but if he would gather a class he might occupy a seat in the school-room. The next Sunday, when the school opened, the new teacher appeared, followed by eighteen bare-headed, barefooted urchins, ragged and dirty; but, as the new teacher said, every one of them with a soul to be saved, which to him was the chief item of interest. This was the beginning of his mission to "the masses."

It was not long before Mr. Moody commenced a mission on his own responsibility. Finding a deserted saloon near the North Side Market, he rented it for a school on Sunday, and occasional service in the evenings of the week. The region in which the school was opened swarmed with young barbarians—just the kind of scholars he wanted. He had an early longing that his mission, like that of his Master, might be to save those who were lost; and without stopping to think whether the work would be hard or easy, popular or unpopular, he began looking for lost sinners on

"THE SANDS."

This was a section on the lake shore, which was to Chicago what the Five Points was to New York. To this abandoned region flocked the bad women and worse men who had fallen too low to feel at home anywhere else; and it was proverbially dangerous for any decent person to walk the streets after nightfall. Thither went Moody to recruit his Sunday-school, and with earnest tenderness he plunged into the work of bringing these neglected people to Christ. A Sunday-school, pure and simple, would not be likely to attract the children of such a locality; and it was useless to distribute tracts and Testaments among their parents, for many of them could not read. The young man took counsel of the great apostle who used to catch unbelievers "with guile." He remembered that children were fond of candies, and thereupon he invested quite a large sum of money out of his small savings in maple sugar, which appeared to give the largest value for the money of anything in that line; and then, with his pockets full of the missionary sugar, and his heart full of zeal and love, he proceeded to attack "The Sands."

Very soon Moody was the most popular man in all that region. The sweetness of his gifts and of his manners won every child within reach of his mission; and, through the children, he was known by almost every man and woman in the vicinity. Very soon the increasing crowd needed and, by permission of the mayor, the school was removed to the great hall over the old North Market. This hall was generally used on Saturday nights for dancing; and after the motley crowd had dispersed, Mr. Moody and his associates entered upon the scene and set to work sweeping out the sawdust and washing out from the floor the stains of tobacco and beer. In that hall the school was held for six years, and increased to over one thousand members.

HE RELINQUISHED BUSINESS

entirely in 1859, and thenceforth devoted himself to the work of saving souls. Having resigned his situation, he said to his friend Mr. Jacobs, "I have decided to give God all my time." "But how are you going to live?" asked his friend. "God will provide for me if He wishes me to keep on, and I shall keep on till I am obliged to stop; God is rich, and I am working for Him," was Mr. Moody's reply. That resolution has never been broken. From that day to this he has never received a salary from any society or individual, or engaged in any business speculation.

Not to lighten his labors, but only to increase them, he invested part of a thousand dollars he had saved in a pony. Recognizing his pre-eminent ability in that direction, the Young Men's Christian Association appointed him Chairman of the Visiting Committee to the sick and to strangers. In the duties of this office he scoured the city in all directions, and Moody on became a familiar sight. An old resident declares that he would chase the wild gutter-snipes up the streets and down the alleys, and, after a Sunday-morning's search for new scholars, would emerge from some dirty lane or court, his pony literally covered with ragged children, followed by others of the same sort, holding on by the tail, catching by the stirrups, or clinging to each other's rags; and these, with frequent words of encouragement, he would march in grand procession down to the North Market Sunday-school.

On the outbreak of the war Mr. Moody turned his attention to the camp near Chicago. He was president of the Y. M. C. A., and his first step was to organize regular religious services and

PRAYER-MEETINGS IN CAMP.

He was going constantly from barrack to camp, praying, exhorting, and conversing personally with the soldiers about their souls. As an active member of the Christian Commission, he subsequently travelled and toiled during the years of the war in visits to various camps and battle-fields.

In 1863 Mr. Moody's work had attained such magnitude that a commodious chapel, with tower and spire, was erected, not far from the Market Hall, at the cost of about $25,000—which money was collected by Mr. Moody himself. Here he preached to a crowded assembly, conducted a Sunday-school of a thousand scholars, and gathered a church of three hundred members. After the completion of in 1867—the erection of which was largely due to Mr. Moody's energy, and was the first hall ever built for Christian young men—the indefatigable evangelist came to be regarded as the chief apostle of the Young Men's Christian Association, and his services were in frequent request throughout the United States and Canada, where similar societies were to be organized, or special revival services were to be held under their direction.

The first Farwell Hall was destroyed by fire in January, 1868, only four months after its dedication. While yet the ruins were smoking, a new subscription-list was opened, and before the fire was fairly out, the designs for a new hall were under way. Again Mr. Moody's talent in raising money for the Lord's work was called into exercise. Both he and Mr. Farwell pledged themselves to the great enterprise, and the following year the second hall, in all respects superior to the first, was finished and dedicated, with another shout of joy and another song of praise.

Mr. Farwell's attachment to Mr. Moody was very great. Having built a terrace of beautiful houses, he privately set apart one of these for his friend Moody, free of rent, if other friends would furnish it for him. The enterprise was taken up with great spirit, and the house was fitted up in comfortable style, and Mr. Moody was presented with a lease of the house and the free gift of all it contained, as a token of love and of gratitude for his faithful labors under which the city had been so largely blessed.

ESCAPE FROM THE CHICAGO FIRE.

But this home, with all its precious memories, was of only short duration. On October 8th and 9th, 1871, a tidal wave of flame—the great Chicago fire—swept the city, leaving, on an area of one mile in width by four miles in length, but a single house remaining. Within this fated region had stood the second Farwell Hall, Mr. Moody's church, and his beautiful home. In the middle of the night he was roused by the wild conflagration sweeping toward his house, and with his wife and two children hurried to find shelter. He lost all he possessed except, as he quaintly said, his reputation and his Bible.

This fire took place on a Sunday night, and it is supposed that some of the audience he had been preaching to were burnt to death in it. After the Chicago fire, a structure was erected that temporarily served the purpose of a school and church. It was commenced five weeks after the fire, and completed in thirty days. By the efforts of Mr. Moody the necessary funds were secured, and accommodation thus furnished for the large population in the neighborhood. The building was familiarly known as

"THE NORTH SIDE TABERNACLE."

It was one story high, and would seat fifteen hundred persons.

There were but few buildings in sight of the Tabernacle when it was finished, save here and there a little shanty built on the sheltered side of a blackened and crumbling wall. On the day of dedication crowds of children were seen picking their way among the ruins and along the streets half blocked up with rubbish, coming from no one knew where, but drawn by the magical attraction of the promised reunion of their beloved school. More than a thousand children were present at the first meeting, many of them accompanied by their parents. The great building was completely filled.

The new Tabernacle came to be a greater wonder and blessing than even the North Market Hall. The place was kept open and warm night and day as a shelter to any homeless wanderer who might choose to enter. Religious services in great number and variety were held, and wave after wave of revival blessing swept the meetings; crowds of people attended the almost constant service, weeping over their sins and shouting over their pardon.

From this compressed summary of Mr. Moody's career it will not be difficult to see that God had long been preparing His servant for yet wider service. He had passed through days of struggle and nights of toil that he might be able to bear the almost unparalleled success which was in store for him.

HE VISITED MILDMAY CONFERENCE

in 1872, and then felt that God had a work for him to do in England. Accordingly, some months after his return home he announced his intention to his family and afterward to his church. The day of departure drew rapidly near. The hour was appointed to give the parting message and to say farewell. But he had no money. He could not pay his passage. He would not ask it of men, but of God. So clearly did the call of God to England appear to him that when a friend asked him, "Why are you going to England again?" the reply was, "To win ten thousand souls to Christ." A few hours before he and his family were to leave Chicago to embark at New York, a friend, who knew nothing of his needs, bethought him that Mr. Moody would want some money after he reached England. He went to say good-by, and placed $500 in his hand. Now he could go.

On June 7th, 1873, he started for England, and commenced his first mission, whose history will be immortal, written in the glad memories of twice ten thousand souls, who at the Judgment Day will rise up to call him blessed. The congregations came from all classes, from the Princess of Wales and Mr. Gladstone down to the homeless and shoeless street Arabs, and all felt the resistless power of the simple Gospel message. In all the chief cities of England, Scotland, and Ireland services were held and God's blessing was marvellously given. At Eton, where there is a large school, the services were held in a tent, of which a picture is shown on the frontispiece.

On August 4th, 1875, Moody and Sankey embarked for New York, having been absent two years, and for six years they held gigantic meetings in many large cities, notably in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, San Francisco (for six months), St. Louis, etc., and there is every reason to believe that tens of thousands were converted at these meetings.

THE SECOND CAMPAIGN IN BRITAIN

was undertaken at the urgent invitation of prominent English Christians. It began at Newcastle-on-Tyne, where they commenced on Sunday, October 9th, 1881, and continued until April 22d, 1883, on which day they held monster farewell meetings in Liverpool. After about five months' visit to America, they lately returned and commenced meetings in London, having on their way remained in Ireland to conduct three weeks' meetings at Cork, Limerick, and Waterford.

MR. IRA D. SANKEY.

Born in 1840—His First Religious Impressions—Converted at the Age of Fifteen—Sunday-School Work—Commences Solo Singing—Meets Mr. Moody in 1871—The Campaign of 1873-5—The Secret of Mr. Sankey's Remarkable Power.

IRA DAVID SANKEY was born in the town of Edinburgh, Pennsylvania, in 1840, and is now forty-three years of age. When he was sixteen years old the family removed to Newcastle, in the same State, where the father assumed the management of a bank, and the son completed his education at a neighboring academy. His were received from the instructions of an old Scotch farmer, of the name of Fraser, who used to take him to the Sunday-school when he was only six years of age. During a series of revival meetings in Edinburgh, when he was fifteen, he was first brought under conviction of sin, and led to exercise saving faith in Christ. On the removal of the family shortly afterward, young Sankey joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, Newcastle, and at once identified himself with the Sunday-school. He became prominent also in the service of song. He trained the children of the school in singing, and conducted the service of praise in the church. His clear, melodious voice, distinct enunciation of the words sung, and rich emotional tones soon attracted attention, and he was often invited to musical circles, and to conduct the singing at public meetings and conventions.

Before he was twenty-one he was elected superintendent of the Sunday-school, and it was here that he and which from the first proved very attractive. Largely on this account the school was filled to overflowing, not only with children, but with their parents, who came on purpose to listen to the songs and hymns which Mr. Sankey rendered with such sweet impressiveness. He was also a very active worker in Young Men's Christian Associations. His cheerful disposition, frank manners, and power of rendering sacred song made him everywhere a welcome guest. His singing often touched the heart, and souls were won by it to Christ.

In 1871, at a National Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations at Indianapolis, Mr. Moody first heard Mr. Sankey, and was impressed with the remarkable adaptation of his voice and style of singing to awaken the emotions and carry home religious truth to the heart. On conferring together, they found that their love of mission-work and desires for extended usefulness were mutual, and they agreed to labor together in evangelistic services.

Shortly before leaving America in 1873, Mr. Sankey had pressing invitations to spend six months in a tour with Mr. Philip Phillips, through the cities on the Pacific coast, to sing sacred songs. But, after seeking divine direction, he was convinced that it was his duty to accompany Mr. Moody to Great Britain; and the results abundantly demonstrated the wisdom of his decision. As a vocalist he has not many equals. Possessed of a voice of great volume and richness, he expresses with exquisite skill and pathos the Gospel message, in words very simple, but "replete with love and tenderness," and always with marked effect upon his audience.

THE SECRET OF MR. SANKEY'S POWER

lies, not in his gift of song, but in the spirit of which the song is only the expression. He is a man in earnest, and sings in the full confidence that God is working by him. Like his colleague, he, too, has a message to lost men from God the Father; and the Holy Spirit of God in him finds a willing and effective instrument in his gift of melodious song, to proclaim in stirring notes the "mighty love" of God in Christ Jesus. It is mere scoffing to say that Mr. Moody's touching stories and Mr. Sankey's sweet singing are the secret of the power exercised by these men. The work is of God, and they are His instruments, each earnestly using, to the best of his ability, the gift that God has given him, in the full confidence that the blessing will and must follow. Mr. Sankey can speak as well as sing for Jesus, and his earnest words have been greatly blessed, as well as his thrilling solos, which inspire multitudes in all Christian denominations.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3, including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

IS HE ONLY A MAN?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached on Sunday Morning, December 23, 1883.*

"Christ came, who is over all."—ROM. 9 : 5.

The World Waiting for a Deliverer—Found in a Barn—A Vital Question—The Godhead of Jesus—Mistake on this Doctrine Infinite—The Bible the Starting-point—The Opposing Generals of Socinian Thought—The Assault on the Miracles—The Infidel's Capacious Faith—The Bible Testimony—"Over All"—Christ's Own Testimony—As to His Age—His Omnipresence—The Only Alternative—Strauss and Renan in Explanation—His Wonderful Achievements—Surgical—Alimentary—Marine—Mortuary—The Judge of the Universe—The Omnipotent Friend—The Divine Iconoclast.

FOR four thousand years the world had been waiting for a deliverer—waiting while empires rose and fell. Conquerors came and made the world worse instead of making it better, still the centuries watched and waited,

LOOKING FOR A RESCUER.

They looked for him on thrones, looked for him in palaces, looked for him in imperial robe, looked for him at the head of armies. At last they found Him in a barn. The cattle stood nearer to Him than the angels, for the former were in the adjoining stall while the latter were in the clouds. A parentage of peasantry. No room for Him in the inn, because there was no one to pay the hotel expense. Yet the pointing star and the angelic cantata showed that heaven made up in appreciation of His worth what the world lacked. "Christ came, who is over all, God blessed forever. Amen."

A VITAL QUESTION.

In former Christmas discourses I have dwelt chiefly upon the scene surrounding the Bethlehem caravansery. This morning I shall speak more especially of the character of that Being whose arrival on earth we this day celebrate. As to the difference between different denominations of evangelical Christians I have no concern. If I could, by the turning over of my hand, decide whether all the world shall at last be Baptist, or Methodist, or Congregational, or Episcopalian, or Presbyterian, I would not turn my hand. But there are doctrines which are vital to the soul. If Christ be not a God, we are idolaters. If Christ be God, then those who reject the idea are blasphemers. To this Christological question I devote myself this morning, and pray God that we may think aright and do aright in regard to a question in which mistake is infinite.

I suppose that the majority of those here today assembled believe the Bible. It requires as much faith to be an infidel as to be a Christian. It is faith in a different direction. The Christian has faith in the teachings of Matthew, Luke, John, Paul, Isaiah, Moses. The infidel has faith in the freethinkers. We have faith in one class of men. They have faith in another class of men. But as the majority of those, perhaps all of those here assembled are willing to take the Bible for a standard in morals and in faith, I make this book my starting-point.

I suppose you are aware that the two generals who have marshalled the great armies against the deity of Jesus Christ are

STRAUSS AND RENAN.

The number of their slain will not be counted until the trumpet of the archangel sounds the roll-call of the resurrection. Those men and their sympathizers saw that if they could destroy the fortress of the miracles they could destroy Christianity, and they were right. Surrender the miracles and you surrender Christianity. The great German exegete says that all the miracles were myths. The great French exegete says that all the miracles were legends. They propose to take everything supernatural from the life of Christ, and everything supernatural from the Bible. They prefer the miracles of human nonsense to the glorious miracles of Jesus Christ.

THE ASSAULT ON THE MIRACLES.

They say there was no miraculous birth in Bethlehem, but that it is all a fanciful story, just like the story of Romulus said to have been born of Rea Silvia and the god Mars. They say no star pointed to the manger; it was only the flash of a passing lantern. They say there was no miraculous making of bread, but that it is a corruption of the story that Elisha gave twenty loaves of bread to a hundred men. They say the water was never turned into wine, but that it is a corruption of the story that the Egyptian plague turned the water into blood. They say it is no wonder that Christ sweat great drops of blood; He had been out in the night air and was taken suddenly ill. They say that there were no tongues of fire on the heads of the disciples at the Pentecost; that there was only a great thunder storm, and the air was full of electricity which snapped and flew all around about the heads of the disciples. They say that Mary and Martha and Christ felt it important to get up an excitement for the forwarding of their religion, and so they dramatized a funeral, and Lazarus played the corpse, and Mary and Martha played the weepers, and Christ was the tragedian. I put it in my own words, but this is the exact meaning of their statements. They say that the Bible is a spurious book written by superstitious or lying men backed up by men who died for that which they did not believe.

Now, I take back the limited statement which I made a few moments ago, when I said it requires as much faith to be an infidel as to be a Christian. It requires a thousandfold more faith to be an infidel than to be a Christian, for if Christianity demand that the whale swallowed Jonah, then Scepticism demands that Jonah swallowed the whale! I can prove to you that Christ was God, not only by the supernatural appearances on that Christmas night, but by what inspired men said of Him, by what He says of Himself, and by His wonderful achievements.

"Christ came, who is OVER ALL."

Ah! does not that prove too much? Not over the Cæsars, not over Frederick, not over Alexander the Great, not over the Henrys, not over the Louises? Yes. Pile all the thrones of all the ages together, and my text overspans them as easily as a rainbow overspans a mountain-top. "Christ came, who is over all." Then He must be a God.

The Bible says that all things were made by Him. Does not that prove too much? Could it be that He made the Mediterranean, that He made the Black Sea, that He made the Atlantic, the Pacific, that He made Mount Lebanon, that He made the Alps, the Sierra Nevadas, that He made the hemispheres, that He made the universe? Yes. The Bible says so, and lest we be too stupid to understand, John winds up with a magnificent reiteration, and says: "Without Him was not anything made that was made." Then He was a God.

The Bible says at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow. All heaven must come down on its knees. Martyrs on their knees, apostles on their knees, confessors on their knees, the archangel on his knees. Before whom? a man? No, He is a God. The Bible says every tongue shall confess—Bornesian, Malayan, Mexican, Italian, Spanish, Persian, English. Every tongue shall confess. To whom? God. The Bible says Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Is that characteristic of humanity? Do we not change? Does not the body entirely change in seven years? Does not the mind change? Does not the heart change? Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. He must be a God.

Philosophers say that the law of gravitation decides everything, and that the centripetal and centrifugal forces keep the world from clashing and from demolition. But Paul says that Christ's arm is the axle on which everything turns, and that Christ's hand is the socket in which everything is set. Mark the words, "Upholding—upholding all things by the word of His power." Then He must be a God.

CHRIST'S OWN TESTIMONY.

Then look at what Christ says of Himself. Now, certainly every one must understand himself better than any one else can understand him. If I ask you where you were born, and you tell me, "I was born in Chester, England," or "I was born in Glasgow, Scotland," or "I was born in Dublin, Ireland," or "I was born in New Orleans, the United States," you being a man of integrity I should believe you. If I asked you how many pounds you could lift, and you should say you could lift one hundred pounds, or two hundred pounds, or three hundred pounds, I would believe you. It is a matter personal to yourself. You know better than any one else can tell you. If I ask how much estate you are worth, and you say $10,000, or $100,000, or $500,000, I believe what you say. You know better than any one else. Now Christ must know better than any one else who He is and what He is.

When I ask Him

HOW OLD HE IS,

He says: "Before Abraham was, I am." Abraham had been dead 2028 years. Was Christ 2028 years old? Yes, He says He is older than that. "Before Abraham was, I am." Then Christ says, "I am the Alpha." Alpha is the first letter of the Greek alphabet, and Christ in that utterance declared, "I am the A of the alphabet of the centuries." Then He must be a God. Can a man be in a thousand places at once? Christ says He is in a thousand places at once. "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." This is it characteristic of a man or of a God? And lest we might think this everywhereativeness would cease, He goes on and He intimates that He will be in all the cities of the earth—He will be in Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America the day before the world burns up. "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Why, then, He must be a God.

Beside that He takes divine honors. He declares Himself Lord of men, angels, and devils. Is He? If He is, He is a God. If He is not, He is an impostor. A man comes into your store to-morrow morning. He says, "I am the great shipbuilder of Liverpool; I have built hundreds of ships." He goes on to give his experience. You defer to him as a man of large experience and great possessions. But the next day you find out that he is not the great shipbuilder of Liverpool, that he never built a ship, that he never built anything. What is he, then? An impostor. Christ says He built this world; He built all things. Did He build them? If He did He is a God. If He did not He is an impostor.

A man comes into your place of business, with a Jewish countenance and a German accent, and says: "I am Rothschild, the banker of London; I have the wealth of nations in my pocket; I loaned that large amount to Italy and Austria in their perplexity." But after a while you find that he has never loaned any money to Italy or Austria, that he never had a large estate, that he is no banker at all, that he owns nothing. What is he? An impostor. Christ says He owns the cattle on a thousand hills, He owns this world, He owns the next world, He owns the universe, He is the banker of all nations. Is He? If He is, He is a God. Is He not? Then He is an impostor.

A man with gray hair and gray beard enters the White House at Washington. He says: "I am King William of Germany; I am travelling incognito; I have come over here for recreation and pleasure; I own castles in Dresden and Berlin." But the President finds out the next day that he is not King William, that he owns no castles at Berlin or Dresden, that he has no authority. What is he? An impostor. Christ says He is the King over all, the King immortal, invisible. If He is, He is a God. If He is not, He is an impostor, Strauss saw that alternative, and he tries to get out of it by saying that Christ was sinful in accepting adoration and worship. Renan tries to get out of it by saying that Christ—not through any fault of His own, but through the fault of others—lost His purity of conscience, and he slily intimates that dishonorable women had damaged His soul. Anything but believe that Christ is God. Now to be true. If you do not you would hardly have appeared in this church. You would have gone over and joined the Broadway Infidel Club, or you would go to Boston and kiss the foot of the statue of Thomas Paine. You would hardly come into this church, where the most of us are the deluded souls who believe in a whole Bible and take it all down as easily as you swallow a ripe strawberry. I have shown you what inspired men said of Christ, I have shown you what Christ said of Himself; now if you believe the Bible, let us go out and see

HIS WONDERFUL ACHIEVEMENTS

—surgical, alimentary, marine, mortuary. Surgical achievements: Where is the medical journal that gives any account of such exploits as Christ wrought? He used no knife. He carried no splints. He employed no compress. He made no patient squirm under cauterization. He tied no artery. Yet behold Him! With a word He stuck fast Malchus's amputated ear. He stirred a little dust and spittle into a salve and with it caused a man who was born blind, and without optic nerve, or cornea, or crystalline lens, to open his eyes on the sunlight. He beat music on the drum of the deaf ear. He straightened a woman who through contraction of muscle had been bent almost double for well-nigh two decades. He made a man who had no use of his limbs for thirty-eight years shoulder his mattress and walk off.

Sir Astley Cooper, Abernethy, Valentine Mott stood powerless before a withered arm; but this doctor of omnipotent surgery comes in and He sees the paralytic arm useless and lifeless at the man's side, and Christ says to him: "Stretch forth thine hand, and he stretched it forth whole as the other." He was a God.

ALIMENTARY ACHIEVEMENTS:

He found a lad who had come out of the wilderness with five loaves of bread for a speculation. Perhaps the lad had paid five pennies for the five loaves, and expected to sell them for ten pennies, and so he would double his money. Christ took those loaves of bread and performed a miracle by which He fed seven thousand famishing people, and I warrant you the lad lost nothing, for there were twelve baskets of fragments taken up, and if the boy had five loaves at the start, I warrant you he had at least ten at the close.

The Saviour's mother goes into a neighbor's house to help get up a wedding party. By calculation she finds out that the amount of wine is not sufficient for the guests. She calls in Christ for help, and Christ, not by the slow decay of fermentation, but by a word, makes one hundred and thirty gallons of pure wine.

MARINE ACHIEVEMENTS:

He turns a whole school of fish into the net of men who were mourning over their poor luck, until the boat is so full they have to halloo to other boats, and the other boats come up and they are laden to the water's edge with the game, so that the sailors have to be cautious in going from larboard to starboard lest they upset the ship. Then there comes a squall down through the mountain gorge, and Gennesaret with long locks of white foam rises up to battle it, and the boat drops into a trough and ships a sea, and the loosened sails crack in the tornado, and Christ rises from the back part of the boat and comes walking across the staggering ship until He comes to the prow, and there He wipes the spray from His brow and hushes the crying storm on the knee of His omnipotence. Who wrestled down that euroclydon? Whose feet trampled the rough Galilee into a smooth floor?

MORTUARY ACHIEVEMENTS:

Let philosophers, anatomists, go to Westminster Abbey and try to wake up Queen Elizabeth or Henry VIII. No human power ever wakened the dead. There is a dead girl in Capernaum. What does Christ do? Alas! that she should have died so young and when the world was so fair. Only twelve years of age. Feel her cold brow and cold hands. Dead, dead! The house is full of weeping. Christ comes and He takes hold of the hand of the dead girl, and instantly her eyes open, her heart starts. The white lily of death blushes into the rose of life and health. She rushes into the arms of her rejoicing kindred. Who woke up that death? Who restored her to life? A man? Tell that to the lunatics in Bloomingdale Asylum. It was Christ the God.

But there comes a test which more than anything else will show whether He was God or man. You remember that great passage which says: "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." The earth will be stunned by a blow that will make it stagger mid heaven; the stars will circle like dry leaves in an equinox; the earth will unroll the bodies, and the sky will unroll the spirits, and soul and flesh will come into incorruptible conjunction. Day of smoke and fire and darkness and triumph. On one side, piled up in galleries of light, the one hundred and forty and four thousand, yea, the quintillions of the saved. On the other side, piled up in galleries of darkness, the frowning, the glaring multitude of those who rejected God.

Between these two piled-up galleries a throne, a high throne, a throne standing on two burnished pillars—Justice, Mercy—a throne so bright you had better hide your eye lest it be extinguished with excess of vision. But it is an empty throne. Who will come up and take it? Will you? "Ah! no," you say, "I am but a child of dust; I would not dare to climb that throne." Would Gabriel climb it? He dare not. Who will ascend it? Here comes One. His back is to us. He goes up step above step, height above height, until He reaches the apex. Then He turns around and faces all nations, and we all see who it is. It is Christ the God, and all earth, and all heaven, and all hell kneel, crying: "It is a God! it is a God!" We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ.

THE DIVINE HELPER.

Oh, I am so glad that it is a Divine Being who comes to pardon all our sins, to comfort all our sorrows. Sometimes our griefs are so great they are beyond any human sympathy, and we want Almighty sympathy. Oh, ye who cried all last night because of bereavement or loneliness, I want to tell you it is an omnipotent Christ who is to come.

When the children are in the house and the mother is dead, the father has to be more gentle in the home and he has to take the office of father and mother, and it seems to me Christ looks out upon your helplessness and He proposes to be father and mother to your soul. He comes in the strength of the one, in the tenderness of the other. He says with one breath, "As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him," and then with the next breath He says, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." Do you not feel the hush of the divine lullaby? Oh, put your tired head down on the heaving bosom of divine compassion while He puts His arms around you and says: "O widowed soul, I will be thy God. O orphaned soul, I will be thy protector. Do not cry." Then He touches your eyelids with His fingers, and sweeps His fingers down your cheek, and wipes away all the tears of loneliness and bereavement. Oh, what a tender and sympathetic God has come for us. I do not ask you to lay hold of Him. Perhaps you are not strong enough for that. I do not ask you to pray. Perhaps you are too bewildered for that. I only ask you to let go and fall back into the arms of everlasting love.

THE DIVINE ICONOCLAST.

Soon you and I will hear the click of the latch of the door of the sepulchre. Strong men will take us in their arms and carry us down and lay us in the dust, and they cannot bring us back again. I should be scared with infinite fright if I thought I must stay in the grave, if even the body was to stay in the grave. But Christ will come with glorious iconoclasm and split and grind up the rocks and let us all come forth. The Christ of the manger is the Christ of the throne.

A SON'S FUTILE JOURNEY.

IT was an aged hack-driver who told the story, and the old man spoke with such evident emotion that it was plain the incident had made a deep impression on his mind.

"I was," he said, "on my hack at the depot one day two years ago, looking out for a fare, when a young gentleman comes out of the cars, and, jumping into my hack, ordered me to drive as fast as I could to Rosemount Cottage, Madison Road. I knew Madison Road well enough, and drove off, making sure I should find out Rosemount Cottage on the way. As we approached it, my fare opened the door himself, jumped out, and advanced toward the gate. Suddenly he started back and uttered a cry of pain as his eye caught the notice-board in the front garden, announcing that 'This house is to be let or sold.'

"'Where are they?' he exclaimed, in a dreadful husky voice, his face as white as a sheet. 'Where are my father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Kenrick?'

"Well, I was quite taken aback for a moment, and, not thinking much of what I was saying, told him that I believed Mr. Kenrick was dead, and Mrs. Kenrick had gone into the poorhouse.

"'Drive me there,' he cried, 'drive me there, quick, oh, quick!' and he jumped back into the hack. The way was not long, and we were soon there. With hurried steps the young man ran up the stairs, and asked for Mrs. Kenrick.

"'Mrs. Kenrick, Mrs. Kenrick,' muttered the old clerk in the office, 'oh, yes, I remember, been dead and buried these three weeks.'

"'O mother! mother!' sobbed the young man, 'and I not here to see you, and close your eyes!' We comforted him as best we could, and after visiting his mother's grave, he rode back to the depot with me. He had to wait some time for a train, and while waiting, he told me all about it. His parents were well off. Rosemount Cottage was their own, and his father, an old civil servant, had a small pension. In his latter days he had given way to drink, and he, the son, who had been abroad, a clerk in the Odessa branch of a merchant's business, knew nothing of it, until he received a letter from his mother urging him to come home at once, and begging him to let nothing delay him, as his father was ill. It was not dangerous, the old lady said, but—then there came the old miserable tale of gradual giving way to the fondness for liquor, until he was scarcely ever sober. She blushed to write it to her own son, but the old man was down with delirium tremens, and it was best the boy should know. Travelling day and night he reach his home to find it empty and both his parents dead.

"Much cut up, sir? I should say so. That young fellow, he wasn't more than five-and-twenty, he went on so as I never saw or heard. He asked if I was a total abstainer, and I owned I wasn't. Would you believe it, sir, that young man cut up as he was, wouldn't leave me till I agreed to sign the pledge, and he said he meant to make everybody he met do the same. Well, it tried me a bit at first, but I soon got used to it, and I own the house and lot now. I guess I shouldn't have done that if I hadn't done as he wanted me. So I've good reason to remember driving to Rosemount Cottage, and I don't think that young man will forget the journey."

PROPHETIC NOTES.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The False Prophet and the True One.—The London Rock of December 7th says: "In these latter days—these perilous times—when history is swiftly accumulating, and prodigious events are among the daily necessities of an age craving for novelties of a phenomenal type, the grand theme of the Church that their Redeemer is personally coming to Zion, is slighted as not worthy of the most insignificant notice. Fearful indifference fails to recognize the portents of the overwhelming fact. Yet look which way we will toward barbarism or civilization, a transparent restlessness is everywhere recording itself as one of the signs of the times. The simple faith and reasonable forms which marked the 'old paths' are sneered at as beneath the standard of the new and opposite creeds of Agnosticism and Positivism. Even with the two chief idols, Materialism and Socialism, the world is seeking to effect an unholy alliance by introducing the word Christian before the words. But if Socialism is the bane of social integrity and honor, it cannot be joined with such a superlative adjective as Christian. It is possible to look round the world for significant signs which the most sceptical cannot deny; but even the earthquakes of Anatolia and Java are not of greater moment than some of the forces operating under the political, social, and religious strata of society. Amid these scenes, which barely hide the volcanoes beneath, if the cry be raised, 'The Lord is coming and will purge all these things,' the reply of a cynical age amounts to the ancient excuse, 'Where is the promise of His coming?' What a parable is being taught us by

THE SOUDAN FALSE PROPHET!

Years ago, reports were rife that at a certain time a notable individual would come forward from the East of Mecca, and of the Koreish or sacred family, and that his career would be marked by splendid triumphs. A man has appeared, but from the West, and is a Dongola Berberee. He is no longer the man of improbability, but the man in possession. The armies of Yussif Pacha in 1882 and Hicks Pacha in 1883 have been annihilated by this self-styled Imam Mahdi. His martial achievements have disarmed the strange discrepancies of their point, and at once have disarmed the scrupulous and the wavering, and gathered to the standard of the pretender myriads of fanatical Mohammedans. In other words, an unknown person is received with acclamation upon the most slender pretensions. But when the Son of God, the True Prophet, came from heaven, and minutely fulfilled a long chain of prophecy, and even rode into Jerusalem in accordance with one prophetical declaration with which every one ought to have been familiar, He was met on every hand with the inquiry, 'Who is this?' And they rejected Him. Is the present generation any nearer an accurate appreciation of Christ, the King of kings and Lord of lords? He is coming 'to break oppression, to set the captive free.' But while multitudes will receive false prophets, they reject Christ, and will not believe in His speedy Second Advent."

The Portentous Crimson Sunsets, which are the subject of much observation and comment, continued on some of the days of last week. A scientific man, Mr. Rollo Russell, in the Times of December 4th, considers these phenomena to be connected with the recent volcanic eruption in Java (which destroyed 20,000 people), and says: "Nothing like this diffused atmospheric glow after dark and one or two hours before sunrise has been observed before, and a singular effect must have its origin in a singular cause. On December 1st and 2d, the glow, which was of an amber color, did not become bright until about an hour after sunset, and was partially obscured by clouds. The phenomenon has been mistaken for Aurora Borealis in France and elsewhere, but requires a name of its own." The Times of December 6th says: "Another remarkable sunset was witnessed on the south coast yesterday evening. The sky assumed a splendid crimson hue, which was reflected in the water. Here, as in London, the moon seemed to be of a pale green color." The Daily News says: "From all parts of the world comes the news that the sun has lately, on more than one occasion, appeared either blue or green. On Wednesday, December 5th, the moon, hanging high aloft in the deep blue above a sunset of crimson, was distinctly green. Mr. Bozward, writing to Nature, from Worcester, remarks that the moon there was of 'a lively green hue,' an 'emerald crescent.' This is the fateful year of Islam, according to old prophecies. The moon is the ensign of Turkey, and has been so ever since the Ottomans took Constantinople. Again, the sacred color of Islam is green. Thus an emerald crescent may well encourage the believers in the Mahdi. History has before now been affected by more trifling coincidences."

"Fires from beneath, and meteors from above,
Portentous, unexampled, unexplained,
Have kindled beacons in the skies; and the old
And crazy earth has had her shaking fits
More frequent, and foregone her usual rest."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Piece of Honeycomb.—At a Noon Meeting the Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "A boy received a piece of honeycomb from a friend as a gift. He was enjoying it extremely, and remarked to his father, 'Oh, father, this is sweet.' 'Indeed; how sweet is it?' 'Yes, it is very sweet.' 'You have told me that already, but I want to know how sweet it is?' The boy was puzzled, but after a pause replied, 'Taste it.' That is what we say to those who have not tasted the bread of heaven. Taste, and see how gracious the Lord is. Christians who do not eat of it every day must be diseased; haste to the Healer, who will restore you to health and vigor at once."

A Boy Saved from Despair.—At a Meeting in Cowcaddens, Bailie McPherson said: "A young boy made the despairing remark to a gentleman, 'There is no use in me praying to God, for He does not hear me.' 'What are you praying for?' 'A new heart, but I have not got it; if ever there was a day I was angry with my school-fellows, it was to-day; they were so provoking.' 'My boy, I believe God is answering your prayer, and is placing you in circumstances where it will be tested; begin now to thank God for answering your cry.' The lad was raised from despair, for his faith sprang into existence at once, and enabled him to rise above the petty annoyances of daily life, and to live for Christ among his schoolmates every day."

Trusting Appetites to Christ.—The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "A man was speaking with me last night who has been several years a Christian and very steadfast in his loyalty. He told me that he was only once under any temptation to return to his old sins and enjoyments, but at that time he lifted his heart to Christ for help, and it came to him at once. In the strength of the Lord he overcame the tempter easily. From the very moment he gave his heart to Jesus, the desire for drink left him. Workers should carefully enjoin upon converts the need of trusting their appetities to Christ, for by so doing they get new tastes and desires for better and heavenly things."

A Medical Student's Story.—Mr. Simpson said: "To-day a medical student, a young man of great ability, called at my place of business, anxious about his soul. When he entered there was a minister not ten yards from him. He said to me, 'That's my teacher.' In consequence I took him to my room and heard his history. It was the old story. Well trained by his godly parents, he left the paternal shelter to come to study at the University, and there he mixed with loose companions, and fell under the influence of drink. We went to the noon prayer-meeting, and after it had some further conversation together. Then we arranged to meet at Mr. Clyde's house at six o'clock, where as we spoke to him the Holy Spirit led him to the feet of Christ, where he found salvation and peace through believing."

A Night Visitor's Anxiety.—"A Minister told me the other night that a man came to him in great anxiety about his soul, inquiring before sitting down, 'What must I do to be saved?' The minister calmed him a little, and said, 'Will you believe every word is to you that God has written in this Book?' 'Yes,' was the eager response, 'I will.' After turning to several precious invitations and promises, the minister read, 'By Me if any man enter in he shall be saved.' 'I'll enter in by Him,' said his visitor. 'Then you shall be saved, not only from eternal ruin, but from present unhappiness and sin, for God will support you in every trial of whatever kind.' The man left his burden of anxiety with Jesus, dropped the chains which were galling him, and has ever since been a free and happy son of God."

A Father's Prayer Overheard.—"A Young lady passing the door of her father's room, saw him kneeling in prayer, and heard that the tones of his voice were tremulous with emotion. Wondering in her mind what it could be that so moved him, she broke the rules of good breeding, and listened to hear what he said. He was praying for her immediate salvation; pleading with God for her, he evidently would not be denied. The lady's heart was much troubled, and ere the day passed away, she was kneeling, asking the Father in heaven for pardon and grace. There was joy on earth that night, as may be imagined, and joy also 'in the presence of the angels of God,' for a sinner had repented and found pardon and life through faith in Christ."

A Trophy of Grace from Africa.—Bailie McPherson related the following instance of answer to prayer: "A colored man came to this country from Central Africa, where he had heard the Word of Christ preached by a missionary, and had given his heart to the Lord. A desire was roused in his soul to see the land from which his father in the faith had come, and by great efforts he managed to get his wish fulfilled. One day he was walking out in the country when he saw a man breaking stones at the roadside; going up to him he sat down on the heap of stones to have a chat, and soon both parties found a congenial topic in their mutual love of the Saviour. As the African rose to leave, his new friend asked, 'Where do you come from?' 'From Central Africa; I was converted there.' 'Praise the Lord, I have been praying for twenty years that God would show me one of the trophies of His grace won from among the heathen by missionaries sent from this country, and now He has done so!'"

A Disconsolate Seeker Cheered.—Mr. Jack said: "Last night I cannot express to you how my heart was cheered. We had a final meeting, winding up a series of fourteen special meetings. I noticed a young woman, a stranger to us, sitting in a disconsolate mood alone. I sat down beside her, and inquired, 'Is that your father you were with?' 'No, he is a friend.' 'Are you a Christian?' 'No, but I am terribly anxious, and have been so for the last six months.' I turned up Isaiah 53: 6—'All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.' After reading over this slowly, I repeated, '"On Him, on Him the iniquity of us all;" do you believe that?' 'It seems too good to believe.' 'That is just it; but, remember, it is a gift from God, not man.' 'I do, I will believe it.' I thank God she left the hall simply trusting in Christ and rejoicing in the God of her salvation."

A Converted Catholic's Testimony.—A Mizpah brother said: "I deem it a great privilege to testify for the Lord Jesus. I was brought up as a Roman Catholic, and was baptized in St. Mary's Church in this city. I have sung in the choirs of two chapels and conformed to all the rites of that sect. From my boyhood I had an unsatisfied craving for personal pardon from and communion with God; I tried frequent confessions, but when I knelt and confessed to the priest I was no better. Six years ago I was walking along a street in Possil Park with my little boy, when I saw a bill in the window advertising an evangelistic meeting that night. I attended, and for the first time in my life I saw myself a lost sinner, and that Jesus died for sinners such as myself. Since that night I have rested in perfect peace on Christ. The son who was with me that night has twice been given up by medical men as dead, but I went to my heavenly Father, who heard my cry of anguish, saw that I trusted in Him, and raised my son from the bed of death on both occasions. The last time was only a few days ago. I have much to thank God for."

A Leper's Beautiful Child.—At a Meeting in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, Mr. Jack narrated the following incident: "Leprosy is the most loathsome disease with which the human race is afflicted in the East. A gentleman who has visited the Holy Land three times had, on one occasion, a strong desire to see the Hospital for Lepers, and got a friend to take him to it. As they entered the gate, a poor leprous woman crossed the courtyard carrying a lovely babe in her arms. It was as beautiful a child as he had seen in the East, the skin was pure and clear, the features regular and well formed, the voice clear and ringing, without a touch of sorrow in it. Notwithstanding, it was the child of a leper. Can a clean thing come from an unclean? No! he knew it was impossible unless some transformation took place. Feeling his heart swell with pity for the poor child, he asked his friend, 'Will it be long before the disease appears on the child?' 'No; it is inherent, and very soon it will develop itself.' This is an exact picture of how depravity is transmitted from generation to generation, and only the transforming power of the Holy Spirit can eradicate the power it holds in our nature."

HEARING AND DOING.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 13, James 1 : 12–27. Golden Text, verse 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Key-note of the Epistle—Contrasted Views of Temptation — Faith Ejecting Misgiving—Temptation not from God—The Will and the Won't—Wrath the Result of Blindness—Notable Hearers—Herod, Saul, and Judas—The Law of Liberty—A Law Working from Within—Not Restraint—The Seeming Religious.

OUR golden text is the key-note, not only of our subject, but of the whole epistle of James, which is practical throughout. He says, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation." As a general rule we are apt to condole with the tempted and the tried, as though a great misfortune had come upon them. James says, when ye fall into divers temptations," because he sees God's side. James knew that the trial of our faith is "more precious than of gold which perisheth" (1 Pet. 1 : 7); he knew that it "worketh patience," and if patience has her perfect work, we shall be "perfect and entire, wanting nothing," and thus he speaks in no spirit of satire, but as seeing further than the most of us. James saw the result, "When he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life." Therefore, if the most untoward, the most vexatious, things happen, "count it all joy," count it "blessed." If, in your work for God, everything happens to put out all your plans, somebody enters the room at the very moment when you felt you had a message for one who was alone there—if you take some one to a holiness meeting or to an evangelistic service, where you expect everything to be helpful to him, and that day all turns out quite different to what you expect—"Count it all joy;" the Lord is trying you, and does not overlook the one for whom you are caring.

If we really do believe that God's hand is in everything, that He is all love, how can we have misgivings, or doubt Him in His dealings with us? Many will say, "God is all right, but then so-and-so wrongs me." Who permits it? Is it not God, that you may know, dear friend, how much your expectations are from so-and-so, and how little from God Himself? Let the Lord turn all your plans topsy turvy, you have given Him the right, if indeed you have given yourself to Him. Let Him make use of who He will and what He will to try us; if you are His own property, He has a right to do so, and He who is Love, cannot act contrary to Himself. Is there some call upon our strength or our resources which is far beyond their limit? Shall we cry out of oppression? or shall we refer the whole to Him, and say, "Lord, the vessel is Thine to break, empty, fill, and use as Thou wilt; Thou canst see where I cannot, Thou canst do what I cannot, I am at Thy disposal, and the responsibility is Thine; therefore I count it all joy to walk where I cannot see a step, only lead Thou on." This is practical Christianity, this is to be a doer of the Word, not a hearer only.

But the apostle warns us not to speak of as coming from God, i.e. not to count God the author of our falls. "Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust [or desire], and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." A little boy began to talk to his little friend about subjects which both knew to be wrong; the one spoken to was tempted; something was brought before him; he must decide, "I will listen" or "I won't listen." Alas! the desire of his heart was, "I want to hear more, I will hear more; then lust conceived and brought forth sin. Oh, how many times he wished he had never listened to the tempter, how often he regretted that his will was on the side of the temptation, and that thus he fell! Even Jesus was tempted; the enemy tried Him all round, but His will never was on the side of the temptation; and thus He remained "without sin." James goes on to tell us that "every good gift and every perfect gift is from above," having previously said that God "giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." Surely to be a "doer of the Word" is to accept the gifts which the Father of lights is waiting to bestow upon His children. Many believers waste hours in deploring their want of some gift, for which they might be thanking God all the time, if they would but take it. They remind one of a certain class of mistresses who expatiate on their servants' faults to some lady caller, instead of setting to work to teach them better. The lady caller goes away, and the servant is no better for all her mistress' grumbling; and the complaining Christian, having never put the matter into the right hands, continues in the same state.

"Of His own will begat He us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of

FIRST-FRUITS OF HIS CREATURES."

Surely Jesus is the living Word, the First-born among many brethren, the Life principle, the Vine, of which we are the branches. Oh, how stupendous is the truth that men, not angels, are the first-fruits of God's creatures, that He took not on Him the nature of angels, but of the seed of Abraham (Heb. 2 : 16). "Wherefore (in view of such an honor) . . . let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath." It is worth while for man to be silent that God may speak, that man should hear what God has to say; "God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few" (Ec. 5 : 2). "For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." God has a right to be angry; He sees through everything, nothing can escape Him, He is superior to all bias; but man's wrath comes from his blindness to the hand of God, which permits all that happens, and who, in His own marvellous way, makes "all things work together for good to them that love God." It is entirely out of place in man to yield to wrath; it does not belong to a mere instrument, but to the hand which wields it. Wherefore, lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness (see also 1 Pet. 2 : 1), and receive with meekness the engrafted [or rather implanted, Rev. Ver.] Word, which is able to save your souls." The Word is not engrafted upon our human nature so as to draw in our life, but the Word who is Life, in Himself is planted in the soil of our nature, which must die to receive Him.

"But be ye

and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." Herod was a hearer of the Word, and not a doer, when he was fascinated with the power of God in John the Baptist's ministry. He was not ashamed to go and hear him preach, when the whole country side turned out into the wilderness, and business was, for the time, suspended at Jerusalem, that the message of God might reach far and wide, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 3 : 2). Herod, "when he heard him . . . did many things, and heard him gladly" (Mark 6 : 20), but the right thing he did not, i.e., repent in deed and leave off his sins. Saul, too, was a hearer, but not a doer, when he spared Agag and the Amalekitish sheep and oxen, and drew down the thunder of God upon him in the words, "To obey is better than sacrifice and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 Sam. 15 : 22). Judas the traitor was a hearer of the Word and not a doer. "But," say many, "I am not like they, I do desire to please God." So did they, but they did not entirely yield themselves up to Him, and therefore they never became real doers of the Word.

Where the Word is not really implanted, the hearer "is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass; for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was;" a passing impression has been produced which leaves no trace, and has no result. Is not this the case with hundreds and thousands who are hearers of the Gospel? God calls for a response on our part to His Word, read or spoken; if His calls remain unanswered, we are deceiving ourselves, and are imagining that to be communion with God, which is none at all; imagining that to be worship which has not brought us in contact with God. Real receiving of Jesus, whether as a Saviour from condemnation, or from the power of sin, whether as our Keeper, Guide, Wisdom, or Power, always works a change, never leaves us where it found us.

"But whoso looketh into

of liberty (which the Word contains) and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall he bless in his deed [or doing]. To look into a thing, we must give ourselves up to it. The Word brings us a perfect law, put into our minds and written in our hearts (Heb 8 : 10), and therefore a law of liberty. Law gives the idea of constraint, liberty that of freedom from it. But there are laws of our nature which produce liberty of thought and action. And so with God's law of liberty. It is not external restraining from without, but it works out from within. Instead of repressing our wills, and galling them by opposition, it takes possession of them, and thus it is a law, but of liberty. It is but another expression for abiding in Christ and Christ in us, it is Himself taking the place of our self, and a man who is thus Christ-possessed is, and must be, "blessed in his deed." His deeds flow out of a heart all occupied with God, and they must be holy and godlike.

James, however, warns us of a class which we see everywhere; the man who seems to be religious and bridles not his tongue; he can talk religion by the yard, but he does not know how to listen; and as to visiting the fatherless and poor in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world, nothing can be further from his reckoning; his object is to persuade men that he is right, and all the time the poor miserable, empty hearer, deceives his own heart, and his religion is vain. The Lord awaken such, and bring them to reality. Amen.

THE MANAGER,

CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE PRICE

of single copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is from this date reduced to three cents. No reduction will be made in the quality of the paper or its contents or in the excellence of its illustrations. The reduction is made in the price only. We know of no illustrated journal of its class published in America at so low a rate. Subscribers who read in its pages some special message likely to be useful to their friends, will now be able, at a small cost, to send copies of that number as silent preachers of the Gospel to those who still sit in spiritual darkness. The proprietors are anxious to afford opportunities to Christian people of doing good in this way. The reduction in price will enlarge those opportunities, which is a result of more importance than pecuniary gain.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Cordial and Sincere Greeting to all friends, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tenders in this, the first issue of the new year. It visits this week many new subscribers who, it hopes, will become warm friends. By way of introduction and "reference as to character" it refers them to the last page of this number, and hopes that the statement of principles and the testimony of friends who bear witness that during its past career it has proved faithful to those principles which they will find there, may encourage them to give it a kind reception, and that the acquaintance may prove profitable to them. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD also greets its old friends who have already renewed their subscriptions for 1884. It is gratifying to notice how large a proportion of the subscribers of last, and former years, were so kind as to accede to the request, made a few weeks ago, and sent their renewals last month. To them the thanks of the paper are due. It is unnecessary to say anything concerning its character, except to promise that, with God's help, for which many prayers are unceasingly offered, it will be a better paper this year than ever. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD also goes this week to subscribers whose subscriptions expired with last week's number. That is done, because experience teaches that most of them will renew in the course of the week, and will like to keep their file of the paper complete. If, at the close of next week, any of them have not renewed, the inference will be reluctantly drawn that they do not intend to do so, and their names will be dropped from the list. To one and all, the editor wishes a Happy New Year. This is the sixth occasion on which he has had the privilege of doing so, and he trusts that the many friends of the paper in the United States, Canada, and foreign countries, to whose prayers and kind efforts THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is chiefly indebted for its prosperity and usefulness, will continue their valued interest in the work.

The Composition of the Committees of the House has been the chief subject of discussion in political circles during the past week. The work of selecting the committees is one of the most difficult, delicate, and important of the Speaker's duties, on account of the controlling influence the committees necessarily exercise over legislation. That Mr. Carlisle could please all the members, even of his own party, was of course impossible, but he appears to have performed his duty so as to cause less of dissatisfaction on all sides than is generally manifested. The prominence of the tariff question in politics at the present time, and the prevalent impression that Mr. Carlisle's election points to a sweeping reduction in the duties on our imports, caused the composition of the Ways and Means Committee to occupy the chief place in public interest. Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, is its chairman. He is considered a moderate revenue-reformer, favorable to free trade, but firmly convinced that the time has not yet arrived for bold experiments in that direction. Among the members of the committee is Mr. Hewitt, of New York, whose creed on the tariff is low duties on raw material, and such duties on finished competing products as are equivalent to the greater cost of labor in this country. Messrs. Mills, of Texas, Blackburn, of Kentucky, Herbert, of Alabama, and Hurd, of Ohio, are also on the committee, and their views are believed to be in harmony with those of the Speaker. Five Republicans, who are Protectionists, are placed on the committee, four of whom served on the same committee in the Forty-seventh Congress. Two less known Democrats make up the list. Thus there are six advocates of tariff reduction, five Protectionists, and two Democrats, whose opinions on the subject have not been decidedly expressed. In point of general ability the committee is a distinguished one, and one capable of giving the subject a careful and intelligent consideration.

Of the Other Committees, Mr. Tucker gets the Chairmanship of the Judiciary, Mr. Randall that of Appropriations, Mr. Curtin, of Pennsylvania, that of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Reagan, of Texas, that of Commerce, General Rosecrans that of Military Affairs, and Mr. S. S. Cox, of New York, that of Naval Affairs. The greatest surprise in all the fifty-four committees is in those on Banking and the Coinage. Judge Bucknor, of Missouri, the opponent of the national banking system, is chairman of the former and Mr. Bland, of Missouri, the parent and faithful friend of the silver dollar, is chairman of the latter. Regarded from a sectional standpoint, the South has profited by Mr. Carlisle's election. Twenty-eight chairmanships and two hundred of the five hundred and fifty-one places are filled by Southern members, a fact which excites comment, but is not so important as the political capacity of the members. The indications supplied by the make-up of the committees, of the policy of the Democratic majority in the House, is that there will be no startling legislative changes, but an effort to cut down expenses, to effect reforms in naval and commercial affairs, and to relieve the merchant marine of some of its burdens.

The Internal Revenue Returns are Being watched with more attention than usual in expectation of reductions being proposed in the tariff. The return for the first five months of the current fiscal year was published last week. During that period the total internal revenue collections have amounted to $51,279,438, being $11,343,971 less than during the corresponding period of last year. In spirits there has been a total increase of collections amounting to $2,074,771, and in fermented liquors an increase of $497,388. The total decrease in the collection of taxes on tobaccos amounted to $9,191,607; on taxes from banks and bankers, $1,068,292, and on miscellaneous taxes, $3,656,331.

The Probable Failure of the Star Route prosecutions is predicted. The report is based on the retirement of Mr. W. W. Ker from the employment of the Government in those cases. Following Mr. Ker's withdrawal came the report that the Hon. Richard T. Merrick is to sever his connection with them. A Times reporter, who saw Mr. Merrick on the subject, questioned him as to the truth of the report, and Mr. Merrick said the report was not authorized by him, but his denial is made in a way that compels his friends to believe that if he has not concluded to go out of the cases he has serious doubts about his ability to be much longer of use to the Government in connection with them.

A Painful Injury was Sustained by General Grant on December 24th. He alighted from his coupé at his residence in New York about ten o'clock in the evening of that day, and turned before going in to hand a bill to his coachman for a Christmas present. The night was very cold, and the sidewalk was slippery, and as the ex-President reached up toward the box of the carriage he slipped and fell heavily upon his left side, striking on the edge of the curbstone, about four inches below the hip bone. He was unable to rise to his feet, and the coachman and his body servant were obliged to carry him up to his bed. The most serious consequences were feared at first by the general and his family, and his physician, Dr. Fordyce Barker, was immediately sent for. He found the injured man suffering a great deal of pain, but, upon examination, thought the injury amounted to nothing more than a bruise and a shock to the sciatic nerve. Other surgeons have since been called in consultation with Dr. Barker, and it is expected that the cure will be a slow and painful one.

A Vigorous Prohibition Campaign in Maryland has been commenced by the Maryland State Temperance Alliance. It will be conducted by George A. Hilton, Esq., of Washington, D. C., who will deliver a series of addresses in the various cities of the State during this and next month. Mr. Hilton is a powerful speaker, and his earnest Christian character and his activity in movements of an evangelistic and philanthropic nature have given him considerable influence in Maryland and Ohio. Mr. C. S. Mosher or Mr. William Daniell, of Baltimore, Md., would be glad to receive contributions toward defraying the expenses of the campaign, from which, under Mr. Hilton's management, very beneficial results are anticipated.

Mrs. M. F. Shipman, the Gospel Temperance evangelist from England, has been conducting revival services at Fall River, Mass., with signal tokens of God's blessing. She also held two Gospel Temperance meetings in the city, at which over two hundred persons put on the blue ribbon. Some of the converts had been the slaves of liquor for more than twenty years. Mrs. Shipman has been engaged since in leading a series of services in the Lexington Avenue M. E. Church, New York. She has received a cordial invitation to resume her labors at Fall River.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Negotiations Between France and China are now at a standstill. Since the capture of Sontay the French Government declines to treat for peace until Bac Ninh, the other stronghold of Annam, has surrendered. Respecting the fighting at Sontay a cable despatch says: "The most notable fact in general estimation is that it took four thousand out of the entire seven thousand Frenchmen two days' fighting, the loss of two hundred and thirty-three men, and the enormous proportion of thirteen officers killed or wounded to storm even the outworks. A resistance so determined is held, in spite of official denials, to prove the presence of Chinese regulars and the probability of a prolonged and perilous campaign." That the fight was a desperate one is evident from the fact that the conflagration caused by the French shells left the interior of the citadel a mere shell. The next movement to be made by Admiral Courbet will be against Hoang Hoa, where the forces which defended Sontay are reassembling. Rumors of English mediation are in circulation, but it is authoritatively stated that England will offer no mediation unless solicited to do so by China.

A Rising of Chinese Nihilists is Apprehended. The New York Herald publishes a despatch from its special correspondent in China dated Hong Kong, December 18th, in which he says: "Great excitement prevailed in Canton yesterday on the arrival of the American Presbyterian missionaries, Mr. Henry and Mr. White, with a native Christian preacher from Shekloong, about sixty miles east of Canton. During a riot in that town chapels were destroyed and many worshippers were seriously injured. The native preacher was also severely hurt. A Roman Catholic priest arrived later under military escort. The Canton nihilists are causing excitement by the circulation of rumors that large quantities of powder are concealed in the Roman Catholic Cathedral of Canton, and they threaten to blow the edifice down. It is a splendid building, of imposing height, and has ever been an eyesore to the Chinese. Quiet has been only maintained by the presence of gunboats and of the military in the city."

Details of the Massacre of Hicks Pasha and his troops have been obtained from a native, who was with the Egyptian army, and who was enabled to escape because of his black color and because he wore no uniform. He says that Hicks Pasha fought like a lion, and was the last officer to fall. The members of his staff fell in one group. After the battle one hundred and fifty soliders were found wounded. El Mahdi gave orders that none of the wounded should be ill-treated. The bodies of the European and Egyptian officers were decapitated, and their heads fixed over the gate of El Obeid. The Arabs resolved to erect a tomb for Hicks Pasha's body because of his great bravery. El Mahdi has forbidden that any injury shall be done to the artist sent with General Hicks as a representative of the London Graphic.

Prince Victor Napoleon whom the Late Prince Imperial made his heir, has declined an invitation to a banquet proffered by the French Bonapartists. He does not wish to obtrude himself in a case where his father's claims should be paramount. The Bonapartist journals say, however, that the Prince has no intention of disavowing his faithful friends, being inspired with the ideas of Napoleon III., and promising France, when the time comes, a strong and honest government which will protect the rights of democracy and conserve the interests of religious creeds. The statement seems rather unkind to the Prince. A man "inspired with the ideas of Napoleon III." would not be an acceptable ruler to the French people.

Serious and Extensive Labor Troubles have broken out in Europe. The cotton weavers of Lancashire, England, the miners in Yorkshire, and the iron workers in France have each a strike on their hands. In three Lancashire towns forty thousand looms are idle. The Yorkshire miners demand an advance of ten per cent in their wages. A general conference of miners was held at Manchester on December 27th for the purpose of organizing a universal strike unless the demands of the Yorkshire men are conceded. The strike agitation is spreading in the iron districts of the north of France, Lorraine and in other districts, and the furnaces in the upper valley of the Moselle have been blown out. A majority of the iron manufacturers in Lorraine are reducing the wages of their employés seven to ten per cent and limiting the number of workmen and the hours of labor.

The Burning of a Jewish Synagogue and schoolhouse in Galata, a suburb of Constantinople, on December 23d, is reported. The flames were first seen in the basement of the building, and spread with such rapidity as to prevent the majority of the children from escaping through the doors. Many were thrown or leaped from the upper windows into blankets held in the street below, and the majority of these were injured by the fall. Nineteen charred bodies have been recovered. Thirty persons altogether are missing. The directress of the school, seized with fright, threw herself from a window, and was killed on the spot.

The Movement for the Settlement of Jews in Palestine has now grown to some proportions and produced some tangible results. A Jewish colony, under Christian direction, was established in the Holy Land at the end of October, and there is also a London Committee, under the presidency of the Earl of Aberdeen, for providing homes for the refugees driven out of their settlements in Europe. Some five thousand acres of land have been purchased by the latter association about six hours' distance from Jerusalem, and it is intended to settle about forty families upon the purchase, each family receiving an allotment of land, a house, tools, seed, and stock.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Closed their Labors in another district in London on December 23d. As in other districts they remained two weeks at Stepney. On the last day of the services five immense meetings were held in the iron hall, and overflow meetings were conducted in Stepney Church and Beaumont Hall. An Associated Press cablegram, describing the mission, says: "The interest excited by the mission at Stepney is remarkable, as there it has reached lower classes of the population than heretofore. Fervent and crowded inquiry meetings have been held, and thousands of people have been converted. The attendance at the churches in Stepney has been largely increased. The mission services have been partially suspended until after the holidays, and will be resumed at Clapham, whither the iron mission hall will in the mean time be removed. From Clapham the evangelists will go to Stratford."

Mr. William Taylor, who is Laboring in Chili, recently gave the following account of his work in a letter to a friend: "We have in Chili, not to speak of other parts of South America, thirty-two missionary workers. We have under their training in day and Sunday-schools over five hundred young people, all natives of Chili, and about four-fifths of them Chilenos, the other fifth of English descent, but all speak the Spanish language. This may seem a roundabout way, but I believe it is the shortest way of access to the heads and hearts of the large masses of the people of these Roman Catholic nations on the line of Gospel evangelization. You can count on your fingers about all the Protestant preachers in South and Central America who can preach to the people in their own languages. The people who know the Spanish and Portuguese languages have not a saving knowledge of God, nor hence suitable qualifications to go forth as ministers of the word of life. No use to try to run the trains till the track is laid. So while we are learning these languages we are teaching hundreds of the young people who know them the knowledge of science and of salvation."

BLESSED PROMISES FOR DYING OUTCASTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord; because they called thee an Outcast, saying, this is Zion, whom no man seeketh after."—JEREMIAH 30: 17.

Pearls Thrown Away in the Desert—Remedies for Those who Need Them—I. Suitable Advice—Live Near Your Physician—Be Often Examined—Take His Elixer Vitæ—Obey His Prescriptions—Speak Well of your Benefactor—The Overlaid Sermon.

THE promises of this verse will be exceedingly sweet to those who feel their personal need of them; but those who boast that they are neither sick nor wounded will take no interest in this comfortable word. Those who are charmed with themselves will see no charm in the beloved Physician. I have heard of certain hungry travellers, who were lost in the wilderness, and came upon a bag which they longingly hoped might yield them a seasonable supply of food. They were near to death's door by starvation, and eagerly opened the bag, but, alas! it contained which they poured out contemptuously upon the desert sand as things of no use to them. Even so, when a man is hungering and thirsting after the things of this life, and all his thoughts are taken up with carnal appetites, carnal sorrows, and carnal joys, he will reject as worthless the priceless promises of God, for he considers that they are of no immediate use to him. Let his hunger be of another sort, let his heart hanker after unsearchable riches, let his soul pine for eternal love, then are his views of things entirely changed, and to buy the pearl of great price he would gladly sell all that he has.

Oh, you that are sick at heart, here is a word for you from the God of all grace: Jehovah Rophi Himself says, "I will restore health unto thee." Oh, you that have felt the shafts of God pierce your inmost souls, here is a word from Him who healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds: "I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord." Here is music for your ear, honey for your mouth, comfort for your heart. But if you feel you have no sickness and no wound, no weakness and no spiritual need, then the words of sacred consolation will pass over your ear as a meaningless sound, having no voice for you. Neither shall we wonder at this, for the whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick; healthy men care not to hear of medicines and remedies, for they feel no need of them. This thins my audience, but improves it; for, while it drives away the conceited, it draws the needy to a more careful listening.

Our text describes a serious plight, mentions a special interference, and records a singular reason for that interference. When we have spoken upon each of these, we shall close by giving you a suitable advice. May the Spirit of God bless the discourse.

I. First, then, taken in connection with the verses which precede it, our text describes a class of men and women who are in

A SERIOUS PLIGHT.

These people suffer under two evils. First, they are sick through sin; for they need to have their health restored; and, secondly, they are wounded for their sin by the chastisements of the Lord, so that there is necessity for their wound to be healed. They are afflicted with the distemper of evil, and also by dismal disquietude of conscience. They have broken God's commandments, and now their own bones are broken. They have grieved their God, and their God is grieving them.

Let us carefully look at the first part of their sad condition ; they are sick with sin, and that disease is one which, according to the fifth and sixth verses, brings great pain and trouble into men's minds when they come to their senses, and know their condition before God. At first, iniquity numbs the conscience, and its tendency is to sear it as with a hot iron. It may be compared to a stroke of paralysis, which, when it falls upon a man's body, takes away from him all pain, and makes him as one dead in the parts which it affects. But after a while, when the conscience is awakened by judgments, or aroused by God's word, then this disease ceases to stupefy, and becomes the source of intolerable pain. Believe me, there can be nothing in the world so terrible as to feel sin without feeling pardon ; to know yourself to be guilty, and not to know how to get the guilt removed. Conviction without faith is an earthly hell. Brethren, you have many of you felt it, and you know that death itself, if there were no hereafter, would be preferable to life under the pressure of guilt. If those who hear me are oppressed with the disorder of sin, they will rejoice greatly as they dwell upon the words of our text, "I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds."

This disease, moreover, is not only exceedingly painful when the conscience is smarting, but it is so far as any human skill is concerned. We are told in the twelfth verse, "Thus saith the Lord, Thy bruise is incurable, and thy wound is grievous." It would be much easier to heal a man's body of leprosy than to heal a man's soul of sin. It is a disease which takes such fast hold upon the nature, and so entirely impregnates the mind with a deadly virus, that it abides in the very essence of manhood, and can only be removed by a miracle. It is far more possible for the Ethiopian to change his skin, or the leopard his spots, than for a man who is accustomed to do evil to learn to do well ; especially to love to do well, and find a pleasure in it. If this were a matter of custom, or practice only, it might be fought with and overcome, but inasmuch as it is a matter of nature, and the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint with it, no human power can possibly effect a cure. To those who know this there is a music sweeter than marriage-bells in these words, "I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds." The incurable shall be cured ; the insatiable malady shall be stayed.

What a disease this must be for which there is

since the direst forms of human disease have found each one its specialist, who has at least attempted to perform a cure ; but here is a sickness for which there is no physician. Bad men do not pretend to heal the disease of sin ; they do not even consider it to be a disease, and they care not to make men holy. Good men are very far from thinking that they can conquer sin in others, for they cannot even overcome it in themselves, and therefore they never set up to be physicians in such a case as this. No human hand can bind up this wound ; no earthly skill can touch this deeply-seated complaint ; it is past all mortal surgery.

This disease is

because it insinuates itself into the heart, and takes up its abode there. If apparently it be for a time driven out, it returns when we least expect it. Like the tree which is cut down, it will sprout again ; at the scent of water it will bud. It annoys us in every way ; it hinders our aspirations, for how to perform that which we would, we find not ; it robs us of comfort, and makes us groan, being burdened ; it enters into our holiest things, chills our prayers, freezes our praise, and hampers our usefulness. It is evil, only evil, and that continually. How gracious is it on God's part, to pity a creature infected with this vile distemper ! How good of Him to regard our iniquity rather as a sickness to be healed than as a crime to be punished !

I told you of a double mischief in this plight, and the second mischief is that this person has been wounded for his sin. His wounds are of no common sort, for we are told in the fourteenth verse that God Himself has wounded him. The Lord says, "I have wounded thee with the wound of an enemy, with the chastisement of a cruel one, for the multitude of thine iniquity ; because thy sins were increased." God in infinite mercy determines to make the sinner see and feel the evil consequences of his sin ; and in doing this He makes deep wounds, such as an enemy would give who felt no pity, but only wished to cause pain. The Lord knows that in this work slightness is of no avail, and therefore He strikes home, and cuts deep. He does not play with consciences, but His chastisement is so severe that men think Him cruel. Happy are the men who are thus made unhappy ; but this for the present they know not, and therefore they need the promise, "I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord."

The blows are not only on the conscience, but when God is in earnest to make men flee from their sins, He will and everywhere. He takes away the delight of their eyes with a stroke ; the child, the husband, the wife, or the friend is laid low ; for the Lord will fill our houses with mourning sooner than leave us in carnal security. He takes away the silver and the gold, for He will make us beggars sooner than leave us to worship the idols of the world. The oil vat is burst, and the barn is burned ; for He will not permit us to bury our souls in earthly things. He brings the body into sickness, and the mind into distress ; health departs, and the robust worker is stretched upon a sick bed ; he groans and moans under the hand of God. God is in all this smiting most cruelly, according to the short-sighted judgment of men ; but in very truth He is tender and gracious, and is working out the eternal good of the sufferers.

Surely, a man is in a wretched plight when he is diseased with sin, and then bruised by divine chastisement, but, it may be, he adds to this wounds inflicted by himself, for falls into sin are falls that break the bones. Many a man will have to go limping to his grave because of his transgressions. Doubtless David did so ; he never recovered what he lost when he sinned with Bathsheba. Much pain comes of broken bones, especially when you have broken them yourself, through your own folly. When you cannot trace an affliction to second causes, nor look upon it as an affliction from God, but when you hear conscience whisper, "Thou hast procured this unto thyself," then the wormwood is mixed with gall, and the suffering knows no solace.

Now, put these three things together—bones broken through thine own sin, God dealing with thee in the way of chastisement, and sin felt in the conscience like a grievous disease ; and I think I said not too much when I described the soul as in a serious plight. God help the man who is in such a case, for none else can. The comfort is that the Lord Jesus does help such, for so His gracious promise runs, "I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds." May the Holy Spirit bless this first head to many of you !

II. Our second consideration fitly falls under the title of

A SPECIAL INTERFERENCE.

The poor creature is in desperate dolor; but the God of pitying love comes in, and I beg you to notice the result.

This interference is, first of all, divine. "I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds." The infinite Jehovah alone can speak with that grand Ego, and say, "I will," and again, "I will." And who is this great "I" that speaks so exceeding boldly ? It is none other than He that made the heavens and the earth, and sustaineth all things by the power of His hand ; it is the "I AM," the everlasting Jehovah, whose word has boundless power in it. He appears in the moment of man's extremity, and when there is no helper, His own arm brings salvation. Blessed be the Lord who forgiveth all our iniquities, who healeth all our diseases.

Note, that since this interference is divine it is effectual. The Lord effectually heals all those on whom He lays His hand. How could it be otherwise ? Poor, troubled heart, where are you this morning ? Do you say, "Nobody can cure me ?" Thou sayest truly if thou wilt make one exception, and that exception is thy God. I tell thee He can heal thee now, so that the bones which He has broken shall rejoice. He can take away this disease of yours, and give you back wholeness as though your flesh were the flesh of a little child, and you shall be clean ; only have faith in Him. He that made you can make you anew. Do you believe this ?

Observe, that this interposition performs a work which is most complete, for it meets the twofold mischief. "I will restore health unto thee." That is a great matter. When a man grows healthy he can bear a wound or two without being too much overburdened ; but God does nothing by halves, for having restored health He then adds "I will heal thee of thy wounds." He will heal both disease and wound. Notice, too, how sovereignly free this promise is. It does not say, "I will restore health unto thee if—." No, there is no "if ;" and there is no mention of a fee. Here is healing for nothing. Jesus comes to give us health without money and without price, without pence or penance, without labor or merit. All manner of sin and of iniquity shall be forgiven unto men ; ay, and all tendencies to sin, and all taint of iniquity, shall be removed from men if they will trust the power and promise of the faithful Lord. Sinner, His touch can make thee clean at once. Trust thou that hand, I say, and the miracle shall be wrought.

III. But now I come to a third point, which is this—

A SINGULAR REASON.

"I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord ; because they called thee an Outcast, saying, This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after." God never finds a reason for mercy in the sinner's supposed goodness. It often happens that when a transgressor has been put out of the synagogue Jesus finds him directly. When certain offenders happen to transgress in a particular way, which particular way is scouted and denounced by the bulk of ungodly people, then like so many hounds they unite to hunt the wretched being to death, but the Lord Jehovah interposes to save ; as if He would say, "Why do you this, ye hypocrites ? Wherefore do ye denounce those whose sins are no viler than your own ?" I believe the Lord Jesus often stands as He did with the woman taken in adultery, and cries, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." Still He convicts men in their consciences, and still in sweetness of mercy turns to the poor, condemned one, and says, "Neither do I condemn thee ; go, and sin no more."

WHERE ARE YOU, POOR HUNTED SINNER ?

You are somewhere or other in the crowd, I know. They told you yesterday that they would never associate with you any more. You do not deny your wickedness ; still, it is not for your fellow-sinners to be hard with you, for they are not your judges. By faith take this promise to thyself : "I will restore health unto thee, because they called thee an outcast."

But this is not the full meaning of the text. I think it means that God's jealousy is aroused against those who despise His people, and speak ill of them. Whatever Zion might be, it was still the palace of God : however guilty Jerusalem might have become, it was still the holy city, the dwelling-place of the great King. It is one thing for a father to chasten his boy ; but if, when he is out in the streets, a stranger begins to kick him, his father declares that it shall not be. He arouses himself to defend his child, the same child that just now he smote so heavily. A man might complain of his wife if she had vexed him, but I suppose the quickest way to put him in good temper with her would be for somebody else to find fault with her. "What business is that of yours?" says he; "I will not have my wife abused: no man shall speak against her in my presence." That is a fair parallel to the case of our God. He will chasten His people in measure, but the moment that their enemies call them outcasts He turns his anger another way and releases His people.

I always have great hope for the entire Church of Christ when the ungodly begin to rail and revile. They say, "Christianity has lost its power; the Church is an old effete institution; no people of culture and intelligence keep to the old book and the old faith. The religion of Jesus is a byword and a proverb among learned men." Therefore, I am confident that God will return to His Church, and magnify His truth. As surely as He lives He will give us bright days and glorious days, because they call His true Church an outcast, whom no man seeketh after. Appropriate the text personally any of you who have been made to feel that you are outcasts. One said to me the other day, talking of her sin, and of her repentance, "Yet, sir, I am an outcast." That word pierced my heart like a dagger. I said, "Yes, but the Church of Christ was made on purpose to be a home for outcasts: here is a new household for you, new brothers and sisters for you, a new future for you; for now you are one of the solitary ones whom the Lord will set in families."

IV. I am going to finish in the fourth place, by giving a little

SUITABLE ADVICE.

I will suppose that I have those before me who have felt their disease and their wound, and have been healed by the God of mercy. I would recommend them to attend to certain matters. The first thing is, take care that you live very near your Physician. I notice that patients come up from the country when they are suffering with serious complaints, and they take lodgings near a medical man who is in high esteem for such cases as theirs. They leave the comforts of home, and let their business go, because life is precious, and they need a helper close at hand. No one blames them for this; in fact, we count them wise; let us learn wisdom from their example.

Now, the Lord has healed your wound, and restored health to you, therefore abide in Him; never leave Him, nor live far away from Him, for this old disease of yours may break out on a sudden, and it will be well to have the Healer close at hand. It will be best to entertain Him constantly beneath your roof, and within your heart; for His presence is the wellspring of health to the soul.

I recommend you often to put yourself under His searching examination. Go to this great Physician, and ask Him to look into your hidden parts, to search you, and try you, and see what wicked way may be in you, that He may lead you in the way everlasting. A man may have a deadly disease upon him and scarcely be aware of it, because no skilled person has looked upon him, and observed his symptoms; and in spiritual things this is a common mischief, to which multitudes fall a prey. Invite, therefore, the eyes of the Lord Jesus, for in our most honest searches we miss much, and we are naturally prejudiced in our own favor, so that we are pretty sure to give a verdict on our own side; and this may lead to final and fatal self-delusion. If we intrust the search to Him whose eyes are as a flame of fire, we shall not be deceived.

I recommend you from personal experience to consult with this Doctor every day. It is a wise thing before you go down-stairs into the world's tainted atmosphere to take a draught of in the form of renewed faith in Him. I am sure at night it is an admirable thing to purge the soul of all the perilous stuff which has accumulated through the day by full confession and renewed confidence.

Lay bare your case before Him; conceal nothing; beg of Him to deal with you according to His knowledge of your case. Make a clean breast that Christ may make a sure cure. Conceal no symptom however threatening, but tell Him all the truth. He cannot be deceived; do not attempt it, but unbosom every secret thing before His all-surveying gaze. Entreat Him to search both thoughts and affections, designs and motives. The ill may gather in secret places unless His discerning eye shall detect the growing danger, and prevent it by immediate action.

OBEY THE PRESCRIPTIONS.

Then I should very strongly recommend you always to obey the prescriptions of the great Healer. "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." Do not follow a part of His orders, and neglect the rest. The Lord Jesus must be received as a whole, or not at all. Say not "This is non-essential;" for such a speech is flat rebellion. I do not believe in any words of our Lord being non-essential. They may not be essential to our salvation, but every word of Christ is essential to our spiritual health; neither can we disregard the least of His precepts without suffering loss through our disobedience. Be very careful that you follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth; no other kind of walking is safe in such a world as this. Do what He bids you, as He bids you, and it shall be well with you.

Take care also to exercise great confidence in this Physician. Rely upon Him without stint or question. Your cure is working wondrously when you trust in Jesus heartily. Never doubt the Saviour's power to make you perfectly whole. Our Lord never can be baffled; though all diseases should meet in one person, He would overcome them all. Stick to this with unyielding assurance. Let not the devil force you to doubt the boundless power of your Lord. When our Lord Jesus set up to be a Saviour, He understood the work upon which He entered. His is no 'prenticed hand. He has never had a failure yet. Never did a soul trust Him for salvation and remain unsaved; and you shall not be the first to defeat His skill. Trust Him with all your heart. There is no cause to doubt. Distrust is what you have to fear; faith is your strength.

When you are healed, as I trust you are already, speak well of your Benefactor. Make a point of going round to your neighbors, if you find them sick, and telling them how you have been healed; thus will you make to your Lord a name of honor and renown. Tell out among all men what the Lord has done for you. I know you can tell them that story though you are no orator. When you were restored from sickness the other day, you were quite able to inform your friends as to that new medicine which acted like a charm, and you found a tongue to speak well of your doctor; and I am sure you have ability enough to declare the wonderful works of the Lord in your case. "Oh, but I could not embellish the tale!" Do not attempt to embellish it; for that would only spoil it. Tell the story as simply as possible.

I think it is of Mr. Cecil that I have read the following incident. A friend came from some distance to inform him of a medicine which was to relieve him of his disorder. This friend told him all about it, and having done so, entered into conversation upon the current matters of the day. The result was that Mr. Cecil was greatly interested in the talk, and when his friend was gone, every ingredient of the wonderful medicine. Beware of allowing the many things to drive the one thing needful out of your friend's mind. When we preach fine sermons our hearers say, "That was prettily put. They do not so much notice what we taught as how we taught it; and this is a great evil. Even so if you go and talk about your salvation to your neighbor, and narrate it eloquently, she will say, "Mrs. So-and-so has been here, and told me about her conversion in such beautiful language; I do not know that I ever heard such elegant sentences; it was most delightful to hear her." What did she say? "I do not know what she said, but it was very beautiful." Thus many a sermon or Sunday-school address is overlaid and buried under its own robes.

Pity that those we seek to bless should be more taken up with our pretty words than with our adorable Master. I hope I have not this morning fallen into the evil which I lament. Lest I should have done so in any measure, I would make my text my banner, and display it again. The Lord has said, "I will restore health unto thee, and heal thee of thy wounds." I believed that word when I was sick and wounded, and "the Lord was ready to save me: therefore we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments all the days of our life in the house of the Lord."

A MISSIONARY'S ESCAPE FROM DROWNING IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

THE Hunter River enters the Pacific Ocean at Newcastle, the principal coal port of New South Wales, about sixty miles to the north of Sydney. In times of flood, vessels are frequently unable to make the port of Newcastle, but stand away to the north, and take shelter in the harbor of Port Stephens. The volume of water which the Hunter disgorges into the sea after heavy rains is immense.

The Rev. R. W. Vanderkiste, a missionary minister in Australia, says: "I have travelled various tributaries of the Hunter high up, and as far as any habitations of man extended, and seventy and eighty miles from the Hunter's mouth I have found its tributaries in times of heavy rains to be rolling floods of waters which no animal could cross. It is evident that immense bodies of water fall suddenly on the mountains, for you see a river come rolling down unexpectedly in a compact body, some twelve or twenty feet in height, a curious and impressive sight. This phenomenon is especially apt to occur after thunderstorms.

"Boats are then seen rowing over fences and fields, and going from farm to farm, to take from off the roofs of barns and houses adventurous settlers, who, for the sake of being very near the lands they cultivate, have built their premises on dangerously low spots. Guns are being fired in various directions, as signals of distress, and flags of a very extemporaneous character are being hoisted for the same purpose. In some places the currents are too rapid for boats to live. The waters have spread over a farm, the hut is surrounded, the family are huddled in it, the boat approaches, an inquiry is made, 'Shall we take you off?' 'No, we mean to see if it rises higher; we can take to the roof.' 'Well, we'll have an eye on you as well as we can;' and the boat rows away. People do not like to leave their little property, and so incur great danger by remaining. By and by the whole family, little children, and cats, and all are seen seated on the roof. All farms should have good boats, but very few have any, and all men are not good rowers, or rowers at all, if they had boats. So, what with the absence of boats, inability to row or swim, perilous delays, insecure foundations to buildings, rapidly-rising waters, and rapidly-running currents, he must be indeed an obtuse observer of the workings of Divine providence who does not discern in the small amount of loss of life which takes place an evidence that 'the Lord sitteth upon the flood; yea, the Lord sitteth King forever' (Psalm 29: 10).

A Missionary's Escape from a Flood.

"The Rev. Benjamin Chapman, with his family, occupied a house in West Maitland, twenty-four years ago. The flood from which himself and family experienced the merciful deliverance illustrated in the engraving on this page, had been threatening during rainy weather, which had continued for some considerable time. The house was situated on low ground, with low ground on three sides, and Hunter River on the fourth. On the occasion of this flood, the river overflowed its banks, and the building became isolated, with the water rapidly rising toward the house. By divine mercy, however, a rope of sufficient dimensions and strength was procured, which was so fixed across the dangerous current as to enable the strong and willing arms which were at hand to rescue the whole family. The water had already reached the veranda when help arrived.

THE TRAGIC FULFILMENT OF A DREAM.

THE illustration on the left of this page depicts a tragic incident related some time since in the columns of the St. Louis Christian Advocate. It appears that the Rev. C. C. Showers, of Bloomington, Ind., while on his way to Indianapolis and several points in Ohio, left the cars at Greencastle for a brief call. On returning to the depot to resume his journey, he had to cross the track just at the double depot. He thought his train was coming beyond the platform, and was walking with his hand to his face as a shield from the snow storm. It proved the down train from New Albany; and, owing to the escaping steam from a near engine, he did not hear the train, and stepped on the track immediately in front of the slowing engine. He saw his danger, and turned suddenly with his back to the train, but in his bewilderment had not time to leap before the iron guard struck him. He was carried thirty-eight feet, caught under the wheels, and crushed to death. He lived a few minutes, but never spoke.

But here is the remarkable part of the tragic affair. On Saturday night, two days before he set out, while at his home, he had an impressive dream which awoke him. He told his wife, and at early morn went to one of his sons, and related it to him and others.

He dreamed that he suddenly died, and a guide escorted him among high mountains until they came to a deep ravine and large cave, into which a great throng of wretched people were entering. As each one entered and was ordered to advance, he fell on his knees and begged for mercy, but a deep and solemn voice would say, "It is too late, too late, too late," repeating thrice to each. His guide told him this was the entrance to hell, and they who entered were worldly church members, and that the fault was owing to the preachers, who preached more to please than to save souls. The guide told him that was not his doom, and that he would soon take him to his heavenly home.

He was so impressed with this strange, vivid vision, that he spent all day Sabbath reconsecrating himself to God. On Monday he was to start on his trip, and did so. He took an affectionate farewell of his family, feeling convinced he would never see them again in this world. About five o'clock that evening his son received the telegram telling of the good minister's death.

NEW YEAR'S ADDRESS TO SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

By Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.

The Angels of Memory and Hope—A Beneficial Review of the Past—Comparison of Purposes with Results—Study Your Failures—Distinction in Failures—Why You have Failed—Examination of Proposed Work—Personal Fitness—Proposed Methods—A School a Worldly Success, but an Unchristian Thing—Farewell and Hail.

STANDING between the angels Memory and Hope, I salute you most cordially, in the name of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Memory holds up to us the actualities of the closing year, while Hope portrays to us the possibilities of the opening year. Memory is a historian, Hope is a prophet. A careful and prayerful study of history often prepares a Christian worker to fulfil the predictions of hope. It may be well to look backward before we look forward. It will be profitable to give some space of time for study in your closets of all that you have done in Sunday-school work, in the year just closed. Let me ask you to do this work carefully. It is a bad habit to make a superficial survey of any portion of your life, and take therefrom vague notions of what were your motives and methods, and

WHAT WERE THE RESULTS.

If you have been faithful and interested in your work you must have preserved some records, which will enable you with some degree of accuracy to estimate your labors. You ought to be able to tell how often you have been in the Sunday-school; how often at the teachers' meeting; how many children you have instructed in school; how many you have interested at their homes; with how many parents of your scholars you have formed a personal acquaintance; how many of your scholars have become members of the visible Church; how many have grown more learned in Scripture; how much time have you devoted to the study of the lessons, and whether your interest in your work has increased or diminished. Before making such a review, go back to the beginning of the year and recall your purposes, plans, and resolutions, and compare the actualities with your first intentions.

STUDY YOUR FAILURES

first. It is always a good rule to drink first the bitter, and then the sweet—to do work first, and take rest afterward: the cross should always precede the crown. Now let each one ask himself before God, In what have I failed?

That word "fail" may have two senses. You may not have accomplished what you intended, and, in this sense, may have failed; but not succeeding in accomplishing your intentions a very great spiritual good may have come to you, or your scholars, or both; so that in the good results for which we work, it may not have been counted as a failure. It may, therefore, be well to ask yourself what you desired to do, and still considered desirable to have done, which, nevertheless, miscarried. It may have been to correct some serious fault in the character of some one of your scholars. You exerted yourself thereunto, and the fault still remains. It may have been to acquire for yourself some additional capability, some new talent for teaching; and, as yet, you are without it. It may have been your intention to become intensely interested in the salvation of the souls of your scholars, and yet you are compelled, at the end of the year, to acknowledge that you are still performing your duties in a perfunctory style.

Why have you failed? You have had the three hundred and sixty-five days. You have had the Word of God: You have had the Holy Spirit. You have been growing older, more experienced, and nearer the termination of your work each week. Why have you failed? Are you sure, absolutely sure, that that failure was due to causes which could not be removed by God's gracious providence or Holy Spirit?

All you can gather from the past will be such lessons as shall assist you in the future. You cannot go back to correct a single misspelled word, or explain a single sentence, or tear out a single leaf from that book of record, which has gone up for you into eternity. That very fact should help you to gird up the loins of your mind, and be ready for the great future. If you repeat in the coming year the faults of the last, they may become habitual with you: and mere sentimental sighing and weeping at the close of each year, over its follies, will be of no benefit to you, unless the succeeding year shall see those follies avoided.

In making your

which you propose to do in the coming year, begin with yourself. Why are you engaged in the Sunday-school work? Is it because you have nothing to do? Is it mere pastime? Is it because it is the fashion of persons in your position and in your neighborhood to become Sunday-school workers? Is it because you are pleased to have the company of your co-workers, or to be in the excitement attendant upon the gatherings necessary to carry on Sunday-school work? Of what manner of spirit are you? Have you a sense of your own salvation? The solitary object of Sunday-school labor is to bring scholars to salvation. On that road their little hearts will suffer under keen conviction of the sinfulness of their nature, and from an intense desire to find the Saviour. They will have distressing doubts and tormenting apprehensions. They will

NEED A LEADER.

Have you ever been profoundly convinced of the sinfulness of your own nature? Have you ever had your own soul held in such near contrast with the immaculate Spirit of the Holy God that a sense of your own sinfulness has made you exclaim, How I abhor myself! Have you ever reached the point when you felt that you must have a Saviour, not simply some one to keep you from falling into destruction, but some one to pluck you as a brand from the burning? Have you found that Saviour in Jesus, and that salvation in the blood of the everlasting atonement?

If not, what have you to do with teaching in the Sunday-school, the whole intent of which is the conversion of the scholars? If you have a sense and surety of your own personal and present salvation, you can go among your little ones radiantly preaching the sufficiency of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. But if you have never found your way to the cross, the immortal spirits of the little ones committed to your care will cry to you in vain for guidance. You will go to them in spiritual darkness and heaviness. You will be able to bear no witness for the Saviour. You will be a stumbling-block to these very children. If you are unconverted they will naturally feel that they may remain unconverted; and all the more pleasing and captivating your manners, all the more marked will be the ensample of your irreligion. You will not know, by the manner in which the fire began to burn in your bones, how to kindle the flames of conviction in the souls of your scholars. You will not know from the example of a powerful and tender Saviour how to treat your scholars, so that in no case you shall break the bruised reed, in no case quench the smoking flax.

When this spirit of perfect consecration shall have come upon you, it will hold you to a thorough examination of all

YOUR METHODS.

It will not take any spring out of your spirits, any elasticity out of your intellect. But it will give you the discriminating eye to see what influences in school management, in all its departments of spirituality, savor of the influence of Christ, and what do not. It is possible for a Sunday-school to be an utterly worldly and unchristian thing. The Bible may be a text-book, and Gospel hymns the substance of song, and yet, in every department there may be a reliance on the power of the human intellect without the aids of the Holy Ghost; a reliance upon human exertion without the inspiration of God; and culture of the social elements without regard to spiritual growth. The reading may come to be as fine as elocution can make it, and the singing spirited, until it shall draw crowds, such crowds as shall surpass the gatherings of the negro minstrels; and yet the whole school may be an entire failure. Æsthetical culture may be brought out of the poetry of the Bible, and improvement of the logical understanding produced by the arguments of the Bible, and large learning gathered in illustration of the Bible, and such musical talent developed that the brightest lights in the constellation of the opera may come from the musical stars of the Sunday-school. In such a case, if not a single soul among the scholars has come to a sense of its natural need of a Saviour, and come to perceive that Jesus Christ is that Saviour, and come to an enjoyment of a faith which appropriates all the blessings of that salvation to itself, is not such a school a worldly thing, a failure? In some social graces teachers and scholars may have improved without having received the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, which bringeth salvation.

If you are filled with a living sense of Christ's sufficiency, and are daily delighted in the enjoyment of His salvation, you will have unutterable longings to convey the same to your scholars, and to all the persons engaged in the Sunday-school. Your school will no longer be a weekly in-doors picnic, under the name of religion; but it will be a company of men and women and children, swimming in the stream, struggling for the shore, helping one another.

You will perceive, my beloved co-workers, that I have not presumed to enter upon details of methods of teaching and of management. It is becoming that such suggestions should be offered by those who are more closely and actively engaged in work. The simple intent of this appeal has been to hold you a few moments at the door which opens upon the next year, and bow down with you before the Father of our spirits in solemn supplication, that in the temper of our Master we may all rise, and, as the door shall open, enter upon the great duties, the prodigious responsibilities, and the solemn joys of the next year. With fervent love for you, and with a high and keen appreciation of the value of your services, with a certain knowledge of the sacrifices many of you are making, and in the belief that the future has grander things for the Sunday-school than has been vouchsafed to it in the past—sentiments which I share with ten thousand other pastors — in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, I stand between the going and the coming year and salute you:

FAREWELL, AND HAIL.

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

SUMMARY OF THE STORY.

[DAVID FELL, the son of a poor widow, a laundress in London, depressed by the spectacle of his mother and sister wanting food and clothing, and being unable to obtain employment, goes away into the villages to beg. He is arrested as a vagrant and carried before a judge, who, believing a policeman's false statement that the boy has been in prison before, sentences him to three months' imprisonment. On his release and return home, he becomes involved in a dispute with a pawnbroker who had cheated his mother, and is again sent to prison. While he is there Mrs. Fell dies, and her daughter Bess is befriended by an old pedler, Euclid, and his daughter Victoria. Blackett, a habitual thief living in the same tenement house, sets his son Roger to steal Euclid's savings. Roger is arrested, and on the intercession of Euclid is sent by the judge to the training ship, instead of to prison. Mr. Dudley, a friend of juvenile criminals, visits Euclid, and to save him from the persecution of Blackett secretly removes him and his daughter Victoria and Bess to the boarding house of Mrs. Linnett in another part of the city. Meanwhile David Fell, released from prison, returns home, and finding his mother dead and his sister in hiding, accepts Blackett's assistance, and becomes a common thief. Unexpectedly he and his sister meet on London Bridge and recognize each other.]

Reformation and Punishment.

BESS started, in a tremor of hope and gladness. It was David's voice—his whom she had sought for in vain ever since she had lost him!

"Davy!" she cried.

"Ay!" he said.

Then there was a silence. What could they say to one another? There seemed a great gulf between them.

"Davy," said Bess at last, though falteringly, "you must come home with me."

"No," he answered sorrowfully, "I'll never spoil your life, little Bess. You're all right, I see. You've not gone wrong, and I'll never come across you. I'm very glad I've seen you once again; but I didn't try. Bess, I'd ha' been very proud of you if things had happened different."

"Where do you live now?" asked Bess, letting her hand fall upon his greasy sleeve for a moment, but as quickly removing it, with a girlish disgust.

"I live off and on with Blackett," he answered. "I've got no other friend in the world; and sometimes he's good enough, and sometimes he's 'ragious. Bess," and he lowered his voice again to a whisper, "I were in jail again last winter!"

"O Davy! Davy!" she moaned.

"Ay!" he went on. "It's the only home I've got, except the workhouse; and jail's the best. So I must keep away from you, or I'd do you harm. Don't you tell me where you live, or I'd be a-comin' to look at you sometimes; and it 'ud do you harm, little Bess, and do me no good."

"Oh, if Mr. Dudley 'ud only come by!" Bess cried.

"Who's Mr. Dudley?" asked David.

"He'd find you somewhere to go to, and honest work to do," she answered, "I know he would; and you'd grow up into a good man yet, like father."

"A good man like father!" he repeated. "No, I couldn't now; I've grown to like it. I like drink and games, and things as they call wickedness. I can't never be anythink but a thief. There's good folks like you and mother and father; but I've been drove among wicked folks like Blackett, and I can never be like you no more. Mother was a good woman; and what did she come to? Why, she died o' clemming; Blackett's alway a-sayin' so, and he's right there. But she couldn't keep me out o' jail; and I belong to bad folks now."

"O Davy! Davy!" wailed Bess.

"Good-by, little Bess!" he said very mournfully. "I don't want ever to see you again. If Blackett was to see you now! No, no, Bess! you and me are parted forevermore. If there's a hell, I'm goin' to it; and, if there's a heaven, you're goin' to it! So good-by, Bess!"

"Oh! why doesn't Mr. Dudley come by?" cried Bess again, not knowing what to do. For, if David was living with Blackett, she must hide from him where Euclid and Victoria had found shelter from their old enemy. How could she take David home, or even tell him where it was, if that would bring danger to them?

"Why did they send me to jail, and send Roger to school?" said David with bitterness. "It isn't fair. He'd stole money, and I'd only been a beggin' for mother. They didn't give me no chance; and Roger'll get taught everythink. Nobody can help me now. I'm not sixteen yet, and I've been three times in jail; and nobody ever taught me how to get a livin' till I went to jail. And what's the use o' learnin' any trade in jail? Nobody'll take you on when they know where you've been. Father was a good man, and he'd not ha' been willin' to work side by side with a jail-bird. It stands to reason, Bess. So I can never get free from bad folks—never again,"

"What must I do?" cried Bess, weeping, and pressing his arm between both her hands. "O Davy! I can't let you go; but I mustn't take you home with me. What am I to do?"

"Well! only kiss me once," he answered, "just once, and let me go. You can't do nothink for me; it's too late! I'm bad, and a thief now; and all I've got afore me is jail, jail! I wouldn't like to spoil your life for you, little Bess. Don't say where you live; don't! It 'ud be too hard for me some day, and I might come after you, and spoil your life. Don't forget Davy. Kiss me, Bess! kiss me just once, and let me go!"

She lifted up her pretty, girlish face to him with lowered eyelids and quivering mouth; and he pressed his hot, feverish lips upon it. Then he suddenly wrenched his arm from her grasp, and, running very swiftly, was lost to her sight in a few moments amid the crowd always crossing London Bridge.

Why had not Mr. Dudley crossed London Bridge at the time when he was so sorely needed? He asked himself this question with a sharp sense of disappointment and defeat. It was his custom frequently of an evening to go there, and see the sunset on the river; but this day he had felt too busy to go. Some trifling task, which could have been done at any other hour, had hindered him from attaining an end which he had kept steadily before him ever since he had heard David's history.

He had made every effort to trace David, but had utterly failed hitherto; but the story Bess told, with many tears, brought fresh hope to him. Bess had seen and spoken with him, and learned that he was living with Blackett. There would be less difficulty in tracking out Blackett, who had made himself notorious for many years, than in finding David, whose downward career of vice and crime was but lately begun.

The next day was to be a great and memorable day in the lives of both Victoria and Bess. They had been thinking and dreaming of it for weeks. Mr. Dudley was going to take them down the river to the ship Cleopatra, where Roger had been in training for a seaman during the last eighteen months. He had been a troublesome lad at first, cunning and idle, yet with a germ of good in him, which had turned toward David's mother, and had fastened upon her honesty as a quality to be loved and imitated. There had been a careful, kindly, and sympathetic care taken of him by the officers on the Cleopatra; and both idleness and cunning had been conquered. To allow him to return to a land life in London would have been probably to doom him, like David Fell, to a course of guilt which must lead him to the workhouse or the jail. His life would be given to England in aiding to carry her commerce to foreign shores.

The sunrise was as splendid as the sunset had been the night before. Euclid, as he started off to market, called to Victoria out of the street that it was the finest morning of all the year; and, long before the right time for starting, Bess and Victoria were down on London-bridge Pier waiting for Mr. Dudley's arrival. When he came, Bess pointed out to him the exact spot where she had met David last night, and a cloud shadowed her bright face for a few minutes; but it passed away gradually as the vessel steamed off, and carried her out of sight of the bridge.

A number of people on the steamer were bound for the Cleopatra; for it was the yearly fête day, and a real lord and lady were to be present to give away the prizes. They could see the ship, long before they reached it, standing out clearly against the deep blue of the summer sky, with banners and streamers flying from every mast and along every line of rigging. A boat, manned by Cleopatra boys, was waiting at the landing-stage, to carry the visitors across to the ship—sunburnt, healthy, bright-eyed lads in navy blue, looking already like real seamen. One of the biggest of them, as he saw Bess staring about her every way except in his direction, gave a gladsome little shout to call her eyes toward him. It was Roger.

From that moment Bess seemed to see nothing but Roger, so tall he had grown, so strong and bright. His face had lost its scared and sulky look, and smiled whenever he caught her gaze as he bent over his oar, and pulled away, with the other lads, to the ship's side. Roger helped her up the ladder, and made her promise not to go anywhere till he had finished his turn of rowing to and fro to the landing-stage, and was ready to guide her over the Cleopatra himself. She and Victoria stood looking over the gunwale at the gay little boats flitting about; while the ship's banners and streamers fluttered overhead, and a band of music, played by other boys, sounded joyously from the deck, as boat-load after boat-load of friends and visitors boarded the ship. Bess clasped Victoria's hand very tightly, but she could not speak.

Every steamer brought fresh guests, and the trips to the landing-stge were very numerous; but after a while Roger was at liberty to take Bess triumphantly over the Cleopatra, priding himself on the knowledge he had of a hundred things, of which she knew nothing. Beneath the main-deck the yearly banquet was spread on long narrow tables, profusely decorated with flowers and fruit, and displaying more glass and china than Bess had ever dreamed of. But Roger did not linger there.

There was the forecastle to be shown, and the cabins, and the schoolroom, and the boys' sleeping-berths, where Roger hung up his hammock, and leaped into it, curled himself up in it, and leaped out of it, with an agility which amazed Bess. Above deck were the masts and the rigging and the shrouds and boats; and Bess must be told the use of them, and see Roger climbing barefoot, as swiftly as a monkey, till he shouted her name at a giddy height above her, and, loosing his hands from the mast, held on by his feet only, to her great agony and dread. And the sun that day shone as Bess had never known it shine before, and the soft winds played about her face, bringing a deeper color to her cheeks; and, but for one heavy sorrow in her inmost heart, she would have been perfectly happy.

Bess and Victoria and Roger had a pleasant little lunch of biscuit and cheese under a hatchway by themselves while the banquet was going on below. After that was over, the prizes were to be given; and, behold! Roger had won some of these prizes, and had to step forward before all the crowd of guests and shipmates—very proud, yet very shamefaced—to receive them from the hands of the real lord! A hearty cheer rang in his ears as he returned to Bess to show her what he had won; and she saw the tears in his eyes for an instant, though he wiped them away quickly, and cheered the next boy with all his might and strength.

Then there came a number of exercises; and the Cleopatra seemed all alive with brisk lads reefing and furling the sails, running races up the rigging to the mast-head, splicing and knotting ropes, drilling, and a variety of wonderful performances, in which Roger was distinguishing himself, while Bess looked on as if she could gaze forever. Could this indeed be Roger, the dirty, slouching, miserable boy, who used to creep out of his father's sight into her mother's room? Was he the frightened thief who had stolen Euclid's hoard of money, and who had been saved from jail by Euclid's earnest pleading? Or was she dreaming a splendid dream, which would fade away as soon as she awoke?

Victoria enjoyed this red-letter day to the full as much as Bess, though she sat still more, and looked most at the deep blue of the sky, and the sparkling of the swift river, and the green meadows sloping down to its margin. She had grown stronger; but she would always be a small and delicate woman, not fit for rough work. Mr. Dudley had been very busy from the moment he had set his foot on board; but, when the exercises began, he came to sit down beside her for a little while, thinking to himself how serious, yet tranquil, her pale face was, and what a quiet smile dwelt in her eyes.

"Anything the matter, Victoria?" he asked.

"I'm only thinking, sir," she answered. "I got used to thinkin' when father was away all day, and I was left alone, before you knew us."

"And what are you thinking of?" he inquired.

"Does it cost more to keep Roger here than to keep David in jail?" she asked, turning her serious face to him.

"Jails cost more than training-ships," he answered.

"Roger'll know how to get his own livin'," she went on. "And he'll marry a wife, and keep her and his children decent; and he'll never cost anybody no more. But David! I'm thinkin' how he told Bess there's no hope for him now. And, oh! he was so much better than Roger to start with. There was no more harm in him than in Bess then. She'd have turned out bad if you hadn't found us out in time—all through Roger stealing that money."

The Christian Herald for 1884.

THE editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a few words to say on behalf of the publishers, to the friends of the paper That is not an uncommon occurrence, as every week, with undeviating regularity, the two parties are brought into friendly, and as there is substantial reason to believe, profitable communication. But this week a subject is dwelt upon which is very seldom referred to in these columns. That subject is the journal itself.

First. There is an agreeable duty to perform. The circulation THE CHHISTIAN HERALD has attained during the comparatively short time it has been published in this country, is unparalleled in the history of religious journalism. That fact is remarkable, because the paper has been so little advertised and the army of canvassers it is generally thought necessary to the prosperity of a weekly journal to employ, has not been employed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Yet the readers of the paper have continued increasing in number year by year. The present circulation is therefore almost wholly due to the kind efforts of voluntary canvassers, who have introduced the paper to their friends. The sincere thanks of the publishers are due to them, and are hereby tendered.

Second. The friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to learn that God is using the paper in the work of converting souls and in strengthening, encouraging, and comforting His people. It is the conviction that the paper is being thus used, that has induced its friends to work in order to extend its influence. The year now drawing to a close has been in this way the most remarkable in the history of the paper. The hearts of all engaged on the paper have been gladdened by reading testimonies from every State of the Union, of the good it has been the means of doing. For these results the publishers claim no merit. They are, however, humbly thankful to God who has given to their efforts His blessing, without which the best efforts would have failed.

Third. It is possible that much more good may be done in the coming year. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as heretofore, will rely chiefly upon the efforts of its friends everywhere to extend its circulation. It depends upon them whether the growth of its subscription list shall continue and increase in regular progression. If every subscriber could secure one other subscriber—which would not be a difficult undertaking—the list would, of course, be doubled at once. But more than that might be done. It is not necessary to canvass; it is only necessary to show any number of the paper, and to say that it is a fair specimen of the other numbers. Those, too, who desire to do so, can have a bundle of back numbers for distribution by sending a postal card to the Manager; and a statement of terms will be sent to any one who will act as agent in his own locality.

Fourth. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue—God willing—in the future, the same work, on the same lines, as in the past. If it is possible by divine help to make it brighter, more interesting, and more useful than it has been, neither labor nor expense will be spared in the attempt, but there is no intention to abandon the general plan which God has blessed. It is intended that, as heretofore, every number shall contain:

I. The portrait and biography of some eminent person.

II. A verbatim report of the sermon Dr. Talmage preached on the Sunday morning immediately preceding the day on which the paper is issued.

III. An article expounding some portion of the prophecies of the Word of God.

IV. A series of short anecdotes and incidents furnished by evangelists and Christian workers in all parts of the world.

V. A new sermon by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, the eminent London preacher, which by a special arrangement with his publishers is sent in proof sheets to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the day before it is published in England.

VI. Pictures illustrating scenes of foreign missionary work, or passing events, or stories of a directly evangelistic influence.

VII. An exposition of the International Sunday-School lesson, written by Mrs. M. Baxter, for the assistance of teachers.

VIII. An instalment of a serial story free from sensationalism and distinctly religious in its tendency.

IX. A summary of the events of the week, viewed from a Christian point of view, giving information as to public matters of general interest and advocating general social and political reforms, and individual abstinence from intoxicating liquors.

This is a list of the chief and prominent features of each number, and, though there are generally other features, those above mentioned are never omitted. A journal adhering without deviation to that programme, and with no denominational bias, every Christian pastor may recommend to his congregation with confidence, and every Christian worker may usefully recommend to his friends. If those subscribers who have assisted in circulating THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the past will continue their efforts, and those who have hitherto neglected to introduce it, will now commence to show it and recommend it, and if all who read it will pray that God will bless it, the year 1884 will be a year of extended usefulness for the paper and the good it has been enabled to do in the past will be only the first fruits of an abundant harvest.

Below are a few extracts from a large number of letters containing similar testimonies, which have been recently received from subscribers in various States who bear witness of the good work the paper is doing in their respective localities.

Dr. Talmage writes: "I congratulate the Christian Herald on its widening field. The paper is full of compressed information, and bears evidence of having an especial mission. Mr. Fernie has proved his rare qualifications for this sphere of editorial work, and has displayed a unique faculty for spiritualizing ordinary events, which otherwise might pass without any significance"

The Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., writes: "For several years I have been a reader of the Christian Herald, and have enjoyed it. No man of sense critically approves all departments of any newspaper, whether edited by himself or another, but, with this abatement, I can cordially recommend the Christian Herald as bright, instructive, interesting, and trustworthy. It is remarkable for being timely It does not give old news, nor uncertain news, nor useless news, nor wicked news, but much news that is interesting and instructive. Every week I send my copy away, sometimes to distant parts of the earth, believing it will do good"

The Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston, Mass., writes: "It would give me great pleasure to distribute copies of the Christian Herald in my congregation. I will call especial attention to them. I value the paper very highly, and am constantly recommending it."

From Australia. M. John Esler, of Stewart's Camp, Riverena Plains, N. S. W. Australia, writes: "I am a regular reader of your widely-circulated paper, which I get from New York by mail. I spend many happy hours in the loneliness of the Australian Bush reading its valuable pages. I should like to express my gratitude to its editor and to the writers whose articles it publishes. God grant the Christian Herald a still wider circulation, and bless it still more in the salvation of souls."

From China. The Rev J. N. Hayes, of Shanghai, China, in renewing his subscriptions, writes: "We enjoy your most excellent papers in our China home."

THE appearance in Germany of a deeply interesting memorial volume by Herr Bergsträsser, has attracted public attention anew to the royal lady whose pure life and pathetic death were the subject of general comment some five years ago. The Princess Alice, Archduchess of Hesse Darmstadt, was a lady whose personal qualities won the love of all who came in contact with her; and the anecdotes which have been told of her unostentatious charity since her death, have aroused a desire to know all that was to be known about her. Herr Bergsträsser's book is designed to meet that demand. The interesting narrative he has produced, with the private letters the princess wrote, and which are now for the first time given to the public, increase the esteem previously felt for the memory of the distinguished lady. The book has not yet appeared in the English language, but a translation is being made which it is expected will be published in a few months.

Herr Bergsträsser is evidently a courtier, prepared to admire royal and princely personages under any circumstances, but in the case of the Princess Alice his homage is worthily rendered. Her character appears to have been singularly pure, unselfish, and devoted. Though brought up among the sycophants of a court her letters show that she was without pride or vanity. Though her father made her his companion and she admired and loved him deeply, she had none of the arrogance and petty pride of birth and station which marred his character, and though she became the friend and correspondent of Strauss, she passed through the dark ordeal of scepticism into the light of faith in Christ, unscathed. It is impossible to study her life and character without admiring the gentle womanliness which the temptations and frivolities and flatteries of a court could not spoil, and adoring the grace of God that preserved her from falling in a path so slippery and so full of snares, that few have been able to walk there in integrity.

Princess Alice was born on April 25th, 1843, she was therefore in her thirty-sixth year when, on December 14th, 1878, she died. She was the second daughter and third child of Prince Albert and Queen Victoria. Her childhood was naturally a happy one. A scene mentioned by one of the ladies about the court of her parents incidentally shows the innocent gentleness of her disposition. (It is depicted on the left of the portrait in the frontispiece.) was celebrated and Lady Lyttleton thus describes her childish ways: "The Princess Alice in her low-bodied little frock and necklace of pearls trips about blushing and laughing at all the honor that is shown her! The whole family has made its appearance in honor of her birthday. Just now we can only think of one suitable present—a live lamb, all bedecked with pink ribbons and little bells—it is the greatest pet imaginable. This pet-lamb is the cause of many tears, it will not remain with its mistress, but playfully jumps away from her, and will then butt at her, although she treats it in a very tender manner, and asks it in a most loving tone, with many kisses on its nose, 'Milly, my dear Milly, do you love me, too?'"

THE MARRIAGE OF HER ELDER SISTER

occurred on January 25th, 1858, with the Crown Prince of Germany. Princess Alice was then a girl of fifteen, but she had already developed qualities of mind and heart of no ordinary kind, and thus was able to fill up in some measure the vacancy caused by the removal of her elder sister to Berlin. She was drawn nearer to her father, the late Prince Consort, and became his confidante and companion.

THE DEATH OF HER FATHER IN 1861.

A bitter sorrow fell upon her when her father was stricken in 1861 with the illness which terminated in his death. During his illness she was his constant and unwearied nurse, watching with tender devotion at his bedside day and night, and setting an example of coolness and presence of mind rare in one so young. A few days after the Prince's death, one who had enjoyed opportunities of noticing what took place thus spoke of her conduct during that trying time: "Of the devotion and strength of mind shown by the Princess Alice all through these trying scenes it is impossible to speak too highly." Nor did her filial feelings exhaust themselves in attendance on her dying father, she strove to comfort and cheer her widowed mother and to induce a feeling of Christian resignation under her heavy sorrow. That the curtain of gloom which has rested on Queen Victoria now for more than twenty-two years was not lifted in the early days of her affliction, was not the fault of the wise and affectionate daughter. The knowledge of this fact—and it was a fact—sank deeply into people's minds. It was never forgotten, and from that day the name of the Princess Alice became a cherished household word to all her countrymen and countrywomen.

ROYAL VISITORS.

In June, 1860, before the death of Prince Albert, the Court at Windsor was visited by the King of the Belgians, and a crowd of the Prince's relatives. There were the two Princes, Louis and Henry of Hesse, sons of Prince Charles, and nephews of the then reigning Grand Duke who ruled a principality the entire population of which does not exceed 900,000. After they had left England, Prince Albert hinted to his chief adviser Baron Stockmar that Prince Louis and Princess Alice had evidently taken a fancy to one another, and that he had no doubt his family would take further steps. Accordingly, a letter soon arrived from the Crown Princess in Berlin announcing that the mother of the Prince had told her of her son's inclination, and shortly afterward it was arranged at Mayence, while the Queen and the Prince Consort were making a continental tour, that the young Prince should pay a second visit to England.

The final scene of the love-making is described in a book in which Queen Victoria tells her subjects the story of her life. It occurs under date November 30th, 1860: "While I was conversing with the gentlemen after dinner, I observed that Alice and Louis, standing before the fire, were conversing together more earnestly than usual, and as I passed to go to the next room, both of them came toward me, and Alice said, with great agitation, that Louis had proposed to her, and asked for my blessing. (See frontispiece.) I could only press his hand and say, 'Certainly,' and that we would like to speak to him later on in our room. We spent the evening, as well as we could, working. Alice came to our room agitated, but calm. Albert sent to Louis and asked him to come to his room. He first went to him and then called for me and Alice. Louis has a warm and noble heart. We embraced our dear Alice and praised her very much to him. He pressed and kissed my hand, and I embraced him. After talking together for awhile we separated—a most touching and to me solemn moment."

HER MARRIAGE WITH PRINCE LOUIS,

Grand Duke of Hesse, which was postponed in consequence of Prince Albert's death, took place at Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, on July 1st, 1862, the ceremony being of a quiet and unostentatious character, the Queen attending it in deep mourning. The English Parliament voted an annuity as her dowry equivalent to $30,000 a year. The fruit of this marriage was a somewhat numerous family, consisting of five daughters and two sons, the last having been born in 1874.

Meanwhile the princess had acquired a further title on the esteem and affection of her country by reason of the affectionate promptitude with which she left her German home, when in 1871 the Prince of Wales, her eldest brother, was struck down by gastric fever, the same malady which killed his father, and the royal family was threatened with another bereavement. Again did the Princess Alice take her place as nurse in a sick room. During the protracted she attended him with the same patient and untiring care she had bestowed on her father. Again did the 14th of December, the date of the Prince Consort's death, come round, and with it came a curious feeling of apprehension that the day would be signalized by another affliction. But the prince recovered and his recovery was largely due in the Providence of God to the loving and tender care which his wife and sister lavished upon him.

In Germany the princess, by her kindly interest in, and sympathy with, the people of the land of her adoption, soon won the same respect and love she had enjoyed in England. England, however, and all its interests, ever held a foremost place in the heart of the Princess Alice, and no one watched more closely than she every phase of the changeful life of the busy land which she loved.

"THE CRY OF THE OUTCAST POOR," and the terrible misery of destitution often reached her ears, and engaged her ever-ready hands. The condition of the toilworn and the indigent was to her a subject of unceasing and sympathetic interest. How much of their misery, nay, of their evil and immoral lives, is due to their wretched habitations, she felt most keenly, and she gave her intelligent sympathy and influential support to every effort for their improvement.

The experiments of that most sagacious and practical philanthropist, Miss Octavia Hill, in this direction had no warmer supporter. She made herself acquainted with the details of that lady's work, and translated into German two or three of her admirable papers that appeared in Macmillan's Magazine on "The Homes of the Poor," and published them with a brief, but pregnant preface of her own, commending to the attention of German philanthropists the methods which had been practised so successfully by Miss Hill and her coadjutors. She also took a personal and active interest in the poor and suffering.

which is incidentally mentioned in one of her letters to her mother, published in Herr Bergsträsser's volume illustrates this disposition. The princess thus narrates it in a letter to the Queen dated "March 5th, 1864: I must tell you something which I did the other day, but please tell nobody of it, for here nobody, except Louis and my Ladies-in-Waiting, know of it. I am the Protectress of the 'Heidenreich Foundation,' to which you made a handsome present when it was formed. The ladies who are members take linen to poor respectable women in childbirth who claim their assistance, and they bring them food, too—in short, they give them relief. Every case is reported to me. Some days ago I went incognita with Christa to a poor woman of this kind in the old town, and what a trouble we had to find the house!

"At last we went through a little, dirty court, up a dark ladder, into a small room, where the poor woman and her baby were lying in bed. There were four other children in the same room, the husband, two other beds, and a stove. There was no bad smell in the room, and it was not dirty. I sent Christa downstairs with the children, then I

with her husband's help, arranged her bed a little, took the baby from her, bathed its eyes, which were very sore—poor little thing—and put everything in order. (See frontispiece.) I went there twice. The people did not know me, and they were so nice, good-natured, and touchingly attached to one another, it did one good to find such feeling in the midst of such poverty. The man had no work, the children were still too young to go to school, and at her confinement she only had four kreuzers in the house. Imagine this misery and affliction. If one never sees any kind of poverty, and always lives among courtiers alone, the feelings of the heart fall into the background, and I felt the necessity of doing the little good which lay in my power. I am convinced you will understand me."

Naturally full of spirit, and possessing a cheerful interest in the thousand topics which life offers to a young and ardent intelligence, those who observed the Princess Alice closely were conscious that her mind had a pensiveness not unnatural in one on whose mind and heart a severe strain had been so early put.

At length, in 1870 there overspread the Continental sky the lurid, lowering clouds of

and her characteristic earnestness of nature was then perceptibly deepened without contracting the least taint either of supine sadness or murmuring discontent. It was only natural that those long months of inevitable separation from her husband, who was in the very heart of the hard work and perils of the campaign, should of themselves have told on her finely strung and sensitive organism. But she was also brought face to face with the ghastly horrors of maimed and suffering men, by which the honors of the greatest victories are at all times dearly bought. At Darmstadt she was

which was crowded with wounded soldiers, and no one was more active, more helpful with kind thought and gentle hand than Princess Alice. To many a brave and suffering heart she brought solace beyond all the skill that the most skilful surgeon could have wrought. Her presence filled the most despairing with the healing inspiration of hope.

The first breach made by death in the ranks of the princess's family was under peculiarly painful circumstances. On June 29th, 1873, Prince Frederick William, then a little more than two and a half years old, fell from an open window in the palace of Darmstadt, and received such injuries that he died almost immediately afterward. At first, this heavy calamity seemed to have produced only "the sorrow of the world that worketh death;" but gradually it became, by God's mercy, the means of leading her to Him for consolation and teaching, and it was in that bitter sorrow of bereavement that she found peace in trusting wholly in Christ.

THE STORY OF HER CONVERSION

as told by Herr Bergsträsser, in his "Memoirs," is exceedingly touching. He says: "The lamented princess was for several years a disciple of German Rationalism. She seems, in fact, to have come very near to openly doubting the existence of God. All the while, however, she was a devoted wife and mother, and a pattern of every moral virtue. The loss of a child under circumstances which are still well remembered proved the turning point in the princess's life. She said to a friend, 'The whole construction of philosophical conclusions which I had formerly built up I now find to be based on nothing; nothing has remained; and what should we be in life if we had no faith and no conviction that there is a God who governs the world and each single one of us? I feel the necessity of prayer; I like to sing hymns with my children, and each has its favorite hymn.'" In a word, "old things had passed away, and all things had become new."

A MEMORABLE VISIT.

In the autumn of 1878, the Princess, with her husband and children, spent some weeks in her native country. It was her ardent desire to be saved from leading a "useless life." During her stay, therefore, at a seaside watering-place, she visited the Sunday-schools, and often gladdened by her presence the homes of the poor. At this period also, she cordially responded to the desire that she should become the patroness of an Institution for Fallen Women, which she visited. The work of this institution, which has been much blessed to its inmates interested her deeply, and she formed plans for establishing a similar institution in Germany. It had become her desire, as those in every rank who had the privilege of personal intimacy with her have testified, to live and work for Jesus.

OUTBREAK OF DIPHTHERIA.

Soon after returning to Darmstadt, the first indications became manifest of that terrible malady, diphtheria, which attacked the whole family and carried off the youngest child, and then the mother. It was on November 6th, 1878, that the first outbreak occurred, and on that day the Princess Victoria, in her sixteenth year, was attacked. Five days later her little sister, Princess Alice, was placed under medical care. She was immediately followed by the Princess Marie, aged four; and within the next three days the Princess Irene, aged twelve, the Hereditary Grand Duke, aged ten, and their father, the Grand Duke himself, were successively prostrated.

All recovered except the Princess Marie, in whose case from the beginning the disease had assumed a most malignant form. She died early on the morning of November 16th.

PRINCESS ALICE WAS THE NEXT VICTIM, and the way in which she contracted the infection is thus described:

Her Royal Highness, who had been unceasing in her attention to her husband and her children during their illness, had hesitated to inform the Grand Duke of the death of the child, to whom he was devotedly attached, till a favorable moment should arise. The opportunity presenting itself, she gently told him of the loss they had sustained; but the shock was too great. He fell back upon his couch overcome; and, rushing toward her husband, the princess clasped him in her arms and kissed him (see frontispiece). The lady in attendance remonstrated, but it was all too late; the mischief was done. It was affirmed at the time and the observation is sadly touching that she kissed her children, as a glad mother welcoming their convalescence. The medical report stated, "No member of the household (in all sixty persons), no nurse, no physician, has been infected. It is, therefore, clear that all the cases have been produced by direct infection, doubtless by kisses."

As soon as it became known in England that Princess Alice was laid prostrate by the cruel disease, the Queen at once dispatched Sir William Jenner to Darmstadt, to consult and advise with the German physicians, but human skill and the deepest affection were unavailing, and on December 14th, 1878, the anniversary of her father's death, she quietly passed away. She had sacrificed herself to the promptings of maternal sympathy and wifely love. To a life so womanly, so unselfish, so devoted, death could be but gain—for one who trusted in and followed Christ, as she did, death could have no terrors.

WHAT A HACK-DRIVER FOUND.

THE London Telegraph vouches for the truth of the following narrative: "He was an old hack-driver, and the reek of rain had saturated his gray whiskers and polished his red nose so that it looked as though it had been newly varnished. But his spirits were not in the least depressed on this account. Civilly touching his hat he opened his cape, and by the light of the hall lamp disclosed a blue riband pinned to the breast of his coat. 'I'm werry much obliged, sir,' said he, laying a finger on the riband, 'but I've declared off drinking. But if there was such a thing as a cup of coffee in the way now —!' 'If you will wait for five minutes you shall have it.' 'So I will, and thank'y, sir,' he replied, 'and meanwhile, if you don't mind, I'll kiver up the mare.' And there was a curiously comical twinkle in his eyes as he added, 'We master cabmen* ought to make it a duty to take care of our cattle, don't you see, sir, if it is only by way of setting a good example to the drivers.'

"The twinkle came back when the coffee appeared, and he said, after a pause, as though to be exact as to the exceedingly remote period in question, 'I have been a cabmaster, sir, ever since last Thursday week. But I'll tell you another thing,' and he continued, as he chafed his nose with a teaspoon, as though it was the best joke in the world, 'if anybody had said to me last Wednesday week—which was only the day before—what do you think of having a four-wheeler and a couple of horses to call your own to-morrow, I should have made answer "It's just about as likely that I shall be made Hemperor of China," which, mind you,' said he, growing suddenly serious, 'wouldn't have been an unnatural answer for a man at my time of life to make, since it is not every day, by a long way, that a new cab and a pair of horses, and two sets of new harness, falls, in a manner of speaking, from the skies, now is it?'

"'I suppose you mean that they became yours in the way of an unexpected windfall, as it is called?' 'That they were left in a cab, sir; leastways, that was what you might call the key of it,' he replied. There wasn't any romarnce about it. A gent, he hailed me in the Strand, carrying a black bag, and says he "Drive to the Angel at Islington." When we got there I couldn't make anything of him. He was in a fit or something. But being not very far off, I drove him straight to St. Batholomew's, where they took him in insensible. There was nothing in his pockets to show where he lived, so that I might have known where to take the black bag, and let his friends know what had become of him, so I took it over to Scotland Yard,†

"'Well, sir, three days afterward I got a letter from a house in Eaton Square to go and get a reward for the bag, and there I found the very gent I took to the hospital, and a lady as well. "You did a humane act, cabman, in taking me to Bartholomew's, and you probably saved my life, in fact. But I may tell you that it was perhaps as well that you were not aware of the great value of what was contained in that bag." I don't say you would have been tempted to dishonesty," he says, "but I have caused inquiries to be made about you, and have ascertained you are only a poor cab-driver, and the opportunity for appropriating a great sum of money might have been too much for you. I have discussed with my wife the most suitable reward to make to you," says he, "and you will find it in the mews, to which a servant shall conduct you."

"'"What you will find there is your own on this condition," says the lady. "You know what this means?" and she shows me a bit of blue riband—this bit. "Well, mum," I says, "as I understand it, wearing it is all as one with taking the pledge." "That is so," says she. "Will you promise to wear it with that meaning? You may be able to guess," she says, "why I make this condition with you?"' 'And were you able to guess?' 'Well, I was never much of a one at riddles,' replied the old cabman, with some degree of embarrassment, 'but I suppose that when they set on somebody to make inquiries as to my private character, they had heard as how I now and again took a glass more than was good for me.'"

YOUR PEDIGREE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 6, 1884.

"Whose son art thou, thou young man?"—1 SAMUEL 17 : 58.

An Unequal Fight—A Tableau—Transmitted Characteristics—Royal Scoundrels—Above Circumstance—Perversion of the Doctrine—Your Duty—The Old Folks at the Festivity—I. A Christian Pedigree—The Influence of a Departed Mother—A Vast Estate of Prayer—An Unwritten Will—Trustees of Piety—The Voice of an Old Cradle—An Entry in a Diary—A Mother's Answered Prayers—II. An Evil Pedigree—Transmitted Avarice—Inherited Vice Successfully Resisted—The Hero to Put Down the Brakes—The Divine Parentage Offered.

NEVER was there a more unequal fight than that between David and Goliath. David five feet high; Goliath ten. David a shepherd boy, brought up amid rural scenes; Goliath a warrior by profession. Goliath a mountain of braggadocia; David a marvel of humility. Goliath armed with an iron spear, David armed with a sling with smooth stones from the brook. But you are not to despise these latter weapons. There was a regiment of slingers in the Assyrian army and a regiment of slingers in the Egyptian army, and they made terrible execution, and they could cast a stone with as much precision and force as now can be hurled shot or shell. The Greeks in their army had slingers who would throw leaden plummets inscribed with the irritating words: "Take this!" So it was a mighty weapon David employed in that famous combat.

A Jewish rabbi says that the probability is that Goliath was in such contempt for David, that in a paroxysm of laughter he threw his head back, and his helmet fell off, and David saw the uncovered forehead, and his opportunity had come, and taking this sling and swinging it around his head two or three times, and aiming at that uncovered forehead, he crushed it in like an egg-shell. The battle over,

BEHOLD A TABLEAU:

King Saul sitting, little David standing, his fingers clutched into the hair of decapitated Goliath. As Saul sees David standing there holding in his hand the ghastly, reeking, staring trophy, evidence of the complete victory over God's enemies, the king wonders what parentage was honored by such heroism, and in my text he asks David his pedigree: "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

The king saw what you and I see, that this question of heredity is a mighty question. The longer I live the more —good blood, bad blood, proud blood, humble blood, honest blood, thieving blood, heroic blood, cowardly blood. The tendency may skip a generation or two, but it is sure to come out, as in a little child you sometimes see a similarity to a great-grandfather whose picture hangs on the wall. That the physical and mental and moral qualities are inheritable is patent to any one who keeps his eyes open. The similarity is so striking sometimes as to be amusing. Great families, regal or literary, are apt to have the characteristics all down through the generations, and what is more perceptible in such families may be seen on a smaller scale in all families. A thousand years have no power to obliterate the difference.

The large lip of the House of Austria is seen in all the generations, and is called the Hapsburg lip. The House of Stuart always means in all generations cruelty and bigotry and sensuality. Witness Queen of Scots. Witness Charles I. and Charles II. Witness James I. and James II. and all the other scoundrels of that imperial line. Scottish blood means persistence, English blood means reverence for the ancient, Welsh blood means religiosity, Danish blood means fondness for the sea, Indian blood means roaming disposition, Celtic blood means fervidity, Roman blood means conquest.

The Jewish facility for accumulation you may trace clear back to Abraham, of whom the Bible says "he was rich in silver and gold and cattle," and to Isaac and Jacob, who had the same characteristics. Some families are characterized by longevity, and they have a tenacity of life positively Methuselish. Others are characterized by Goliathian stature, and you can see it for one generation, two generations, five generations, in all the generations. Vigorous theology runs on in the line of the Alexanders. Tragedy runs on in the family of the Kembles. Literature runs on in the line of the Trollopes. Philanthropy runs on in the line of the Wilberforces. Statesmanship runs on in the line of the Adamses. Henry and Catharine of Navarre religious, all their families religious. The celebrated family of the Casini, all mathematicians. The celebrated family of the Medici—grandfather, son and Catharine—all remarkable for keen intellect. The celebrated family of Gustavus Adolphus all warriors.

This law of heredity asserts itself without reference to social or political condition, for you sometimes find the ignoble in high place and the honorable in obscure place. A descendant of Edward I. a toll gatherer. A descendant of Edward III. a doorkeeper, A descendant of the Duke of Northumberland a trunk maker. Some of the mightiest families of England are extinct, while some of those most honored in the peerage go back to an ancestry of hard knuckles and rough exterior. This law of heredity entirely independent of social or political condition. Then you find avarice and jealousy and sensuality and fraud having full swing in some families. The violent temper of Frederick William is the inheritance of Frederick the Great. It is not a theory to be set forth by worldly philosophy only, but by divine authority. Do you not remember how the Bible speaks of "a chosen generation," of "the generation of the righteous," of "the generation of vipers," of an "untoward generation," of "a stubborn generation," of "the iniquity of the past visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation?" So that the text comes to-day with the force of a projectile hurled from mightiest catapult, "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

"Well," says some one, "that theory discharges me from all responsibility. Born of sanctified parents we are bound to be good and we cannot help ourselves. Born of unrighteous parentage we are bound to be evil and we cannot help ourselves."

TWO INACCURACIES.

As much as if you should say, "the centripetal force in nature has a tendency to bring everything to the centre, and therefore all things come to the centre. The centrifugal force in nature has a tendency to throw out everything to the periphery, and therefore everything will go out to the periphery." You know as well as I know that you can make the centripetal overcome the centrifugal, and you can make the centrifugal overcome the centripetal. As when there is a mighty tide of good in a family that may be overcome by determination to evil, as in the case of Aaron Burr, the libertine, who had for father President Burr, the consecrated; as in the case of Pierrepont Edwards, the scourge of New York society seventy years ago, who had a Christian ancestry; while on the other hand some of the best men and women of this day are those who have come of an ancestry of which it would not be courteous to speak in their presence.

The practical and useful object of this sermon is to show to you that if you have come of a Christian ancestry, then you are solemnly bound to preserve and develop the glorious inheritance; or if you have come of a depraved ancestry, then it is to brace yourself against the evil tendency by all prayer and Christian determination, and you are to find out what are the family frailties, and in arming the castle put the strongest guard at the weakest gate. With these smooth stones from the brook I hope to strike you, not where David struck Goliath, in the head, but where Nathan struck David, in the heart. "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

There has been something in these recent holidays to bring up

THE OLD FOLKS.

I think many of our thoughts have been set to the tune of Auld Lang Syne. The old folks were so busy at such times in making us happy, and perhaps on less resource made their sons and daughters happier than you on larger resource are able to make your sons and daughters happy. The snow lay two feet above their graves, but they shook off the white blankets and mingled in the holiday festivities—the same wrinkles, the same stoop of shoulder under the weight of age, the same old style of dress or coat, the same smile, the same tones of voice. I hope you remember them before they went away. If not, I hope there are those who have recited to you what they were, and that there may be in your house some article of dress or furniture with which you associate their memories. I want to arouse the most sacred memories of your heart while I make the impassioned interrogatory in regard to your pedigree: "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

I. First, I accost all those who are descended of a CHRISTIAN ANCESTRY.

I do not ask if your parents were perfect. There are no perfect people now, and I do not suppose there were any perfect people then. Perhaps there was sometimes too much blood in their eye when they chastised you. But from what I know of you, you got no more than you deserved, and perhaps a little more chastisement would have been salutary. But you are willing to acknowledge, I think, that they wanted to do right. From what you overheard in conversations and from what you saw at the family altar and at neighborhood obsequies, you know that they had invited God into their heart and life. There was something that sustained those old people supernaturally. You have no doubt about their destiny. You expect if you ever get to heaven to meet them as certainly as you expect to meet the Lord Jesus Christ.

That early association has been a charm for you. There was a time when you got right up from a house of iniquity and walked out into the fresh air because you thought your mother was looking at you. You have never been very happy in sin because of a sweet old face that would present itself. Tremulous voices from the past accosted you until they were seemingly audible, and you looked around to see who spoke. There was an estate not mentioned in the last will and testament, of prayer and holy example and Christian entreaty and glorious memory. The survivors of the family gathered to hear the will read, and this was to be kept, and that was to be sold, and it was share and share alike. But there was an unwritten will that read something like this: "In the name of God, Amen. I, being of sound mind, bequeath to my children all my prayers for their salvation; I bequeath to them all the results of a lifetime's toil; I bequeath to them the Christian religion which has been so much comfort to me, and I hope may be solace for them; I bequeath to them a hope of reunion when the partings of life are over; share and share alike may they have in eternal riches. I bequeath to them the wish that they may avoid my errors and copy anything that may have been worthy. In the name of the God who made me, and the Christ who redeemed me, and the Holy Ghost who sanctifies me, I make this my last will and testament. Witness, all ye hosts of heaven. Witness, time, witness, eternity. Signed, sealed, and delivered in this our dying hour. Father and Mother."

You did not get that will proved at the Surrogate's office; but I take it out to-day and I read it to you; I take it out of the alcoves of your heart; I shake the dust off of it, I ask you will you accept that inheritance, or will you break the will? O ye of Christian ancestry, you have a responsibility vast beyond all measurement! God will not let you off with just being as good as ordinary people when you had such extraordinary advantage. Ought not a flower planted in a hot-house be more thrifty than a flower planted outside in the storm? Ought not a factory turned by the Housatonic do more work than a factory turned by a thin and shallow mountain stream? Ought not you of great early opportunity be better than those who had a cradle unblessed?

A father sets his son up in business. He keeps an account of all the expenditures. So much for store fixtures, so much for rent, so much for this, so much for that, and all the items aggregated, and the father expects the son to give an account. Your Heavenly Father charges against you all the advantages of a pious ancestry—so many prayers, so much Christian example, so many kind entreaties—all these gracious influences one tremendous aggregate, and He asks you for an account of it. Ought not you to be better than those who had no such advantages? Better have been a foundling picked up off the city commons than with such magnificent inheritance of consecration to turn out indifferently.

Ought not you, my brother, to be better, having had Christian nurture than that man who can truly say this morning: "The first word I remember my father speaking to me was an oath; the first time I remember my father taking hold of me was in wrath; I never saw a Bible till I was ten years of age, and then I was told it was a pack of lies. The first twenty years of my life I was associated with the vicious. I seemed to be walled in by sin and death." Now, my brother, ought you not—I leave it as a matter of fairness with you—ought you not to be far better than those who had no early Christian influence? Standing as you do between the generation that is past and the generation that is to come, are you going to pass the blessing on, or are you going to have your life the gulf in which that tide of blessing shall drop out of sight forever? You are in that ancestral line, and are you going to augment or squander that solemn trust fund? are you going to disinherit your sons and daughters of the heirloom which your parents left you? Ah! that cannot be possible, that cannot be possible that you are going to take such a position as that. You are very careful about the life insurances, and careful about the deeds, and careful about the mortgages, and careful about the title of your property, because when you step off the stage you want your children to get it all. Are you making no provision that they shall get grandfather and grandmother's religion? Oh, what a last will and testament you are making, my brother! "In the name of God, Amen. I, being of sound mind, make this my last will and testament. I bequeath to my children all the money I ever made and all the houses I own; but I disinherit them, I rob them of the ancestral grace and the Christian influence that I inherited. I have squandered that on my own worldliness. Share and share alike must they in the misfortune and the everlasting outrage. Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of God and men and angels and devils and all the generations of earth and heaven and hell, January, 1884."

O ye highly favored ancestry, wake up this morning to a sense of your opportunity and your responsibility. I think there must be or a fragment of a cradle somewhere that could tell a story of midnight supplication in your behalf. Where is the old rocking chair in which you were sung to sleep with the holy nursery rhyme? Where is the old clock that ticked away the moments of that sickness on that awful night when there were but three of you awake—you and God and mother? Is there not an old staff in some closet? is there not an old family Bible on some shelf that seems to address you, saying: "My son, my daughter, how can you reject that God who so kindly dealt with us all our lives and to whom we commended you in our prayers living and dying! By the memory of the old homestead, by the family altar, by our dying pillow, by the graves in which our bodies sleep while our spirits hover, we beg you to turn over a new leaf for the new year." Oh, the power of ancestral piety, well illustrated by a young man of New York who attended a prayer-meeting one night and asked for prayer, and then went home and wrote down these words:

AN ENTRY IN A DIARY.

"Twenty-five years ago to-night my mother went to heaven, my beautiful, blessed mother, and I have been alone, tossed up and down upon the billows of life's tempestuous ocean. Shall I ever go to heaven? She told me I must meet her in heaven. When she took her boy's hand in hers and turned her gentle, loving eyes on me and gazed earnestly and long into my face, and then lifted them to heaven in that last prayer, she prayed that I might meet her in heaven. I wonder if I ever shall?

"My mother's prayers! Oh, my sweet, blessed mother's prayers! Did ever boy have such a mother as I had? For twenty-five years I have not heard her pray until to-night. I have heard all her prayers over again. They have had, in fact, a terrible resurrection. Oh, how she was wont to pray! She prayed as they prayed to-night, so earnest, so importunate, so believing. Shall I ever be a Christian? She was a Christian. Oh, how bright and pure and happy was her life! She was a cheerful and happy Christian. There is my mother's Bible. I have not opened it for years. Did she believe I could ever neglect her precious Bible? She surely thought I would read it much and often. How often has she read it to me.

"Blessed mother, did you pray in vain for your boy? It shall not be in vain. Ah! no, no, it shall not be in vain. I will pray for myself. Who has sinned against so much instructions as I have? against so many precious prayers put up to heaven for me by one of the most lovely, tender, pious, confiding, trusting of mothers in her Heavenly Father's care and grace. She never doubted. She believed. She always prayed as if she did. My Bible, my mother's Bible and my conscience teach what I am and what I have made myself. Oh, the bitter pangs of an accusing conscience. I need a Saviour mighty to save. I must seek Him. I will. I am on the sea of existence, and I can never get off from it. I am afloat. No anchor, no rudder, no compass, no book of instructions, for I have put them all away from me. Saviour of the perishing, save or I perish."

Do you wonder that the next day he arose in a prayer-meeting and said: "My brethren, I stand before you a monument of God's amazing mercy and goodness, forever blessed be His holy name; all I have and all I am I consecrate to Jesus, my Saviour and my God"? Oh, the power of ancestral prayer. Hear it! Hear it!

II. But I turn for a moment to those who had

and I want to tell you that the highest thrones in heaven and the mightiest triumphs and the brightest crowns will be for those who had evil parentage, but who by the grace of God conquered. As useful, as splendid a gentleman as I know of to-day had for father a man who died blaspheming God until the neighbors had to put their fingers in their ears to shut out the horror. One of the most consecrated and useful Christian ministers of to-day was born of a drunken horse-jockey. Tide of evil tremendous in some families. It is like Niagara Rapids, and yet men have clung to a rock and been rescued.

There is a family in New York whose wealth has rolled up into many millions that was founded by a man who, after he had vast estate sent back a paper of tacks because they were two cents more than he expected. Grip and grind and gouge in the fourth generation—I suppose it will be grip and grind and gouge in the twentieth generation. The thirst for intoxicants has burned down through the arteries of a hundred and fifty years. Pugnacity or combativeness characterize other families. Sometimes one form of evil, sometimes another form of evil. But it has been resisted. If the family frailty be avarice, cultivate unselfishness and charity, and teach your children never to eat an apple without offering somebody else half of it. Is the family frailty combativeness, keep out of the company of quick-tempered people, and never answer an impertinent question until you have counted a hundred both ways, and after you have written an angry letter keep it a week before you send it, and then burn it up! Is the family frailty timidity and cowardice, cultivate backbone, read the biography of brave men like Joshua or Paul, and see if you cannot get a little iron in your blood. Find out what the family frailty is, and set body, mind, and soul in battle array.

CONQUER YOU WILL.

I think the genealogical table was put in the first chapter of the New Testament, not only to show our Lord's pedigree, but to show that a man may rise up in an ancestral line and beat back successfully all the influences of bad heredity. See in that genealogical table that good King Asa came of vile King Abia. See in that genealogical table that Joseph and Mary and the most illustrious Being that ever touched our world, or ever will touch it, had in their ancestral line scandalous Rheoboam and Thamar and Bathsheba. If this world is ever to be Edenized—and it will be—all the infected families of the earth are to be regenerated, and there will some one arise in each family line and open a new genealogical table. There will be some Joseph in the line to reverse the evil influence of Rheoboam, and there will be some Mary in the line to reverse the evil influence of Bathsheba. Perhaps the star of hope may point down to your manger. Perhaps you are to be the hero or the heroine that is to put down the brakes and stop that long train of genealogical tendencies and switch it off on another track from that on which it has been running for a century. You do that, and I will promise you as fine a palace as the architects of heaven can build, the archway inscribed with the words: "More than conqueror."

AN OFFERED PARENTAGE.

But whatever your heredity, let me say, you may be sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty. Estranged children from the homestead come back through the open gate of adoption. There is royal blood in our veins. There are crowns on our escutcheon. Our Father is King. Our Brother is King. We may be kings and queens unto God forever. Come and sit down on the ivory bench of the palace. Come and wash in the fountains that fall into the basins of crystal and alabaster. Come and look out of the upholstered window upon gardens of azalea and amaranth. Hear the full burst of the orchestra while you banquet with potentates and victors. Oh, when the text sweeps backward, let it not stop at the cradle that rocked your infancy, but at the cradle that rocked the first world, and when the text sweeps forward, let it not stop at your grave, but at the throne on which you may reign forever and ever. "Whose son art thou, thou young man?" Son of God! Heir of mortality! Take your inheritance!

THE CAREER OF ANTICHRIST.

By Rev. Allen Wendle.

The Three and a Half Years—After the Rapture of Watchful Saints—Before the Lord's Appearance in Glory—The Appearance of Antichrist—Not to be Revealed Until after the Rapture—The Revival of the Roman Dynasty—Antichrist to Accept Satan's Offer—The Seventieth Week Divided Off—Antichrist's Blaspheming—His Companion Prompting the People—The End of Antichrist.

WHEN the aged prophet Elijah, mighty in faith, sent his servant to look toward the sea, he returned, saying, "There is nothing." Seven times he repeated the visit, and then a cloud appeared no bigger than a man's hand. It was, however, the forerunner of a storm. The heavens were covered with clouds, and there was a great rain. Many of God's people are now, like that prophet, on their knees, crying, "Come, Lord Jesus—come quickly!" We may as yet see nothing visible; but when we look into the "glass" of the Word of God, we are appalled by the magnitude of the approaching storm. Did the captain of the stoutest ship which ever put to sea behold such indications, how quickly would every stitch of canvas be furled, and all made ready to encounter the dreaded gale. God grant that such may be our case, as it is now of infinite importance that we should be safely anchored to the Rock of Ages.

Let it be clearly understood that of the great tribulation for three and a half years, to which we are about to call your attention, will take place between the two acts of our Lord's coming; that is to say, after His watchful and ready saints have been translated to heaven without dying, and before His coming to destroy Antichrist.

The first point I have now to place before you is

THE APPEARANCE OF ANTICHRIST.

Upon this earth of ours there once walked a man, the personification of goodness. God was in Christ. The testimony of the Holy Ghost concerning the man Christ Jesus is, "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Such a text might well silence all cavillers against the divinity of our Lord. But the world rejected Him. He was too holy for unholy men; He was too unselfish for their selfish minds; and they crucified Him. God has thus given one instance of what man might be. Antichrist will be the very opposite. Men have chosen darkness rather than light, and then they shall know its mighty power—even a darkness that may be felt.

The Pope is not the Antichrist, but an Antichrist. Yet it is important to note that he sets before us in a shadowy form what the true Antichrist will be. Antichrist will be a man almost as full of the Devil as the Lord Jesus was full of God. The Saviour manifested on earth what God was. Antichrist will teach men on earth what the Devil is. We read in II Thessalonians 2 : 3, "Let no man deceive you by any means, for that day shall not come [that is, the day of Christ in its fulness], except there come a falling away first. And that man of sin will be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Remember ye not that when I was yet with you I told ye these things? and now ye know what withholdeth that he [the Antichrist] might be revealed in his time."

THE WITHHOLDING.

What is it that doth withhold? God said to Lot, "I can do nothing till thou be come out thence; haste thee, escape for thy life." I believe what withholdeth Antichrist is that Body of saints who must go up to heaven before the revelation of Antichrist. Look at the seventh verse: "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth [i.e. hindereth the development of the man of sin] will let, until he be taken out of the way." The "he" here I take again to be the Body of saints symbolized by the man child in Rev. 12, who will be caught up before the three and a half years. "And then shall that wicked [Greek, lawless] one be revealed whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming."

Let us now look at the thirteenth chapter of Revelation, and see the further development of this awful personage. "And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his head the name of Blasphemy." Here you have Daniel's fourth beast—the Roman Empire. Let us for a moment pause. The beast has seven heads, and it will interest you to show that there have been seven forms of government in the Roman Empire: (1) kings, (2) consuls, (3) dictators, (4) decemvirs, (5) military tribunes, (6) emperors; and then the seventh was Napoleon Bonaparte's dynasty, without a doubt.

There is no doubt that in Napoleon the First was revived, and his son was crowned King of Rome; thus he was the seventh dynasty which held Rome in subjection. After the seventh, we are told there cometh an eighth, in the seventeenth chapter of Revelation and the eighth verse. Here we again meet with Antichrist: "The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition. The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth; and there are seven kings—five are fallen and one is;" that is, the sixth power then being emperors—one of whom reigned in Rome at the time John wrote, "and the other is not yet come" (when John wrote it). But he came when Napoleon Bonaparte revived the headship. "When he cometh, he must continue a short space. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition. And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast. They have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast." These I believe to be the ten toes in Daniel's image—the ten future kings of the revived Roman Empire. These ten kings and their kingdoms will give their strength to Antichrist.

Observe, the dragon will give to the Antichrist his power, his seat, his throne, and great authority, all of which he offered unto the Lord Jesus Christ: "All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me."

SATAN WILL MEET ANTICHRIST

with the like offer, and it will be accepted. In Rev. 13 we read, "I saw one of the heads as it were wounded to death" (i.e., the Napoleonic dynasty), "and his deadly wound was healed, and all the world wondered after the beast"—the poor, giddy, gay, fashionable, pleasure-loving, money-grasping world will wonder after the Antichrist—"saying, who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies, and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months"—three years and a half exactly, the period of the great tribulation. "And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name, and His tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given unto him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations. And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. If any man have an ear, let him hear."

Of this time our Lord speaks when He says, "Except those days should be shortened, no flesh should be saved" (Matt. 24 : 22). And again, "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" For do you not see here that all the faithful will be scattered or cut off, and people among whom you are now sitting may fall down and worship Antichrist? The book tells you that all shall worship him whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life.

to their own land. In Jeremiah 30, third verse, we read, "Lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of My people Israel and Judah, saith the Lord"—remember that the exiles who returned from the captivity at Babylon were the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin; the ten tribes of Israel were scattered, and have never returned; but here you have them both mentioned: "and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers." Again, in Ezekiel 37 : 21, "Thus saith the Lord God: Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." This text of Scripture amply proves the great point that I now have in consideration, namely, that the Jews will return to their own land.

They will then receive Antichrist as their prince (see Daniel 9, twenty-fourth verse), "Seventy weeks are determined upon Thy people and upon Thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy." This number seventy is then divided into three parts—seven weeks, threescore and two weeks, and one week. Now observe verse 26, "And after threescore and two weeks, shall Messiah be cut off, but not for Himself, and the people of the prince that shall come" (i.e., of the last head of the Roman power—Antichrist) "shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined."

"And he"—the prince that shall come—"shall confirm a covenant with many for one week," i.e., the last week of the seventy weeks, which seventy weeks are considered to be weeks of years. There is an interregnum between the sixty-ninth and seventieth week, a parenthetical period in Jewish history. Nationally they ceased to exist after the destruction of Jerusalem, and are restored when the fulness of the Gentiles comes in. During the last week—the seventieth—they appear to be altogether mixed up with the prince that will come, with whom they will make a seven years' covenant. An image will be made to this Antichrist, and he will break with the Jews. In Revelation 12 : 11, we read that he will have a companion—"the false prophet"—who will "say to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by the sword, and did live. And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed." Those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life, who will not worship the Antichrist, will be martyred. But some will escape from that. Look at Rev. 12 and seventh verse—"And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she had a place prepared of God, to feed her there for 1260 days," i.e. three and a half years, during the Antichrist's sway. At this time the image of the beast will be set up upon the battlements of the temple at Jerusalem, rebuilt after the Jews had gone back to their own land. Rev. 11 : 1, 2, speaks of this temple. Also, in Daniel 9 : 27 we are told that, "in the midst of the week" of seven years—that is, at the beginning of the latter three and a half years, or forty-two months, the time of the great tribulation—"he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate." The marginal reading is, "and upon the battlements shall be the idols of the desolate." That will be the abomination that maketh desolate. It was never fulfilled in the days of Titus; but when Antichrist will be dominant, he will put his image upon the battlements of the temple. Then will commence the such as never was before, nor ever will be again. This will be the "time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book" (Dan. 12 : 1, 2).

Now look at Zechariah 14 : 1, "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst. For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle;" those ten kingdoms of the great Roman Empire—once again under their revived head—Antichrist; "and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished," etc.

The 19th of Revelation also agrees with these two passages. There you will see the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies gathered together to make war against the Lord Jesus; and the beast Antichrist, with the false prophet, are taken and cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. This dread conflict is the time for which men will beat their ploughshares into swords, and their pruning-hooks into spears. Watch and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Smiling at Death.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Simpson narrated: "A friend was speaking of the death of his wife, and he said it was one of the most delightful cases of death he had ever witnessed. When just in the very throes of it, there was a smile over her whole face, and she looked up and said, 'I can smile at death.' So perfect was the peace God had given her."

A Band of God's Emigrants.—Mr. Oatts Related: "The ways of God are wonderful in our eyes. Some months ago a number of our young people went to Buffalo, in the United States of America, with the intention of bettering their worldly affairs, God, however, had another purpose in view as well. In Buffalo it has been the habit of several young men to hold open-air services, but as they were called away during the winter from the town, it was thought there would be no open-air work done this season, but there was. The usual services were held, for these young men from our city took up the work and carried it on. No work that is directed by God ever fails. Individuals may be changed, but the work goes on."

Salvation Through a Tear.—Harry Moorhouse tells of a young woman who was left an orphan and occupied a little back room in an out-of-the-way place in London. By and by she became ill, could no longer get out to her work, and thought she must die, unfriended and alone. God, however, sent a lady to visit her. She tidied up the little room, attended to the girl's wants, spoke very kindly, and asked to be allowed to return. Three or four times the kindly affectionate creature visited the sick girl. At first she did not speak about Christ; but one day she took the invalid's hand and lovingly asked her if she knew anything about the love of Jesus. As she did so she dropped a tear on the girl's face and it was that, she said, that broke her heart. She felt that the lady must love her very much to be so anxious about her, and that tear was the means of bringing her to know the Saviour.

Afraid of a Front Seat.—The Rev. Mr. Howie related: "A man came to Mr. Patterson's church, at Govan, and wanted to get into a back seat; in fact, he had stipulated with the person who brought him that he should not be taken to any conspicuous place where he could be got at. However, he could not find accommodation at the rear of the church, and was taken to the front. When the inquiry meeting was commenced I pounced upon this man, who was anxious to get away, but being a little stronger than he was, after a little struggle I got a few words poured into his ears and induced him to sit down. I got one of my elders to speak to him. He came back the next night, grasped this man by the hand, and said, 'I am thankful I was detained last night.' He then told him how both he and his wife had that night made a profession of their faith in Christ."

Prayed for in a Meadow.—Mr. William Robertson related: "Some careless young people were, a short time ago, passing a company of people who were listening to the preaching of the Gospel in a meadow, and two of them seemed inclined to remain, but one of their friends shouted, 'Come along; if you stay there you will be converted!' and so they passed on. The gentleman who was conducting the open-air meeting asked for prayer for these heedless and giddy young people, and prayer was made. Not long ago, at Hawick, this incident was referred to, and at the close of the meeting, a young man came forward and acknowledged that he was one of the little group of thoughtless people in the meadow for whom prayer was asked as stated. He was brought to the Lord a week afterward. The Lord had answered prayer."

A Very Bad Disease Cured.—Bailie Ross Related: "Last week I was at Loch Tarbert, addressing a meeting. When I had finished speaking, a man rose and said, 'I want to tell the people what the Lord has done for me. For fourteen years I was a besotted drunkard. I signed the pledge, joined the Good Templars, and tried all I could, but I could not keep my obligations, nor did the so-called cures cure me. There I was, suffering from that terrible disease called drink-craving, and there is only one Doctor who can cure it, and He is Christ, the only Divinely qualified Physician of souls. Sick of sin, I went to Him and asked Him in mercy to cure me. The longing for drink was taken away at once, and He has saved my soul and made me a new creature. If there is one weary soul here now, come to His loving arms. He will cure you.' This straightforward, simple testimony was blessed to many seeking sinners who were present."

A Happy Eavesdropper.—Mr. Deware Remarked: "Twenty-three years ago I used to hold Gospel meetings, and speak personally to those whom I visited, and was often in great depression of spirits owing to the fewness and smallness of results. One day I was going round the district with some communion cards, and one of those I wished to see was not at home, but the person who had opened the door for me asked, 'Is this your name on the card?' 'Yes,' I said, 'that is it.' 'You knew my mother, then; when you used to speak to her about her sins, and the love of Jesus, I was often listening, though you did not know it, and since then I have been blessed by the words you uttered. I have found Christ, and He is now my salvation and my song.' It is impossible to describe the joy I experienced on hearing this; my heart overflowed with gratitude to God for His kindness in letting me see the result of work I thought fruitless. 'In due season we shall reap if we faint not.'"

A Drowning Man's Obstinacy.—Mr. Reid Related: "Two young men were walking beside a river, when one of them stumbled and fell in. He could not swim, but his companion was a capital swimmer—perfectly able to save him if he only allowed him to do so. The swimmer plunged into the water, and said to the struggling man, 'Keep quite still; do nothing, and I'll save you!' A few strokes brought him to his friend, who instantly seized his arm, thus preventing him doing anything. With a great effort he wrenched his arm away from the terrified man, saying, 'Now, if you are not quite quiet I shall be forced to leave you to your fate.' The man knew that he must go down if not pulled out by his friend, and therefore promised to be still, but no sooner did the swimmer approach him than he again grappled with him. 'I must save myself; I leave you to your fate;' so saying, the strong swimmer shook himself free from the drowning man, and made for the shore. All hope left the poor fellow, and he sank insensible to the bottom. This was his friend's chance for saving him. He dived after him, and because he was helpless, soon got him ashore. This is just a picture of what the despairing sinner does; and it is only when he gives up struggling, and leaves himself to the power of the omnipotent Saviour to save him, that he will be rescued from sin and hell."

THE PROPHETIC INDICATIONS OF THE PAST YEAR.

THE year now closed has been full of interest and suggestiveness to the devout Christian, who in the unfoldings of Providence recognizes confirmatory testimony of the truth of God's Word. The "signs of the end" have been multiplying thick and fast. Uneasiness is a marked characteristic of the times. "Men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming upon the earth." A crash is felt to be inevitable and imminent. The politics of the nations, the universal preparation for war, the sensitiveness of governments, the aspirations of treasonable men, the condition of commerce, the state of the Church of Christ, and the general laxity of social and domestic influences and restraints, all go to indicate in the clearest possible manner the rapidly nearing approach of the predicted end. This view derives additional confirmation from the fact that the 1260 years of Popery and Mohammedanism, and the 6000 years since the Creation, terminate within the next few years.

In addition to the conviction forced upon the mind by these grave symptoms, there are other phenomena whose intelligent consideration must not be overlooked. The departed year has been one of

in a marked degree. Natural phenomena have become strangely and impressively didactic, and their awe-inspiring lessons he who runs may read. Human lives have been sacrificed by earthquake, tornadoes, and cholera, to a most startling number—nearly 3000 perishing in the Ischia disaster alone, more than 20,000 in the Java cataclysm, and over 50,000 by cholera in India and Egypt. The death roll of the year has thus been swollen by violent and extraordinary causes to a terrible extent. "As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be at the coming of the Son of Man." "The whole earth was then full of violence," and so now deeds of violence, the work of lawless men, in addition to these catastrophes of creation, reckless outrages and atrocities, dynamite and assassination conspiracies, whether by Fenians, Nihilists, or Socialists, are multiplying.

But, passing by the conflicting passions, and antagonistic rivalries of men and nations, and the convulsions and throes of nature as if in the agony of a new birth, the condition and aspect of clearly assure us that "our redemption draweth nigh." Not that the world has yet been converted by Christian agency, as some unwarrantably anticipate, for "evil men and seducers wax worse and worse," and "in the last days perilous times shall come," but there is a growing number of God's children who are girding up their loins, trimming their lamps, and assuming a watchful and expectant attitude in reference to the speedy Second Coming of Christ, laboring, meanwhile, with the greater self-sacrifice and earnestness to bring men to the Saviour ere the curtain of the present dispensation falls, and

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Public Debt was Reduced during the month of December by nearly twelve million dollars. Deducting the cash in the Treasury, it now amounts to less than a billion and a half. Fifty-three millions have been paid off since July 1st. It is evident from these figures that the reduction made in the revenue by the Forty-seventh Congress did not produce the results expected. It was said at the time that the reduction in customs would be forty millions, and the internal taxes thirty-five millions. The actual reduction has been at a lower rate from both sources than thirty-five millions or less than one half the estimate. When the sinking fund was first established it was enacted that one per cent annually should be paid off, but that law has been disregarded. It is estimated that seven hundred millions more than the law required have been paid off. It may be hoped now that Congress will consider the claims of the taxpayers to relief.

The Report of the Six Months' Work of the Civil Service Commission is stated to be ready for presentation. Its details have not yet been divulged, though the anxiety felt both by friends and opponents of the measure has been in some measure satisfied. An authoritative communication declares that the report will prove highly satisfactory to those who worked for the passage of the law creating the commission. It will show that the result of the Commissioners' labors thus far has demonstrated the entire practicability of the present law, as well as its efficiency. So well have its provisions accomplished their purpose, indeed, that the Commissioners will probably not recommend any changes in the law of any kind. They desire nothing taken from or added to the law as it stands, experience having satisfied them that it works well as it is. Their only wish is to be allowed to go on performing their duties without needless interference.

The Plan for Distributing Surplus Revenue among the States, advocated by Mr. Wharton Barker and indorsed by the Pennsylvania Republican Convention, is to be submitted to Congress in a bill prepared under Mr. Barker's direction. It provides that money which shall remain in the Treasury at the expiration of each quarter of every fiscal year, after reserving a sum not exceeding $50,000,000 beyond the appropriations or payments for the quarter, shall be divided by the Secretary of the Treasury into two equal portions, to be distributed among the States designated by law to receive the sums. He is to pay one portion to the States named in the proportion which the number of persons of the age of twenty-one years and unable to read in each State bears to the number of such persons in all the States collectively, as shown by the national census last taken. The remaining portion shall be distributed in the same manner for the extinction of State, county, and municipal debt or in the relief of State, county, and municipal taxation required for the cost of State and local government. The plan has been ridiculed in many sections of the country, even by Republicans, but a vigorous effort will be made to secure its adoption.

Another Effort is to be Made in Ohio to Pass a prohibition amendment to the Constitution. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has prepared and sent to the local branches for signature the following petition to the legislature: "The undersigned, in full belief that the second or prohibitory amendment submitted by the late legislature to the vote of the people on October 9th, 1883, received a majority of the ballots cast, which, for reasons unmentioned, were not recorded, most respectfully and earnestly urge upon your honorable body the propriety and equity of submitting to the vote of the people a single proposition to so amend the Constitution that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage shall be forever prohibited within the State, and should the amendment be adopted on the second Tuesday of October, 1885, that the legislature upon that day elected shall at its first session enact a law for the enforcement of such amendment." Another petition prays the legislature to make temperance teaching in the common schools compulsory.

Herr Edward Lasker, the Eminent German Liberal statesman, died suddenly in New York on the night of January 3d. He had been at a small dinner party at the house of Mr. Jesse W. Seligman, the banker, and on leaving it, apparently in good health and spirits, he started to walk to the house where he boarded. An acquaintance who accompanied him observed that he became silent after walking a few blocks, and appeared to be unwell. Herr Lasker, however, would not allow a carriage to be called. He became worse, and before reaching his home he died. It is supposed that his death was due to apoplexy, but as that is only an assumption an autopsy will be made. The deceased statesman was in his fifty-fifth year. He arrived in this country last June, and travelled extensively, studying our free institutions. He was the leader of the Liberal party in Germany, and the most determined opponent of the oppressive officialism that weighs on that country. He intended to return to Germany in time to take his seat in parliament at its opening. His death will be a severe loss to the cause of progress in Germany.

Many Projects for the Relief of Lieutenant Greely and his party have been submitted to the board organized to arrange the expedition. That of Captain George E. Tyson, of the Hall Arctic Expedition, appears to find most favor with the board. He advises that a steamer of 300 tons be secured, ready to sail early enough in June to arrive in the arctic seas by July. He would endeavor to reach Cape York, and, not finding the missing men there, push on to Littleton Island, hunting along the coast as far as the weather would permit. If Greely should not be at Littleton Island he would cross to the west coast. There he would have two whaleboats fitted out and proceed northward from the point where the ice was encountered. He would not in any event put the ship into the ice. The boats should make the trip to Lady Franklin Bay, and return in about fifteen days. He advises that the boats be strongly built, with a three-inch keel, and provided with a shoe, so they could be hauled over the ice, if the crew were suddenly called upon to jump on the floe. Captain Tyson expressed the opinion that if Lieutenant Greely and party were well they would be found at Littleton Island. He probably had suffered some, but it would hardly compare with the hardships of the nineteen persons who were floating six months and a half on the ice. There is abundance of game during the winter at Littleton Island. Even without fuel, if they can get plenty of animal food, they will not suffer seriously from cold.

A Terrific Railroad Crash Occurred near Toronto on January 2d. A train containing about fifty working men, drawn by a dummy engine collided with a special freight train. The shock when the engines met was terrific. The dummy was telescoped through the car following it until it reached the rear platform. The ponderous freight engine leaped on top of the wreck, grinding the smaller engine to atoms, and literally cutting to pieces the unfortunate occupants of the car. To add to the horrors of the scene, the boiler of the dummy exploded, and the live coals from the engine and stoves in the cars ignited the débris. Thirty passengers were killed and the other twenty were seriously and some fatally injured. The conductor of the freight train said that he and the engineer, who was making his first trip on the road, had completely forgotten the train into which they ran.

An Encouraging Feature of New Year's calls this year is mentioned by the Washington Evening Star. In an interview with a reporter of that journal, a prominent wine merchant said: "There has been very little drinking this New Year. Usually we sell a great deal of champagne, sherry, catawba and other wines for the New Year receptions, but this year the sales have been very light—at least twenty per cent lighter than last year. How do I account for it? Oh, it's brought about by this big cry of temperance, which is being raised all over the country, I suppose. It is getting so now that people are ashamed to offer wine to a caller, and if it is offered a man feels that he is staking his reputation by accepting it. Ladies who have wine on their private table every day are afraid to have it on New Year, because of the stigma that temperance people attach to it; and men who are steady drinkers will refuse wine at a reception on a plea of temperance. Why, I was making a few calls New Year, and at but one place was I offered a glass of wine, and there the lady offered it with a sort of apologetic air. A man whom I know to be a hard drinker—a man who gets on long sprees, happened there at the same time and got himself in high favor by refusing the wine and asking for water No, there was not near as much liquor sold this year as usual—that is, not for the New Year receptions. Chocolate, tea, and coffee were served nearly everywhere." It would be better to have people become abstainers from principle, but it is a step in advance to have drinking become unfashionable.

Many Applications have been Made through the office of this journal to Mrs. M. F. Shipman to conduct services in various parts of the country. She has not been able to respond to them all, but has requested that her thanks be tendered here to those who have written her. She is this week conducting services at Greenpoint, L. I. Next week she goes to Park Avenue Church, Brooklyn, for two weeks, and after that to Classon Avenue Church. At the close of the Brooklyn services she has arranged to make a tour among the churches in Pennsylvania, which will occupy her time until June 4th. On June 7th she intends sailing for England. She hopes to return to America in September. Applications for her services subsequent to that date may be sent to this office, and we will forward them to her.

Revival Services at the Brooklyn Tabernacle are being conducted this week by Mr. and Mrs. Clark Willson, whose portraits appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 13th, 1882. Mrs. Willson is the sister of the late Mr. P. P. Bliss, the author of "Hold the Fort." The services conducted by herself and her husband in various parts of the country have been the means of the conversion of thousands of souls.

Traffic was Delayed by Soap in Georgia recently. It appears that some silly practical joker, who has hitherto had the good fortune to escape the idiot asylum, resides near Waycross, Ga. On Christmas day he put five bars of soap in the tank from which the engines on the Brunswick and Waycross Railroad obtain their water. The engineer of the night express train filled up with the soapy water, and soapy water will not make steam. So the engine was laid up on the track without steam or the power to make it until another engine could be sent out to pull the former train and engine onward. Satan, when he is alarmed by the progress of a church or an individual soul, often has recourse to similar tactics. A very little mixture of pride or worldliness will paralyze the power which comes from complete dependence on God (Gal. 5 : 7–9).

The Boycotting of Daily Newspapers which have a Sunday issue, as the majority of daily papers do have, was recommended by the Philadelphia Methodist Preachers' Association at its meeting on December 24th. The association, with seven dissentients, adopted a report of its committee on Sabbath, which said: "Your committee most sincerely deprecates the circulation of Sunday newspapers and the fearful demoralization they occasion in many Christian families, where they take the place of the Word of God and good wholesome reading. We are also of the opinion that Sabbath desecration is fearfully increased by the issue of papers on Sunday. It becomes a serious question whether Christians can consistently patronize the papers on Monday that publish a Sunday edition." There is no doubt that if all Christians were to adopt the suggestion the Sunday issues would become unprofitable and gradually be discontinued.

A Demented Lady's Occupation has Excited some curiosity in Williamsburgh, N. Y. Every morning about eight o'clock she has been seen going to the Fifth Street bridge, and looking down into the creek for some time. Then she throws small pieces of paper into the stream and goes away. A policeman, who was asked about her, said: "We watched the poor woman some time. Grief has unsettled her mind. Some years ago a relative making his way across the meadows from Greenpoint wandered into the creek and, sticking in the mud, was unable to get out. The tide arose and he was drowned. The woman goes to the bridge to pray, and drops the pieces of paper into the water in the belief that they will indicate the right way to the bridge for any unfortunate who may chance to get into the mud." The poor creature uses a futile method, but the motive that prompts her deserves respect, and it ought to animate every Christian mind. We ought to be always busy throwing out indications that may guide the poor sinner, held fast in the mire and quicksand of his iniquity, to the spiritual bridge by which alone he can attain safety (Ezek. 33 : 7).

A Bishop in a Fish Wagon Arrived Recently at an hotel in Geneseo, N. Y. The Geneseo Republic says the journey came at the close of a day of mishaps. The Bishop had arranged to go to Geneseo to confirm a class of communicants, and was given at Avon a seat in the last car of the train from Rochester. He stepped off to attend to his baggage, but on his return boarded the next to the last car, and fell into conversation with a friend. He did not realize that he was speeding away in the wrong direction, till almost to Livonia Station, where he left the train, secured a conveyance, and started for Geneseo. When he reached there he found the exercises were under way. The Bishop, in the basement, ready to go up-stairs, wished some drinking water to dilute a few drops of ammonia, which he takes as a preventive against colds. No one but the organ pumper could be found. This individual was busy, and left his post for the water only on condition that the Bishop should take his place at the handle. Still another vexation awaited him. At the conclusion of the services, through some misunderstanding, the carriage to convey the Bishop to the house of his hostess did not appear, and the only conveyance procurable was a fish wagon. After starting from the church the horse broke into a rapid run, turned in at the yard of an hotel, and stopped. It was afterward discovered that the bridle was broken, so that had the horse chosen, nothing could have prevented a runaway. The editor trusts that this series of annoyances "may not deter the Bishop from visiting the place again." If the Bishop fully realizes the responsibilities and duties of his office he will not allow a fear of petty vexations to interfere with his movements. It is, however, these little trials that test the temper and patience of the Christian (James 1 : 3).

An Interesting Address was Recently Delivered in Farwell Hall, Chicago, at the Medical Mission Convention called by the Y. M. C. A. to impress medical students and others with the need of medical missionaries in China and other lands. Mr. James Cameron, of the China Inland Mission, was the speaker. He has travelled all through China, having spent seven years in doing so, and while there becoming a Chinese in every way, eating and sleeping with them, wearing their clothing, even to his pigtail. The physical suffering that he saw there has led him to come to New York City to qualify as a medical man and return to China. He narrated many very striking instances of how the way, which had been closed to missionaries, had been opened up to them by medical or surgical aid being given. Dr. Dowknott, of the New York Medical Mission, is rendering assistance to Dr. H. M. Scudder, Jr., in the work of founding a medical mission in Chicago similar to the one he conducts in New York.

A Dog's Long Journey by Scent is Described in a Chicago journal. It states that a farmer named Barber, on removing from Ashtabula, Ohio, to Lyndon, Wis., left behind him with the people who rented his farm, a dog, which was supposed to be of no value. A year afterward, late one night, Mr. Barber heard a dog whining and scratching at the door of his home in Wisconsin, and, on getting up and opening his door, what was his astonishment to see the little dog he had left in Ohio jump upon him with joy and lick his hands. He was so interested in the matter that he wrote to Ashtabula to find out how the dog could have discovered him. The reply stated that the people to whom he had given the dog had removed to Wisconsin, taking the dog with them. They arrived at Sheboygan, Wis, on a day when Mr. Barber also visited that city, but he did not see them. The dog, however, must have come across the track of his former master in the street, and so have traced him to his home, sixteen miles away. Those who call Jesus "Master" have ample directions how they may follow in His steps (John 13 : 13–15).

A Mountain was Split in Two, from Summit to base, in Alaska, during the recent volcanic disturbances. The report of the strange phenomenon given to the press by Professor Davidson, of San Francisco, states that the first indication of the disturbance was a heavy report, and some fishermen on English Bay, looking in the direction from whence the sound came, saw huge volumes of smoke and flame burst from the summit of Mount Augustin. They afterward saw large quantities of pummice-dust fall, and there were several earthquake waves in the bay, one of which was thirty feet high. The mountain, which is always covered with snow, became quite bare. Upon examination after the disturbances had subsided, it was found that the mountain had been split in two, from base to summit, and that the northern slope had fallen to the level of the surrounding cliffs. Simultaneously with the eruption a new island made its appearance in the passage between Chernaboura Island and the mainland. It was seventy-five feet high and a mile and a half long. The past year has been remarkable for natural phenomena of a marvellous character, and this is one of the most marvellous. Students of prophecy will remember that just such an event is to occur at the final consummation (Zech. 14 : 4).

THE TOP OF THE LADDER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."—EPHESIANS 3 : 19.

The Lower Rounds of the Ladder—Strengthening Necessary—Afterward Habitation—Then Establishment—Comprehension of Christ's Love—I. To Know the Love—People we Know—Bowing Acquaintances—Those we Know Best—Members of the Household—An All-pervading Perfume—II. Knowing so as to be Filled—Knowledge Producing Folly—Satisfying Knowledge—The Furniture Christ Brings—III. What it is to be Filled—IV. Overflowing Intended—Empty Prayers—The Company of Full Christians—A Profane Liar Reproved.

THIS is a part of Paul's prayer for the Ephesian believers. It is the closing clause and consummation of it. It mentions the grandest boon for which he prayed. His prayer was like that ladder which Jacob saw, the top whereof did reach to heaven and God, and the apostle at the foot of it was not asleep, but looking up with eager eyes, and marking each rising round of light. Be it ours by sweet experience to ascend that staircase of light. May the Holy Ghost reveal it to us even now!

THE RUNGS.

You must begin to read at the fourteenth verse. "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that"—this is one rung of the ladder. "That He would grant you, according to the riches of His glory, to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man; that"—here comes the second rung: one step helps you to reach the next; you are strengthened that you may rise higher and enjoy a further privilege. "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that"—this is the third rung. Oh, that the Holy Ghost may help you at once to take a firm footing upon it! "That ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge." Surely we are at the top of the ladder now, are we not? What a height! How glorious is the view! How solid the standing! How exhilarating the sense of communion with all saints and with the Lord of saints! Yet this is not the top of it. Here is another step—"that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."

You see that the prayer begins with the gracious petition that

WE MAY BE STRENGTHENED—

"strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man, according to the riches of His glory; the object being, that Christ may dwell in our hearts by faith. Before the Lord can dwell in us we must be strengthened—mentally and spiritually strengthened. To entertain the high and holy One—to receive into our soul the indwelling Christ—it is necessary that the temple be strengthened, that there be more power put into every pillar and into every stone of the edifice. It is taken for granted that we have already been washed and cleansed, and so made fit for Christ to come and dwell within us. But we need also to be strengthened; for, unless we become stronger in all spiritual life, how is Christ to dwell in our hearts by faith? Unless we become stronger in love, and in all the graces of the Spirit, how can we worthily entertain such a guest as the Lord Jesus?

Oh, brethren, everything has to be done for us; for, even when we are made clean enough for Christ to enter us, we are not strong enough. Even when the Lord has taken away the defilement, so that no longer "sin lieth at the door" to shut Him out, yet even then we are too feeble to entertain so great a guest. Paul, therefore, begins his requests for the Ephesians with a prayer for more strength for their inner man. Let us pray it to-night—"O Holy Spirit, strengthen my feeble mind, that I may be able to receive more of my Lord. Give me more capacity; give me a clearer perception; give me a better memory; give me an intenser affection; give me a larger faith." This is the first prayer—that you may be strengthened according to the riches of His glory, with might by His Spirit in the inner man. Be eager for this; plead now with all your hearts for me and for yourselves, that we may all be strengthened by the power of the Spirit of our God.

Now, having stood on the first step of the ladder, Paul goes on to pray that, when we are strengthened,

WE MAY BE INHABITED:

that Christ may dwell in our hearts by faith. When the house is ready to receive Him, and strong enough for such a wondrous inhabitant, may Jesus come, not to look about Him as He did when He went into the temple—for we read that He looked round about Him with indignation, and did not remain there—but may He come on purpose to abide with us; not to tarry for a night and give us some transient visits of His love, sweet as that would be, but "that Christ may dwell in our hearts by faith." This will make you living temples for the indwelling Lord. Be not afraid to ask, and seek, and believe for this; the ladder is meant to be climbed; this experience is attainable: Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith. This second step of the ladder is worth reaching. Rise to it, ye struggling believers! The Lord bring us all to it by the Holy Ghost!

And when we climb thus far, what next?

THIS THIRD STEP

is a broad one, and it has three parts to it. Its first part is establishment—"That ye, being rooted and grounded in love." When you are strengthened, and when Jesus dwells in your heart, then you are no longer "carried about with every wind of doctrine," but you are rooted, like a cedar in Lebanon which receives but recks not of the stormy wind. You are no longer upset by doubts and fears, as a bowing wall is thrown over by a breeze; for you are grounded, like a well-built house, settled on its rocky foundation. Your wall has made its last settlement, and has settled down upon the eternal foundation which can never be removed, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." No man attains to this rooted and grounded state unless Christ dwells in his heart.

Side by side with this very blessed establishment in the faith, for which I would bow my knee, as Paul did for the Ephesians, that you may all have it, comes a comprehension of divine love. We would have you receive this further blessing—namely, a comprehension of the love of Christ: "that ye may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;" that you may have no crude idea, but a clear and definite understanding of what the love of Christ is to you. As an arithmetician makes calculations and arrives at clear ideas, as a mechanic cubes a quantity and takes its length, and depth, and height, so may the Lord Jesus Christ's love be to you no more an airy dream, but a substantial fact, about which you know distinctly, being taught of the living God by the Holy Spirit. Oh, beloved, this is a delightful thing: first, to be strengthened, then to have Christ dwelling in you, and then to begin to know the measure of His unmeasurable love. This is to be taught of God, when you are able to speak of height, depth, length, breadth, and so see the Saviour's love to be a tangible, real, practical, efficient thing.

Do not overlook the third part of this subject, which is "that you may know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge,"—that you may have acquaintance with that love which can never be fully known. This is the subject upon which I would briefly descant, taking the whole verse as a step that leads to another step: "That ye may know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that"—and now we come to the top step of all—"that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."

Here are four things to talk about—to know the love of Christ; secondly, to know it so as to be filled with all the fulness of God; thirdly, to be filled with the fulness of God; and then, fourthly, being full, what then? Does not that mean that when we are full we shall overflow to the glory of Him who filled us? God grant that we may! May the fulness of Jesus be glorified by our holy and useful outpourings!

I. First, then,

of Christ. Observe that Paul was not praying for people who did not know the love of Christ in the ordinary acceptation of the term. They did know it; they had heard all about it from himself; they had read about it in his epistles and in other gracious records. They knew the whole story of the love of Christ through apostolic teaching. Ay, and they knew it by faith, too. They had believed in the Lord Jesus Christ unto the salvation of their souls, so that in the first verse of this epistle he calls them "saints which are at Ephesus, and the faithful in Christ Jesus."

What does he mean by his prayer that they might know the love of Christ? He intended another kind of knowledge. I know very many people; that is to say, I have read about them; I have heard of them; I have seen them in the street, and they touch their hats to me, and I do the same to them; and thus I know them. This is a slender form of knowledge; yet I fear it is the kind of knowledge which most men have of Christ. They have seen Him; they have looked to Him, and, blessed be His name, there is life in a look, but they have gone no further. Even such a knowledge as that which comes by trembling faith is a knowledge that saves.

But I will tell you the people I know best. They live with me in my own house: I see them every day, I am on the most familiar terms with them: this is the knowledge here intended. Read our text again. "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith," and then—"that you may know the love of Christ." Is not this the best way of knowing it? Jesus resides in your heart, which is the centre of your love, and then you know His love. He teaches you to love Him, and, as you learn the sweet lesson, you begin to know how Jesus loves you. You come to know Him by personal acquaintance, by having Christ dwelling in you so that you see Him, hear Him, feel His touch, and enjoy His blessed company. This kind of knowledge is the most precious of all knowledge, be the subject what it may.

"We cannot be certain of anything," says some one. Well, perhaps you cannot. But the man who has Christ dwelling in him says, "There is one thing of, and that is the love of Christ to me. I am assured of the loveliness of His character and the affection of His heart; I perceive that He Himself is love; and I am equally clear, since He has come to live with me, that He loves me, for He would not have lived in my heart at all if He had not loved me. He would not cheer and encourage me; He would not rebuke and chasten me, as He does, if He did not love me. He gives me every proof of His love, and therefore I am sure of it. I will have no question raised; or if you raise it, you will kindly understand that I do not raise it; for I have come to this, that I know the love of Christ."

You see, then, the way in which we come by our knowledge, and the certainty there is in it, and the sweetness of the subject; I shall have to show you, as we go on, the efficacy of this knowledge; for when we know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge, it follows ere-long that we come to be filled with all the fulness of God. Here is a sweet perfume brought into a man's house. For substance it seems to be a little thing: it can lie on his finger. Wait a few minutes, and it has actually filled the room. Every one exclaims, "What sweetness!" The fragrance perfumes all the chamber. They open the door: the delicious scent is in the passage, it has gone upstairs into every bedroom, till the fragrance is diffused through all the house, and if you open a window it invades the street and charms the passer-by. If the love of Christ is really known in the soul it is like a precious box of rarest aromatics; it diffuses itself till it fills our entire being.

II. We must dwell a minute on that round of the ladder to which we have ascended—to know

SO AS TO BE FILLED.

It is not every kind of knowledge that will fill a man. Many forms of knowledge make a man more empty than he was before. The knowledge of earthly luxuries tends to make a man hunger for them, and so a new vacuum is created in his mind. When he perceives that there is this or that delight to be had, then he becomes discontented till he gets it, and so he is emptier than he was before. Much of human knowledge is described by the Apostle thus, "Knowledge puffeth up; but love buildeth up." Sometimes the more men know the greater fools they become; for knowledge is not wisdom, though wisdom cannot be without knowledge. Knowledge in the hands of a fool is but a means of publishing his folly. Wisdom is the flower which grows out of knowledge; but all knowledge does not bear that flower: much of it is barren.

Brethren, if you get a knowledge of Christ's love, it is a filling knowledge, for it contents the soul. When a man knows the love of Christ to him, every part of his being is satisfied. We are made up, as it were, of a number of horseleeches, every one of which cries, "Give, give." Here is the heart craving for something to love. Oh, but when you love Christ, you have a heart's love that will satisfy you for all time! Where can such sweetness be? Your heart shall never go a-hungering again. His charms shall hold you fast. There is the intellect: what a horseleech it is! It is ever craving for more—more certainty, more novelty, more wonder; but when the intellect comes to know Christ it acknowledges that in Him dwelleth all wisdom.

Again, when the soul comes to enjoy Christ it is filled in a most emphatic sense. It is not merely satisfied, but overjoyed. One said to me the other day, "I am sure that you have a contented heart." "Well," I replied, "if I were pinched with poverty you might talk of my contentment; but God blesses me so richly that I have passed beyond mere contentment, I have all things and abound. I feel as if I can bless God all day long." Christ's people are not merely safe and contented, they are filled; and well they may be, for there is enough in Christ for millions, and yet He is altogether ours. He has given Himself to us as a glorious whole. A little patrimony may make a man contented, but what shall we say when our heritage is Christ Himself? Contented? Why, our heart leaps as we survey our infinite portion.

"In the heavenly Lamb thrice happy I am;
And my heart it doth dance at the sound of His name."

When you live in the full enjoyment of the Lord's presence and abide under a sense of His love, you feel more happy than tongue can tell. Your heart is too full to hold: it is like a vessel wanting vent; it possesses a joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Once more, when the love of Christ comes to work upon the soul, when it brings with it all its choice treasures, then the mind of the believer is filled with the fulness of God. What is it that the love of Christ gives to the objects of it? Let me ask another question. What is it which is worth having that it does not give? He gives us light for our darkness, eyes for our blindness, food for our hunger, cleansing for our defilement, garments for our nakedness, healing for our sickness. He gives us strength for our weakness, joy for our sorrow, comfort for our distress, deliverance for our peril, and triumph for our conflict.

When Jesus comes to dwell in the heart, He brings with Him such furniture, such provision, that our entire nature is equipped, furnished, provided for; in a word, "filled with all the fulness of God." Christ does not long dwell in an unfurnished house. Oh, you that have a poor, poverty-stricken religion of which you have to say, like the elder brother in the parable, "These many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends;" I beseech you, say so no more. Come, brother, alter that tune, and hear what the great Father says: "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." If Christ dwells in your heart, His Father is your Father, His God is your God, His heaven is your heaven; ay, and His throne shall be your throne, for He will make you to sit where He sits at the right hand of God in glory. Oh, the blessedness of knowing the love of Christ! It fills the spirit to the full.

III. In a sentence or two I will pass over the third point, namely,

WHAT IT IS TO BE FILLED with all the fulness of God. Does it not mean that self is banished; for if the fulness of God has filled you, where is room for self? Does it not mean that the soul is perfectly charmed with all that God does for it? "Filled with all the fulness of God." Does it not mean that every power of the entire nature is solaced and satisfied? Does it not mean that the whole man is occupied and inhabited by God—that the whole nature becomes permeated with grace, saturated with love, satisfied with favor, and full of the goodness of the Lord? I will not talk more of it at this time. I hope that you will know by experience what that fulness means, if you do not know it already. May the Holy Ghost give you this glad experience!

OVERFLOWING INTENDED.

IV. I want to come to the practical point—that wherever Christ dwells in the heart by faith we receive the fulness of God into our spirit, with the design that we may overflow. Brothers, sisters, you know what it is to be empty, I dare say. Have you ever tried to pray when you are empty? Yes, and the result is a very empty prayer. "Out of nothing comes nothing;" and when there is no prayer in you, and you pray, why, it is no prayer at all. You try to praise, but if there is no praise in you, your attempted hallelujahs languish and expire. If true praise comes forth from you, it must first have been within you. But do you know what it is to pray when you are full of prayer? When the Lord has filled you with hungerings, and thirstings, and desires, and hopes, and expectations, what an overflowing of prayer is with you! When the season of prayer is over, and you go down to business, you cry, "Alas, I never knew a quarter of an hour fly so quickly as this has done! How refreshed I am! I made no effort to pray, but I poured out my soul like water before the Lord." Yes, because you have been filled with all the fulness of God, therefore you have prayed readily and with fulness.

And, dear brethren, when you are all full of divine grace, you are filled for all the circumstances of life. You have lately buried a greatly-beloved one. The news came upon you on a sudden, but you were not afraid of evil tidings. Why? Because your heart was "fixed trusting in the Lord." When the sad bereavement came it did not overwhelm you; at another time it might have done so, but the Lord was pleased so to fill you with His presence that you were quite

To-morrow morning if you go into the world filled with the fulness of God, afflictions may come in business: perhaps an extra heavy account will be sent in, and you will be perplexed as to how to meet it: but you will not mind it. you will be ready for the difficulty because the fulness of God will ballast you and save you from the rough winds. Perhaps to-morrow you will meet with a great success, and if you are not full of grace you will grow proud and lifted up; but if you are filled with all the fulness of God, if the Lord should make you as rich as Solomon you would not grow worldly.

If you are filled with all the fulness of God you are as ready for prosperity as you are for adversity, and whatever happens to you in the future you will be prepared for it. If you are called upon to confess His name, if you are filled with all the fulness of God, courage will be yours; and if you are called to endure great suffering, patience will be ready, for the God of patience will grant you strength equal to your need. If a knotty problem poses you, and you are filled with God's wisdom, you will work it out. If you go forth filled with God, you are provided for every emergency. Come calamity or prosperity, whatever shape the temptation may assume, if the love of Christ has filled you with the fulness of God, you are ready for it.

It is a privilege to be in the company of full saints, just as it is a misery to hear the clatter of empty professors. It is said that we English people feel delighted if we sit by the side of a lord; this I know, that if I get into the company of one of and have a quarter of an hour's talk with him, and a little prayer as well, I feel quite lifted up. My heart is glad within me when I see the grace of God abundant in a brother. I want you, brethren, to be full of sympathy, full of pity, full of mercy, full of wisdom; and when your brethren hear you speak they will be as men who have found running springs and filled up their vessels.

Lastily, if the love of Jesus Christ be in us so that we are filled with all the fulness of God, how ready we shall be to meet common folk that are not the Lord's people as yet! We shall have a word on wheels for all who cross our path. You find it difficult to get the right word at the right time when you are talking to seekers. Just so, brother; but may not that be because you are not full up to the brim? You are nearly empty, and it takes you a long time to turn your tub up and pour out the little drop which lurks at the bottom. If you were full up to the brim you would run over on all sides, and all around you there would be a holy moisture. If you are so full of spiritual life that you cannot help running over, you will by the Holy Spirit's power pour out the right expressions when they are needed, and thirsty souls will receive of the living water.

If we are quite full we may move about among ungodly men, and our presence will be a benediction to them. I read the other day of one who heard a man swear and tell a lie at the same time. He did not say anything; but the swearer was aware that the listener was aware of his falsehood. The reprover fixed his eye on the false-speaker, and was silent: that glance went to the other's heart, for it said more than a dozen hard names. What the reprover did not say had more power than what he might have said. Be zealous for the Lord, and He will tell you what to do, and guide you how to do it, if you are only full of His life.

If anybody is saying, "This is out of my line; I have not come as far as this," I know it is so. I have not been talking to you. Yet I will not be altogether silent to you. Look to Jesus Christ at once, and you shall be saved. Trust Him, trust Him wholly. By faith you will begin to live. After you begin to live, you will be strengthened by the Spirit of the Lord. After you are strengthened Christ will dwell in your heart. After Christ has dwelt in your heart, you shall know the love that passeth knowledge; and after that you know the love that passeth knowledge, you shall be filled with all the fulness of God. Do not begin at the end, but take things according to God's order. A man who wishes to climb a ladder does not expect to put his foot upon the top round at the first step; he ascends by degrees. There is your first round—"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Take that first step at once. May the Lord help you! Beginning with faith in Jesus, you shall persevere, and ascend till you reach the top of the ladder. The Lord be with you and in you to the full! Amen and Amen.

Mr. Spurgeon, who is now Recuperating at Mentone, has addressed the following letter to his church, congregation, and readers: "Your affectionate interest in me is not satisfied unless I send a short note during my absence; and on my part it is a great pleasure to communicate with you. When I left home I felt utterly spent both in body and mind, and this last form of exhaustion was conducting me down into those depressions which render life a burden. But already the load is gone. I am rested and restored, and now the days are spent in reading and meditation, and the gathering of stores for future use—this performed in a way which fills but does not strain the mind. I am deeply grateful for this quiet resting-place, and I ask your prayers that I may return, in due time, in good order for another year's service. Thirty years' labor in a position which tests all my powers, and drives me to draw from the divine strength, has not been without its wear and tear with me. A while longer I hope I may be permitted to take my part in the Lord's service. If I may have His presence, and your patient love, I shall count myself thrice happy. May the blessing of the Most High God rest upon all my helpers in the Lord's work."

EMILE COOK ENCOURAGING SEAMEN.

THE late M. Emile Cook, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 31st, 1883, was pastor of a French Church in Paris. He visited this country in September, 1873, as a deputation to the Evangelical Alliance which held its sessions that year in New York. Having taken a prominent part in the meetings of the Alliance, M. Cook spent two months in making a tour through the country to collect money for the maintenance of his mission-work in France.

On the 15th of November the pastor, eager to rejoin his friends in France, again took ship on board the Ville du Havre. The first Sunday of the voyage is memorable for a children's service conducted by M. Cook, the last Sunday-school lesson ever given by him. Before another Sunday, all the children but one little girl of nine had been called into eternity. At two o'clock on the following Saturday morning occurred the collision with the Loch Earn. The cry of "Escape who can! We are sinking!" resounded through the vessel. A noble but ineffectual effort to save a mother who would not leave her child, a last momentary interview with his friend M. Pronier, the Swiss Delegate, and Emile Cook and all the living freight of the Ville du Havre were battling with the waves.

Seizing a floating piece of wood, the pastor swam toward the Loch Earn, whose black outline was dimly discernible. Soon his spar was snatched from him, and after a brief struggle his strength failed, and he had resigned himself to death, when he was rescued by a lifeboat which placed him on board the Loch Earn, in company with eighty-six others, the only survivors out of the three hundred and thirteen who had left America in the Ville du Havre. In a few days the passengers and crew of the Ville du Havre were received on board an American vessel.

Though the injuries sustained by the Loch Earn placed all on board in imminent peril, Emile Cook refused to leave the vessel, preferring to stay in order that he might nurse his fellow Delegate, M. Weiss, who was too ill to be moved. The situation became daily more critical. On the 25th a violent storm arose, which raged so furiously for three days, that hope was abandoned by all but Emile Cook. His faith in ultimate deliverance never wavered and he went about among the sailors cheering the downcast and despairing men, and stimulating them to renewed efforts. On the 28th his faith was rewarded by the appearance of a sail. An hour later, the passengers and crew of the Loch Earn were on the deck of the British Queen. Then the grateful sailors surrounded Mr. Cook: "It is thanks to your prayers that we are saved," said they, warmly grasping his hand; "we owe our deliverance to you, you have been our Providence."

It was not long after his rescue from the double shipwreck that the devoted pastor went to his reward. The anxiety, exposure, and protracted suffering he endured on shipboard had undermined his delicate constitution, and in spite of medical care and assiduous nursing he died on January 29th, 1874.

JOHN OWEN'S CONVERSION.

IT was Saturday night, and John Owen was sitting in the parlor of his cosey flat in a quiet uptown street in New York, enjoying a welcome rest. He had his slippers on, he was seated in his own easy chair, and was reading his Evening Post. It was a well-earned rest, for John Owen was foreman of a large machine shop in Water Street, and he had plenty of occupation and a large share of the anxieties and cares of the business. He often said he had been happier when only an ordinary workman, responsible only for the jobs his own hands performed. But two years ago he took to himself a wife, and the extra twenty dollars a week added to his salary when he was made foreman enabled him to marry and yet continue his deposits in the savings bank. A little stranger was now added to the family, and John Owen was a proud and happy man. Presently a young and comely lady entered from the next room, with baby in her arms. Drawing a chair close to her husband's, she sat down. "Baby is so wakeful to-night," she said, "I am tired of sitting with him, so I've brought him in here, if you will have us, for company."

"Glad to have you both, my dear," John said, looking lovingly on the two beings he loved best in all the world, and thinking what a pretty picture mother and baby made together. "What a bright little fellow he grows, Mamie; I don't consider myself a judge of babies, but I think he is the prettiest in the city. He has your eyes, Mamie, and I believe he'll be just like you as he gets older."

Mamie was pleased with the compliment, the more so as it proved that John was in a loving mood, and consequently that the time was a propitious one for asking a favor. And Mamie wanted John to do something for her which she knew would be disagreeable to him. She nestled close up to him, and held baby up for a kiss, and then raised her own face for a caress.

"What is it, little woman?" said John, whose brief marital experience warned him that a request was on its way. "A new bonnet, eh? or a new hat for baby? Which is it? I know you are going to ask for something.

"O John! how can you say so? I'm sure I don't ask you for something every time I kiss you. But I do want something to-night, but it isn't a new bonnet. John, dear, I should so like you to take baby and me to church to-morrow. You have not been there this ever so long. You know you said you would take me to the theatre to-night if I would go. I did not want to go there, but you would make me real happy by taking me to church to-morrow instead."

"Ah! but that is a very different thing. I should have enjoyed the theatre myself, but I don't enjoy church. I don't believe in one half I hear there to begin with, and the other half I don't care about. I had rather take you to the Park or to one of the concerts."

"But, John dear, I asked you to go to please me, not to please yourself. It is for my sake, and you always said there was nothing you would not do for my sake. Do say yes, there's a kind darling."

"I must say yes when you ask like that," said John submissively, "but I wish you wanted something else. It makes me sick to listen to those preachers. The last time I went, the doctor spoke of some one who was dead as having gone straight to heaven. I wonder how he knows what becomes of a man when he is dead. No one ever came back to say what happens on the other side. And he threatened us with hell-fire if we did not believe all that is in the Bible. All the threats in the world could not make me believe. If my boss were to say iron was steel, and threaten to discharge me if I did not believe it, I could not do it. I might call it steel to please him, but I could not believe it was—and it's the same with the doctor's preaching."

"Never mind that, John, I want you to go, and I am glad you've consented," said Mamie with a gentle tone of reminder, fearful that John was drifting into a line of talk that might cause him to forget that he had consented.

John went to church, however, the next day. It was a long time since he had been there, and no weaker influence than his wife's love could have taken him there. To Mamie's delight the preacher had no abstract message to deliver. He preached Christ, the Saviour of men, almighty to save from the power and the punishment of sin. She saw with inexpressible thankfulness that her husband's attention was arrested, and she prayed silently that he might be drawn by the Holy Spirit's influence.

On the way home John Owen was unusually quiet. He was not in the captious mood which had come over him before, on the rare occasions of his going to church. "That man knows more about the world than any preacher I ever heard," was John's comment, when he did speak. "I see misery and degradation enough to make an honest man's heart bleed every day of the week. I never thought of religion as a remedy for it. When I have thought of baby and the ordeal he will have to face if he lives, I have trembled for him; it would comfort me very much if I knew that he could be protected in his struggle. That preacher believes Jesus is alive and able and willing to take care of the weak and tempted. I should like to have a talk with him. Say, Mamie, what would you give me if I went to church again to-night."

That little bargain was satisfactorily settled in the coin a loving wife always has on hand, and for the first time in his life John went to church twice in one day. The sermon was on the Prodigal Son, the most touching and powerful of the parables. John listened earnestly, and his heart was touched. The love of God melted a heart that had smiled contemptuously at threats.

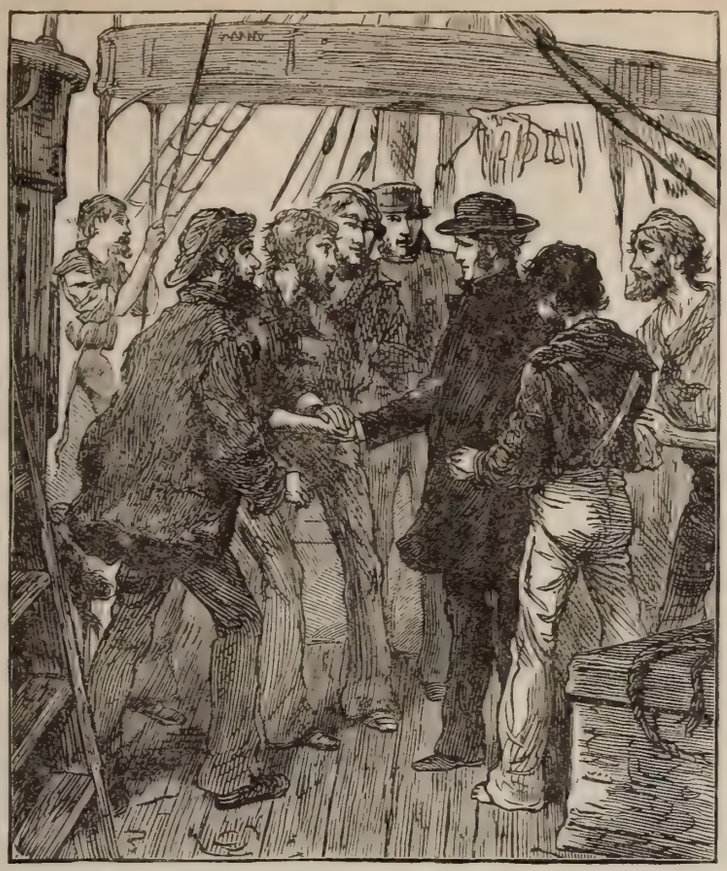
Mamie took care that John should have the interview he had desired with the preacher, and at its close she heard him say, "I will arise and go to my Father." The men in the machine-shop soon learned with astonishment that the foreman had become a Christian. He was not less scrupulous nor exact in his superintendence, but the erring and the fallen, instead of a curse, received kindly sympathy and encouragement to reform, and were pointed to the one and only cure for sin-sick souls.

How many a godless man might be saved himself and become a blessing to his family and to the world, if Christian wives did their duty with tact and kindness.

THE ENGINEER'S ROMANTIC MARRIAGE.

"MARRIED man, sir? Yes, I'm married," said the engineer in reply to the question of a gentleman who had accepted an invitation to do the next stage of his journey in the engine-cab. "My being married was what you might call a romantic affair. I'll tell you how it came about.

"Three years ago I was one of the men as little likely to be married as any one you could mention. I was working then, so as I had my evenings off, and my last trip left me at a place where there was plenty of amusements going on. Being a single man and earning good wages I could afford to enjoy myself, and I spent all I earned. Sometimes I went to a theatre, sometimes with a few friends I went the round of the museums and variety shows, or we would go to a beer garden and have a game of cards or billiards, but every night we had fun of some sort. Well, sir, I wasn't a drinking man, but I soon found a whiskey sour or a cocktail agreed with me very well, and when everybody else was drinking around it seemed sociable to drink too. It wasn't an effort to drink at first, and after a time I found it propped me up, and I needed it to keep away low spirits and steady my nerves in the morning, especially if we had been keeping it up late the night before. It was not exactly a fast life, because I worked hard all day, but I know well enough now that I was on a down grade.



Pastor Emile Cook Thanked by the Sailors. (See page 27.)

"A curious fancy got into my head along of a circumstance that occurred in the course of my duty. One day in the summer in turning a curve I was looking out of the cab window, when I noticed two children in the grass beside the track. A boy about ten years old was sitting down waving his cap to me and a little girl, apparently a year or so younger, was standing behind him, looking at us intently as we passed. They were pretty children I could see, though I only caught a momentary glimpse of them. Well, sir, the next day there they were again, and so every day for a month. I began to take quite an interest in the children for being so regular and punctual, and I always nodded to them and blew a kiss that way. One Saturday before I started, I bought a little box of candies, feeling so sure of seeing them, and there, sure enough they were at their usual place, and I just threw it out so as it dropped quite close to them. It came to be a regular thing after that, every Saturday to buy the candies, and the children were there every day, and they used to clap their hands when they saw me coming. I never had a chance to speak to them, but I got to love those children like friends.

"One day the boy was at the usual spot alone, and you can't think how worried I was thinking about his sister and wondering how it was she wasn't there. Well, the boy came regularly alone for two weeks, but not his sister, and I got so curious about it that I believe, if I had had a day off I should have travelled to the place to find out about it. One day I looked out as usual at the usual place, and there with the boy was a lady with my little girl on her lap looking so pale and thin. She must have been very ill, but when she saw me she clapped her little hands, and pointed to me for her mother to see. I just blew the gentlest whistle I could, to let her know I was glad to see her.

"Well, sir, to make a long story short, this little acquaintance kept up all that summer, and I never got a chance to find out any more about them, and when the winter days came it was dark when I passed the curve, and so I suppose they did not come. That winter was the turning-point in my life. Stepping off the engine one night I put my foot on some ice and fell and broke my leg. It seemed a bad misfortune at the time, but it was the greatest blessing ever happened to me. In the hospital I had as nurse a real, earnest Christian woman, who was so kind and sympathetic that I told her all about my life, and she would not be content till I had signed the pledge and become a Christian. It seemed to me as if she was an old friend; even her face seemed familiar, but I didn't get the secret till I was well and went to see her at her home. I went to ask her to be my wife, for I had learned that she was a widow with two children, whom she supported by her work in the hospital. Well, sir, the first thing I saw when I went there, was the identical little girl that had so interested me in the summer, and when she saw me she just clapped her hands, and called out, 'Mamma, mamma, here's our engineer!' I had her in my arms in a minute, and soon after the boy came in and clambered on my knee, and it was with those two like that, that I asked their mother to marry me. I doubt if ever a marriage was proposed like that before. Anyhow, I never heard of it.

"That's why I call it romantic, sir. But it's the best day's work I ever did. I've never tasted a drop of liquor, nor been in a theatre or a beer garden since. Ours is a Christian home, sir, and I'm thankful to say God has blessed us in it. No man has a more loving wife or more affectionate children; but the best of all is that God has given me a new heart, and I find more happiness in serving Him than I ever did in the days of what my mates call pleasure.

"Well, sir, here we are. Yes, you may tell my story as often as you like. Perhaps it will do some young fellow good and keep him from wasting his life."

A SERIAL STORY.

Plotting Revenge.

VICTORIA'S eyes — which were very soft, compassionate eyes—filled with tears as she thought of all the sin and misery existing in the great city; and she turned her face half-way from Mr. Dudley, looking sorrowfully toward the sunny west, where the purple smoke of London hung in the sky.

"Did you ever read all through the Gospel of St. Luke, sir?" she asked.

"To be sure, Victoria," he replied.

"Then you've read how, when Jesus was come near the city, He looked at it, and wept over it. 'Wept' means real crying, doesn't it?"

"Yes," he answered.

"Then Jesus cried over London," she went on. "That was real crying, I know. He only saw the city once, and then He wept over it. I'm thinkin' of that."

"Ah! the city!" he repeated. "Yes! 'He beheld the city, and wept over it.' Those are the words, Victoria."

"Yes," she said.

"It's true of London," he continued; "as true as it ever was of any city in the world. And, after Jesus had wept over it, He said, 'If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes.'"

He stood up, and looked, as she was doing, westward, at the cloud of dim-colored purple hanging over the city, with the golden beams of the sun already tingeing it with crimson light. He knew well—but knew also that not a hundredth part was known to Him—what untold sorrows and sins lay underneath that cloud; what ignorance and degradation and crime were stalking in visible forms along its streets. He thought of the jails and the workhouses being enlarged from time to time for the upspringing and yet unborn generations of criminals and paupers, which would eat away its glory and its strength. And, from the very depths of his heart, he cried, "Would to God thou wouldst learn, in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace!"

They returned home in a steamer chartered for the purpose of conveying all the guests of the Cleopatra. As they dropped away from the training-ship, they were followed by the sound of music. The boys clambered up into the shrouds, and stood along the gunwale and on every point where there was foothold, waving their shining hats, and cheering vociferously, as their guests departed. Bess never took her eyes from the ship, and from Roger standing amid his mates, as long as she could see them. It had been a wonderful day, a day to remember as long as she lived. But, oh! if David had been there as well as Roger!

Their first landing-place was London Bridge. It was already growing dusk, and the lamps were lit; and as she looked up she fancied she saw David's sad, despairing face leaning over the parapet above, and gazing down upon her. But, when she looked again, he was gone.

It was months before Mr. Dudley could learn anything of David; and then he discovered him in jail again for theft of a more serious character. He obtained permission to visit him, and had a long interview with him; and left, promising to be his friend. When his term was up, Mr. Dudley found him lodgings, and did his best to find him work; but there was no remunerative work to be procured for him, and he was now utterly averse to hard labor with poor pay.

It was more than three years since his first committal to prison; and he had learned one lesson so well there, that he was no longer willing to bear with starvation or excessive toil. He had nothing to lose by being a thief, except his liberty; and his liberty was equally forfeit if he gave himself to unintermittent labor. His sole ambition now was to thieve so skilfully as to defy the vigilance of his enemies the police.

There was at least one point of good left in him. He would not hear where Bess was living, and begged Mr. Dudley not to tell her of his lost condition. "Let me go down to hell alone," he said. "I'm not afeared of it; but I don't want to see little Bess there." It was in vain that Mr. Dudley reasoned with him, and entreated him to try again. How could he try again? Would anything ever alter the shameful fact that he had been several times in jail? or would any effort take away his name from the terrible list of habitual criminals kept by the police? The name his father bore and his mother loved—David Fell—was inscribed there.

"This is a condemned world," he said; and Mr. Dudley did not know what to answer. It was well for Bess that Mr. Dudley kept David's secret, and said nothing to her of his failure in trying to redeem him. Roger had entered the merchant-service, and was serving before the mast in a sailing-vessel that went long voyages, and came into London docks but seldom. When he was on shore, his home was always at Mrs. Linnett's, where old Euclid took a pride in him as being a lad saved from destruction through his mediation. Yet there was always a little dread mingled with his welcome visits lest Blackett should come across his son, and so discover the shelter they had found from his hatred and revenge.

It had become a standing joke at the market, and among Euclid's oldest and familiar customers, that the old water-cress-seller must have come into a fortune, so changed was he. He looked as if the old bent in his shoulders was growing straighter, and his bowed-down head more erect. The linen blouse he had always worn as his outer garment was no longer ragged or dirty; and in the winter a warm, though threadbare, greatcoat took its place.

He had become a very independent buyer, and most fastidious in his choice of cresses. No fear now that he must put up with any cresses gone yellow at the edges, or spotted on the bright green leaf. He could pay for the best; and the saleswomen knew that he would have the best. He could afford to give more liberal and larger bunches; and his wrinkled face did not fall into abject disappointment if he was asked to give credit for a day or two. He was quite another being from the stooping, shuffling, poverty-stricken, decrepit old man, who had been wont to cry, "Cre-she! cre-she!" in a hoarse and mournful voice along the streets.

It was the home he and Victoria had found which did it. There was a nourishing warmth in the sense of friendship and fellow-feeling which surrounded him there. Mrs. Linnett's cheery ways, and Mr. Dudley's kindly interest in them, made him feel that they were no longer alone in the battle of life. If he fell on the battle-field, Victoria would not be trampled under foot in its fierce conflict. There was the same hard toil for him; the chilly mornings of winter were no warmer; but the world appeared quite another place to him, for his heart was no longer heavy, nor his spirit cast down.

It had been strongly urged upon Roger by Mr. Dudley, and by his teachers on board the Cleopatra, that he must replace the money he had formerly stolen from Euclid. This purpose became a secret between him and Bess and Mrs. Linnett, who delighted in innocent surprises. When the sum was completed, on his return from his second voyage, he and Bess tied it up in an old handkerchief, and placed it under Victoria's pillow, where her Testament was often laid now, that she might be reading it in the early light of the morning, as soon as Bess and her father began to stir. Victoria's hand, groping for her little book, grasped the old, well-remembered parcel of hard money, and she screamed, "Father! father!" till Euclid appeared at the door, looking in with a terrified face.

"It's the money for my coffin come again!" she cried, bursting into tears.

"No, no!" said Bess, between laughing and crying; "it's the money as Roger stole, every penny of it, saved up to be given back to you, with his love! Oh Roger! tell them! tell them all about it!"

But Roger, who was standing behind Euclid at the door, could not utter a word. It felt to him a happier time even than when he had received his prizes, in the presence of all his mates, from the hands of a real lord. Old Euclid's face, bewildered and alarmed at first, changed into a joyous and radiant delight.

"Right to a penny!" he said. "Well done, Roger! But I don't know how we're to spend it, Victoria, my dear. It's not wanted for your buryin'."

"It's for her weddin' wi' Captain Upjohn!" called out Roger, with a chuckle of delight; while Euclid laughed hoarsely, and Mrs. Linnett joined him, as Victoria cried, "Father, shut the door."

It was true. Captain Upjohn, the master of a sloop trading to and from Sweden, and an old shipmate of Thomas Linnett, though many years younger, was about to make Victoria his wife. No fear now that she would ever have to rough it, little and tender as she was. Captain Upjohn would see to that; and he would see to old Euclid himself, and provide a home for him, when it was no longer possible for him to earn his own bread. There was some talk already of setting him up with a donkey-cart, and so putting him into a larger and more respectable way of living; for Captain Upjohn was a man who should have married in a higher rank than that of water-cress-sellers, and would have done it if he had not met with Victoria at Mrs. Linnett's, and thought so much of her as to forget her father's low estate.

Proud and happy beyond words was old Euclid when his last and only child, Victoria, was married, and he led her to church, her dear hand in his, to give her away to Captain Upjohn, instead of following her to the grave as he had followed her mother and all his other children. He knew the burial-service well, or rather he knew the ceremony of a funeral, for the words had made little impression on him; but a wedding was new to him. He could dimly remember what he said when he married Victoria's mother; and as Captain Upjohn and Victoria exchanged the same vows, he felt that he could be content to die that very moment.

"I should like her mother to know as Victoria's married!" was his speech at the feast Mrs. Linnett gave in her little kitchen.

They went down the river to Greenwich, and surely never was there such a day! Old Euclid declared he had never known one like it. Bess and Roger thought it was no brighter or warmer or happier than the one that had been spent on board the Cleopatra two summers before, but the other three were dead against them. Captain Upjohn maintained that there could be no question as to which day was the fairer one. Certainly no happier party ever strolled under the flitting shadows of the Spanish chestnut-trees in Greenwich Park, or ran down the slopes together, old Euclid himself running far in the rear with his shambling feet, and his gray hair blown about by the wind.

And the coming home again up the river, in the cool of the evening, with the soft chill of the breeze playing on their faces! Euclid sat very still and silent, with Victoria and her husband on one hand, and Bess, hardly less dear to him, and Roger, on the other. But his silence was the stillness and peacefulness of a happy old age, free now forevermore from all oppressive cares. To-morrow morning he would be up again at four o'clock, and go off to the market; but labor was no longer irksome to him. He was no longer drudging merely for a coffin and a grave. He was not now without hope and without God in the world.

They landed in the dusk, and brushed past an idler, who was lounging near the stage, watching the steamers come and go. But he started and stared as his eyes fell upon them, and with a stealthy step he dogged their way home. Not one of them looked back. No one suspected that they were followed, though he kept them in sight until he saw Mrs. Linnett watching for their return over the half-door of her little shop, and waving a white handkerchief to welcome them. Then he turned away, and sauntered homeward to the old place, where Euclid had saved and hoarded and lost the money which Roger had stolen.

"It's old Euclid!" he had muttered to himself, "and Victoria as grand as a lady, and little Bess; and who's the lad o' nineteen or so? Why, it must be Roger! my son Roger! And he's doing well, by his clothes! I'll be even wi' every one on 'em yet."

It was Blackett, indeed, who had followed them and who uttered that threat. He had not improved since he was last visible in these pages, and he had added to his guilt by tempting David Fell and making his degradation sure.

It was five years since the lad had first crossed the fatal threshold of the jail. He had graduated in crime; and, being neither a blockhead nor a lout, he had developed skill enough to transgress the laws, and yet evade the penalty. The untrained ability of an English artisan and the shrewd tact of a London lad had grown into the cunning and business-like adroitness of a confirmed criminal. The police knew him well by sight or report, but he had kept out of their hands for the last two years, in spite of much suspicion and many hairbreadth escapes from conviction. He was doing credit to the brotherhood which had been forced upon him—the brotherhood of thieves. There was no disgrace for him now, except the disgrace of being found out.

Blackett had drifted back to his old quarters after Roger's time was up on board the Cleopatra, and he was no longer liable to be called upon to pay a weekly contribution toward his maintenance. David had gone with him; for there was a lingering faithfulness in his nature, which attached him to the only fellow-man who had not turned his back upon him when he came out of jail. They had taken Euclid's old garret, which afforded good facilities for escape from a hot pursuit along the neighboring roofs. For a little while David had felt mournful—or, as Blackett called it, mopish—at finding himself back again in the self-same spot where he had taken care of Bess, and helped his mother in her dire struggle for life. But presently the slight impression wore off. Blackett made much of him. They shared and fared alike, and lived together as though they were father and son.

It was a merry thought to Blackett, that, if the magistrates had filched Roger from him, they had thrust David into his hands, who was worth twice as much as Roger. He had spirit and energy and brains. The clear-headed sense of the honest carpenter, his father, muddled neither by drink nor ignorance, had descended to David in a measure that set him far above the poor, idle, terrified Roger, who had always cowered away from Blackett's savagery. He dared not be savage with David, and his respect for him almost amounted to affection. He was uneasy and anxious when David was long absent, and a welcome was always ready for him when he made his appearance in the garret.

Blackett said nothing to David of the discovery he had made of Euclid's dwelling-place, and the fact that Bess shared it. Carefully disguised, he haunted the taverns in the neighborhood of Mrs. Linnett's shop, to pick up any information he could concerning Euclid or his own son Roger. It was not long before some sailors, coming in from a long voyage, fell into the trap he laid for them, and talked of the heaps of money left with Mrs. Linnett, and the numerous sea-chests, filled with valuable goods, which she took care of for absent seamen.

Roger was gone to sea again, and Captain Upjohn had taken Victoria to visit his people at Portsmouth; so no one was left in the house but Bess and the two old people. It was a rare chance, if only he could get David to seize it.

There would be Euclid's hoards into the bargain; for Blackett had never ceased to believe he was a miser, who had untold money secreted in holes and corners, if they could only make him reveal his hiding-places. But would David do it? There was an irresistible fascination to Blackett in the thought of at last fulfilling his threats, and wreaking his vengeance upon Euclid.

"Old Euclid," he muttered contemptuously, "and Bess and a hold woman! I could almost manage 'em myself."

He set craftily to work upon David's imagination, describing the sea-chests in the old woman's room, and their contents, as if he had seen them; and the hoards of the miser, who carried bank-notes stitched into the lining of his waistcoat, over which he wore a ragged old blouse. He dared not tell David the name of the miser, nor mention Bess. There was a soft spot still in David's heart, and Blackett knew it. It had been a slack time of late, and all their ill-gotten gains were gone. There was no longer money to spend at the tavern, with its many attractions, at the corner of the street; and the garret was a miserable place to spend the whole day in. David was weary of having nothing to do, and there seemed no reason to him why he should not enter into Blackett's schemes.

THE POWER OF THE TONGUE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 20, James 3 : 1-18. Golden Text, Matt. 12 : 37. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Formidable Undertaking—David's Experience—Silence Breeding Despondency—Indispensable Qualities for the Perfect Man—The Tongue of the Self-occupied—The Spirit Revealed by the Tongue—The Harsh Spirit—The Perturbed Spirit—The Tongue as a Fire—The Contrast—The Tongue Surrendered—Divinely Used—The Tongue of the Wise—Its Characteristics—Gentleness and Mercy—The Practical Lesson—A Young Christian's Infirmity Overcome.

"DEATH and life are in the power of the tongue," says the wise man (Prov. 18 : 21). And our golden text says, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." If we were ourselves to undertake the management of this "little member" which boasteth great things, we might well shrink from the task, and be ready, like some of the old ascetics, to bury ourselves in deserts, away from all intercourse with man, lest this dangerous "power of the tongue" should be exercised to our own destruction or that of others. David tells us what his experience was in this matter. "I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue: I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me." But this plan did not answer, for in keeping his tongue from evil he kept it from good also, and refused the use of it to God. "I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good." Then he got into despondency; he says, "My sorrow was stirred, my heart was hot within me, while I was musing the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue" (Ps. 39 : 1-3). The pressure which he had put upon himself only produced uneasiness, as we see from the words which follow. But later on we find he had found a better Keeper, and says, "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth,

KEEP THE DOOR OF MY LIPS"

(Ps. 141 : 3).

James tells us that "if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." He had said before, "Let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James 1 : 4). This patience and a subject tongue are absolute necessities for God's perfect man. Oh how clearly this shows us that no self-power can tame the tongue; it is only a spirit tamed and conquered by God which manifests itself in

A CONSECRATED TONGUE.

There is nothing in which our spirit or the Spirit of God manifests itself so much as in our words. One who is full of self will unconsciously turn the conversation to himself; if the work of God is spoken of, he will be sure to mention that in which he himself is engaged. If some distinguished person is mentioned, he will be sure to say what he knows of him, what he has said to him, or repeat any remark which he has made about him. You see from his conversation that he is always thinking about himself, that the thought of himself is never absent; by his words he is condemned.

Let a man have a harsh, judging spirit, it is sure to leak out in what he says about others; there will be an asperity, an unfavorable way of looking at all which the other does: by his words he will be condemned as a hard man. Let a professing Christian be worldly, and attempt to talk religion with religious people: he will get hold of the very phraseology which they employ, but the wolf in sheep's clothing is sure to howl by and by, as soon as something personal is said, and by his words he will be condemned as worldly. Let a Christian talk of rest in Christ, and seek to explain the doctrine ever so clearly; then let some very vexatious thing happen—the soup be spilled over a new silk dress, the hack-driver cause the loss of a train on which some important engagement depends; the little words, "How tiresome! one can never depend on these drivers," betrays at once that the real rest is wanting.

a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course [or wheel] of nature; and it is set on fire of hell." Satan knows the power of the tongue; he knows what suffering and what sin may follow a few words spoken. Oh how many hearts have been broken by the tongue of another! Oh how many lives have been ruined, and souls lost by the deceitful tongue of one who persuaded that sin was not sin! How many a fair young life has been blasted, and driven into shame, despair, perhaps self-destruction, by listening to the satanic tongue of some deceiver, in whom she trusted! James declares that all the wild beasts can be tamed, and have been tamed of man, "but the tongue that is reserved for a mightier than man. One alone has lived of whom it is written, "who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth" (1 Pet. 2 : 22); and a tongue surrendered to Him may become a ceaseless fountain of blessing. James says, "Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be." And he goes on to show that a fountain cannot send forth at the same outlet sweet water and bitter. That which is within must come out; the fountain must be right, in order that that which proceeds from it may be right also. Paul says, "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers" (Eph. 4 : 29). Thus we see it is the Lord's will that we should be fountains of grace through the tongue, and ministers of blessing whenever we open our lips.

The Lord Jesus goes yet further, and tells His disciples, "when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak: For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. 10 : 19). Oh how great our tongues are either worlds of iniquity or channels of the Holy Ghost, according as we are possessed of self and open to the power of Satan, or yielded up, tongues and all, a living sacrifice to God, to be at His disposal! I have often heard it said of a man of God in Europe, "He speaks little, but one can never forget anything which he says." What is the secret of this? Not he speaks, but the Spirit of God in him. There are some people who cannot open their lips, but that they wound somebody; where is the love of God in these hearts? There are others who cannot speak many words before they have made every one feel at ease; a gleam of sunshine seems to have come into the room; sorrowful ones are comforted, dull ones are amused, lonely ones feel at home, those who have difficulties feel they can speak them out. What is the secret of this? Some would say, Natural amiability. No; for that will not stand a severe test, and cannot get on where it is not appreciated—it is "the love of God shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us" (Rom. 5 : 5); it is a man-surrendered,

GOD-USED TONGUE.

The apostle asks, "Who is a wise man and endued with knowledge among you? Let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom." He describes this "wisdom" (ver. 17), "The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated." Nature is always contentious, contradictious, inclined to take the contrary side; and this leads to hard words and wounded feelings; but God's wisdom is peaceable, inclined rather to agree than disagree; gentle, not by self-restraint, but instinctively; "easy to be intreated." Some people are very difficult to be intreated: you come to them with the conviction that they will naturally take the other side, and bristle all over like a porcupine; but ripe Christians are always so easy of access, easy to be intreated, the love side always toward one, and so gentle in showing why not, that one feels almost glad to have been in the wrong in order to be so sweetly put right again.

Then this wisdom which results in good conversation is "full of mercy and good fruits," always seeing the hopeful side of everybody and of everything, "without wrangling" [margin], willing to wait till God has opened the eyes of another rather than enter into any dispute, because he does not care to prove that he himself is in the right, and he knows God is quite able to bring the other one round, and so while full of mercy, he is "without hypocrisy," loving and thus winning those who differ. The reverse of this picture is "bitter envying and strife." From such a fountain the tongue sets on fire the wheel of nature, all the feelings and propensities of our animal part. "This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual [or natural], devilish"—three terrible degrees. And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace. Who are the peacemakers? Surely they whose tongues are bridled by God.

What, then, is the practical teaching of this lesson? Surely this: to abandon ourselves to the Lord without reserve, that all we are may serve His purpose, and that these dangerous instruments which we cannot tame, and which have already done so much evil, may in His hands become uninterrupted channels of blessing. But this is useless, unless we count upon the Lord's undertaking this thing. If we thus surrender ourselves, it is not into empty space, but into the all-powerful hands of our holy God, who says, "Behold I make all things new" (Rev. 21 : 5).

A YOUNG CHRISTIAN, who had been rather a wit when in the world, and very free with her tongue, was deeply convicted after her conversion of the sin of the tongue. She attempted to take the matter into her own hands, and succeeded in so mastering herself as to be noticed for her constrained silence. But from time to time she would break out into bitterer satire, more unkind remarks, or more foolish ones than ever she did while in the world. At last in self-despair she threw herself upon the Lord, and handed all over to Him. The result has been a blessed change, the Lord Himself making use of her, often most unexpectedly, and Himself restraining the old propensities. He waits to be trusted. Let us trust Him fully.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Tripartite Alliance between Germany, Austria, and Italy, was reported as existing early last year. Since the visit of the German Crown Prince to Rome the rumors have been revived. The European correspondent of the New York Herald now sends a cablegram confirming them on authority which, he states, is above suspicion. This alliance exists in writing, and bears the signatures of the Chancellors of the three Powers. Contrary to the general belief, however, in the event of hostilities between France and Germany, or Austria, or both, Italy, by a clause of the treaty, has been assured complete liberty of action, and is in no way pledged to join the two allies with arms. On the other hand, should France attack Italy, the latter may count on the help of Germany and Austria.

An Attempt to Assassinate the Czar of Russia is said to have been made on December 17th. It was known that since that date the Czar has been confined to his room by a severe injury, but it was given out that it had been caused by his sleigh being overturned. It is now stated that on December 17th the Czar was returning about three o'clock in the afternoon from a shooting excursion, accompanied by a suite in eight sledges with a number of servants. Although darkness was coming on, the party noticed on the road ahead six men apparently peasants. The Czar's aides-de-camp drove forward and ordered the men to clear out of the way. The men saluted the officers, and appeared to obey the order, but when the Czar's sledge came on a level with them they suddenly wheeled around and fired at the Czar thrice, and two of them ran toward him. The horses drawing the imperial sledge became frightened and galloped some hundred paces, when the Czar was thrown out of the sledge. He was found to have been shot in the shoulder—the wound being painful but not dangerous. The assassins escaped in the wood. The London Telegraph, commenting on this intelligence, says: "Whether this story is true or untrue, the revival of Nihilism is undoubted. The Nihilist Executive Committee promised to give the present Czar a fair trial. No constitution and no reforms have been granted, although he promised them. His trial is therefore at an end."

Details of the Murder, by Nihilists, of Colonel Sudeikin have been cabled. Four men were led to the room where he was sitting, by the trusted subordinate of the victim, and there, after a desperate struggle, in which the furniture of the room was completely wrecked, the colonel was murdered. A note was left by the perpetrators of the crime, stating that Count Tolstoi, Minister of the Interior, would be the next victim. The murder was committed in revenge for the arrest of Madame Wolkenstein, who went to Russia to organize a plot for the assassination of the Czar, and whom Colonel Sudeikin succeeded in capturing. The subordinate previously mentioned was known as Degaieff. He had been one of the most active agents of the government in causing the arrest of suspected persons, and was consequently admitted into the confidence of the government. It is now discovered that his real name is Jablonski, and that he has been a Nihilist all along, and his antipathy to the order was simulated in order to obtain information.

A Riot Occurred in Ireland at a Place called Dromore on New Year's day. Two meetings were held there, one by Orangemen and the other by the Nationalists, as the Land Leaguers now style themselves. The Orangemen arrived in special trains from Omagh and other places in large numbers. The Orange meeting was held in a field beside the parish church, from which a view could be had of the Nationalist meeting. There was a great deal of cheering and defiant shouting on both sides. Cavalry were drawn up on the roads to prevent the Orangemen from entering the town, and the Nationalists were prohibited from passing out of the town toward the Orangemen. In that way the parties were kept asunder. Above a thousand armed troops were needed to keep the two parties from fighting. After the close of the meeting, despite the efforts of the magistrates, the Orangemen, by a detour across the fields, came within a short distance of the Nationalists. A serious fight was waged between the two parties for some time, during which the cavalry and infantry charged several times, revolver shots were exchanged, stones were thrown and sticks were freely used. The fight ended only after the hussars and lancers had charged across the fields and wounded a number of Orangemen. The infantry, with fixed bayonets, escorted the Nationalists beyond the reach of the Orangemen. It would appear from this report that peace and contentment in Ireland would not be assured, even if home rule were secured.

The Falsity of O'Donnell's Defence was proved by a statement published in the United Ireland last week. That journal states that it was written by O'Donnell, who directed its publication, if all hope of saving his life had to be abandoned. The account shows that O'Donnell deliberately killed Carey. There was no struggle. Carey made no attack upon O'Donnell. Had Judge Denman permitted him to speak O'Donnell would have told the whole truth. O'Donnell was not acquainted with Carey on the voyage from England to the Cape of Good Hope. He recognized Carey by a woodcut which he saw at Cape Town, and he resolved to kill him. He intended to go with him to the farm at Port Elizabeth, which Carey had told him that he was going to take, and thus show that there was no spot where Carey could be safe. Finding himself, however, alone with Carey he could not resist the desire to kill him. He charged him with being Carey, and shot him. In spite of this confession the newspapers continue to speak of O'Donnell's execution as a murder.

A Threatening Letter from an Irish-American has been received by the Pope. The Rome correspondent of the Post says that the Pope's secretary, Mgr. Bacali, opened a letter from America addressed to "Leo XIII.," containing Fenian threats against the Pope should he continue to support England against the national cause in Ireland. The letter also states that the protection which the Italian Government gives the Pope, who is now the only sovereign who is safe from dynamite, will be of no avail against the operations of the Fenians. The Pope is warned that there are priests whom he is bound to receive who will obtain access to his presence and who will sustain the cause of the Irish against oppression.

The Outbreak of a General European War is apprehended by other observers besides those who are led to the expectation by the prophecies of God's Word. The subject was thus referred to by M. Ruchonnet, head of the Political Department in the Swiss Federal Council, in a speech delivered at a recent military banquet: "Be on your guard, and let the Swiss prepare to defend their country. Many black clouds are gathering upon the European political horizon. The war which has long been averted will hardly be escaped after next year, and even next spring may not pass without its advent."

A Panic Prevails in Egypt, Caused by the announcement that El Mahdi is preparing to make a descent from the Soudan. There is increasing evidence that the movement in his favor is spreading among the Egyptian people. Baker Pacha, who has been made Governor of the Soudan, is convinced that it is of a most formidable religio-political character. Nothing can be done at present, as an immediate advance would mean disaster. One thousand women and children, together with four hundred soldiers, are bravely holding out at Sinkat. Even with the promptest action on the part of England there will be barely time to save those people from a terrible fate. It is believed that there are 20,000 of El Mahdi's followers between Suakim and Sinkat, and his entire force is estimated at 100,000 men. Meanwhile quarrels are continually taking place between the English and Egyptian officers, and one of the former has been dismissed from the Egyptian service for striking a native officer. The Khedive insists that England shall either conquer the Soudan and capture El Mahdi or give place to Turkey or France, either of whom would undertake the task. This intimation will probably lead to an expedition composed of troops from India being sent against the False Prophet.

French Designs on Madagascar are Reported as being pressed in spite of the opposition of the Malagassy Government. M. Baudois, the agent of the French Government in the island, is endeavoring to negotiate a peace on the basis previously announced. He has informed M. Jules Ferry, the French Prime Minister, that the Malagassy Government has finally refused to pay the war indemnity of 10,000,000f. or to consent to the establishment of a French protectorate over the northern section of the island. Admiral Galiber and M. Baudois concur as to the necessity of despatching an expedition to the capital to dictate peace there.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are now Laboring at Clapham. The English papers contain encouraging reports of the success of the evangelists at Stepney, the scene of their recent labors, especially among non-church-goers. On most evenings there was a solid square of nearly a thousand such men and youths seated in places reserved by ticket for them directly in front of the evangelists. The women attended in considerable numbers at the afternoon Bible lectures. Everything was done to make the services known to the people. The band of workers connected with Stepney Church alone visited over twenty thousand houses in the parish. The evangelists began their work at Clapham on January 2d, and remain there until January 21st.

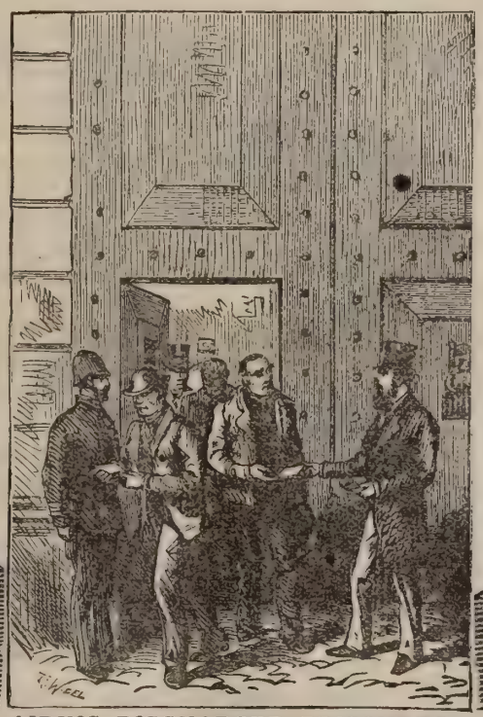
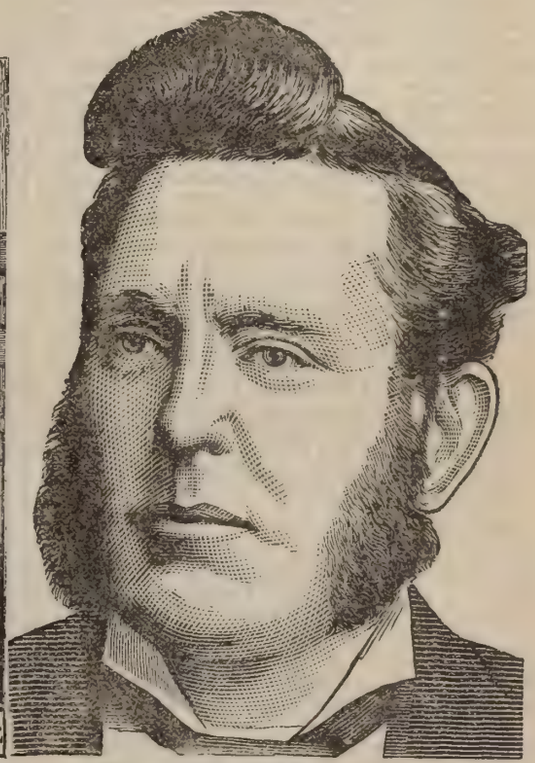
Mr. GEORGE HATTON.



AIDING DISCHARGED PRISONERS.



Mr. JOHN JAMES JONES.

Mr. George Hatton and Mr. John James Jones, the Friends of the Outcast Poor—Scenes in their Work.

TWO PHILANTHROPISTS.

"THE Bitter Cry of the Outcast Poor" has aroused, as we have mentioned under the head of Foreign Topics, a profound and widespread sensation on the other side the Atlantic. Until the pamphlet appeared, comparatively few among the wealthy and aristocratic classes had any idea how terrible was the misery existing among the very poor of London. The abject misery, the semi-starvation, the compulsory disregard of sanitary rules, and even of common decency incident to the lot of those poor creatures, was not known except to themselves.

Now, however, that the ghastly picture has been held up by Mr. Sims, the writer of the pamphlet, there has been a feeling of commiseration awakened, and a demand uttered that the government should do something to remedy a condition of affairs which Christian people rightly regard as a disgrace to them.

What the government may do it is impossible to surmise. That it will be able to devise an effectual remedy is too much to expect. Governments seldom succeed in such matters. More is to be hoped from private philanthropy, judiciously directed. The two men whose portraits appear on our first page this week are taking an active part in the matter, and if the wealthy Christians of England furnish them with the means, there is hope that great good may be accomplished by their efforts. Some account of what they have done and what they hope to do will interest our readers. It may also serve a useful purpose; for, although we have no such problem to solve now, as that existing in Europe, there is a vast amount of poverty in our great cities which it is possible to relieve before it attains the appalling proportions of the transatlantic evil. The sooner and the more earnestly we set to work upon it the more easily and effectually we may cope with it.

MR. GEORGE HATTON,

The Prisoners' Friend.

Born in 1840—The Means Used for His Conversion—Sunday and Ragged-School Work—Relief and Visitation of the Abject Poor—Growth of the Mission—Work among Discharged Prisoners—A Supper to Criminals.

MR. GEORGE HATTON, whose portrait accompanies that of Mr. Jones on our front page this week, was born in Chancery Lane, London, on February 1st, 1840, and is therefore now in the forty-fourth year of his age. His father was a law and general stationer, a man of sterling uprightness and integrity, while his mother was of a most amiable disposition, tenderly loved by her children, of whom there were seven.

Mr. Hatton received the elements of a good education at the City of London School. His first impressions of his need of Christ as a Saviour were experienced while he was quite a youth, in connection with the faithful ministry on which he attended; but before he became decided for Christ the minister died, and Mr. Hatton visited other London churches. One Sunday evening he visited Bloomsbury Chapel, to hear the late Rev. Dr. Brock. While standing in the crowded aisle he was addressed by an officer of the church, who with kindly courtesy gave him a seat in his pew. This completely captivated the youth's heart, and he continued to attend the chapel, until at a social meeting in the school-room in November, 1858, he realized his position before God and finally resolved, in the might of divine grace, to dedicate his life entirely to the Lord.

Immediately upon uniting with the church at Bloomsbury, Mr. Hatton commenced and spent some very delightful times with the young. One of the fruits of his class-teaching was the establishment of a prayer-meeting for children, which was held on Sunday afternoons after the school, and on Tuesday evenings, in the Bloomsbury Chapel. This was most successful, and God was pleased to pour out His Spirit in a wonderful manner, and large numbers of children gave evidence of conversion to God.

But at the close of the year, 1859, an overwhelming desire to do something to make known a Saviour's love among the poor of St. Giles's, the most degraded district in all London, took possession of him, and on the first Monday in 1860, some half-dozen young men, all belonging to the Baptist Church at Bloomsbury, met at Mr. Hatton's house to consider if something could not be done for them.

The outcome of this meeting was the formation of a society for the visitation and the relief of the poor; and it was arranged that the members should assemble in the same place every week, and each bring a small contribution to a relief fund. A secretary and treasurer were appointed, and a record was to be kept of the cases visited and relieved. In time a strong desire was felt for a meeting-place, a home for the converts, and an attraction for others who might be induced to attend on Sunday evenings. They procured a little room used by Bloomsbury friends, capable of holding fifty persons; but though they issued thousands of handbills, consisted of only six or seven elderly women. They toiled for years before it was filled with a regular congregation. At this station they continued three years; but in July, 1864, they hired a larger room. One day a letter was received from a church in the district offering them the free use of their building for their work, without any restrictions. They accepted the gift, put the premises in thorough repair, and made it their headquarters.

From July, 1864, to January, 1867, they were a branch of the Bloomsbury Chapel Domestic Mission; but since that time it has been a work of faith dependent entirely on the gifts which God might send them through the voluntary offerings of the public. The church was founded on March 21st, 1867, and the renovated chapel was opened by Mr. Spurgeon and the Earl of Shaftesbury on May 13th, 1874. The number of persons received into church-fellowship amount to very nearly 1000; while from the first the public have encouraged the work by subscribing $137,500 to the funds.

In February, 1877, Mr. Hatton and his friends were holding some special services in the chapel, and after an address by Joshua Poole, two men were deeply impressed. They were spoken to, and confessed to belonging to the criminal classes. They pleaded for work—wood-chopping or anything—if they could earn sixty cents a day they would be satisfied. They were started at wood-chopping underneath the hall, at King Street, and thus commenced the work among which is now so honorably associated with the name of Mr. Hatton. One of the men, who has abandoned a criminal life through the efforts of these Christian laborers, has been converted, and is now an evangelist, employed by a Member of Parliament. Soon after it was found necessary, in order to prevent the many men applying for assistance from falling back into their old course of crime, to provide a home for them, so as to keep them from their old associates. For this purpose, there was fitted up part of the building over a mission hall.

It soon became evident that to make Christian effort among this class really successful, that it would be necessary to secure the first five minutes with them after their release from prison, and before old companions could influence them. For this purpose Mr. Hatton hired a room close to the gates of the prison, immediately opposite the place of exit, where a breakfast was supplied to those released men who chose to accept the invitation that was given to each as he stepped from the prison. (See frontispiece picture between the portraits.)

While the men are at this breakfast, they are spoken to privately and individually, and those that give hope of an honest career in future are helped in such a manner as seems best for their permanent good. This branch of the work was commenced in May, 1878, since which time of the 42,460 prisoners released from Coldbath Fields Prison 22,897 accepted invitations to breakfast; and of those 9000 signed the total abstinence pledge. The following statistics of similar work at other prisons are taken from the records of the society: From Holloway Prison: Released, 9344; accepted invitations to breakfast, 5922; pledges, 2071. From Wandsworth Prison: Released, 915; breakfasted, 714; pledges, 335. Number of cases assisted, 4782, dealt with as follows: Sent to sea, 333; situations obtained on land for 873; sent to various institutions, 32; fares paid home, 177; sent abroad, 128; assisted with stock, tools, clothing, money, etc., 3239—4782. The numbers for the year ending November 30th, 1883, are as follows: Coldbath Fields Prison: Released, 6216; breakfasted, 3372; pledges, 870. Holloway Prison: Released, 5695; breakfasted, 3778; pledges, 1320. Wandsworth Prison: Released, 915; breakfasted, 714; pledges, 335. Number of cases dealt with, 1410, as follows: Sent to sea, 82; situations found on land for 206; sent abroad, 67; fares paid home, 50; assisted with stock, tools, clothing, money, etc., 1005—1410.

Noting the success which resulted from this effort at the prison gate in July, 1882, Mr. Hatton opened at Holloway Prison, in which were met the men discharged from that prison, and of the 5695 discharged since then, 3778 have received breakfast, and 1320 signed the pledge. On October 11th, 1883, further extension of the prison gate work was made, by the erection of an iron room just outside the gates of Wandsworth Prison, on ground kindly granted by the government. Here Mr. Hatton is carrying on a work similar to that at the jails mentioned above. The number of men hitherto discharged is 915, of whom 714 have been given a breakfast, and 335 signed the pledge. There are also other social and evangelistic agencies in full operation among both the adults and children of the locality.

A SUPPER TO CRIMINALS.

When Christmas draws near, it is the annual custom of the St. Giles's Christian Mission to invite two or three hundred known criminals to a supper, on the tacit understanding that they afterward remain to a meeting, at which, after singing and prayer, advice and exhortation are given to them, not only by preachers of the Gospel and Christian workers, but by judges, magistrates, heads of the police, governors of jails, and others who, having had to deal with their audience in the course of justice, are the more likely to command their thoughtful attention. For the seventh time this supper was given on the night of December 4th, 1883, in the Mission Chapel, when about 250 men and youths, mostly the former, sat down to a substantial meal of cold meat, bread, cheese, celery, Christmas pudding, and tea and coffee.

The supper commenced at half-past six, lasting one hour. Some addresses were afterward given to them. Mr. Baron Pollock, the veteran judge, presided, and among those present were many eminent lawyers well known to the criminal classes and several prison governors and chaplains. After prayer had been offered by a clergyman, in which the judge requested the criminals to join, the hymn was sung, "Rescue the Perishing," and Mr. Hatton read his report, the substance of which has been given. After which the secretary read some selections from letters of reformed criminals.

It is gratifying to learn from this report that the good seed sown amid discouragement and difficulty such as few can realize is bringing forth fruit. There are many who, leaving jail for the first time, could find though they seek it earnestly and with tears; now have the opportunity they seek. Instead of drifting helplessly into the ranks of habitual criminals through sheer inability to obtain an honest livelihood they may, if so minded, recover their lost position in society. It is impossible to imagine a more Christlike work than this of seeking those who are lost. We commend the example to energetic young Christians here who are seeking a sphere of labor for the Saviour.

Mr. JOHN JAMES JONES,

Director of the Samaritan Society.

Born in 1847—Converted at Mr. G. Müller's Chapel, Bristol—Early Evangelistic Work—Desires Foreign Missionary Work—Efforts among the Poor of London in 1875—The Samaritan Mission—Feeding and Clothing Children—Emigration Enterprise.

MR. JOHN JAMES JONES was born at Chepstow, England, in 1847, and is now, therefore, thirty-six years of age. His parents gave him the advantage of a good commercial education, and early instilled into his mind religious principles.

Having accepted a situation in a furnishing establishment in Bristol, Mr. Jones was induced to attend a religious service conducted by the

at Bethesda Chapel. His sympathy had previously been aroused in Mr. Müller's extraordinary work among orphan children, and the marvellous manner in which their sustenance was secured through faith and prayer, and he now had an irrepressible desire to see and hear the devoted man upon whom God had put such signal honor, and whose Orphanage constituted a fountain of blessing to thousands of destitute children. He went, but Mr. Müller was away from home, and his place was supplied by a substitute. The message of salvation which he proclaimed was directed by the Holy Spirit to the young man's heart, and he consecrated his life to God.

The first impulse of the new life influenced him to return home, and "tell what great things the Lord had done for his soul." Not long afterward he felt that God would have him abandon commercial pursuits and engage in evangelistic work. A series of services subsequently conducted by him, and at which many professed to find the Saviour, demonstrated the correctness of his conviction, and impelled him onward with a cheerful courage in the path of usefulness which Providence had marked out for him.

While Messrs. Moody and Sankey were holding their meetings in the East End of London, in 1875, Mr. Jones, who had gone to the metropolis to prepare himself for foreign missionary work, engaged in philanthropic labor, by collecting funds and

FEEDING THE DESTITUTE POOR.

His genius for organizing and executing large philanthropic enterprises was fully proved there. He established a permanent charity, which at first bore the title of the Homerton Mission, which in its now developed form is more appropriately termed through whose agency the sunshine of sympathy and help has brightened many homes that were darkened by the clouds of want and sorrow, and many hearts have been lightened of burdens that were well-nigh overwhelming and crushing them in despair.

During the winter months the society gives

RELIEF TO THE DESERVING POOR,

many thousands of whom drag out a precarious and weary existence. Under the best conditions there is always a large residuum of unrelieved poverty, whether from want of remunerative occupation or the presence of ill-health and disease; the grim spectre of want, with its attendant evils and sorrows, is always at the door, but is most importunate during the darkest and coldest months of the year. Consequently, to many of the poor and outcast ones who are gathered into various mission halls to hear the Gospel are most acceptable to those for whom they are provided. The Executive of the Society say truly, that "it seems little less than an idle mockery to press on these unhappy and unfortunate people the acceptance of a spiritual boon, while they are in lack of that which seems to them to touch them even more closely—the necessaries of life. We are more than ever convinced by our long experience that it is the truest wisdom, on the part of the Christian worker, to relieve the pressing necessities of the body while seeking to hold up Him who is the Bread and the Water of Life for all who hunger and thirst after that righteousness which gives acceptance in the sight of God." About 63,000 free meals have been given this winter.

SUNDAY MORNING FREE BREAKFASTS

FEEDING AND CLOTHING CHILDREN

is a department of the work that gives the most genuine satisfaction. In dealing with adults it is sometimes difficult to decide as to whether those who apply for bounty are really deserving of it, or whether, if granted, it would not be misapplied. Such difficulties and misgivings vanish when we come to consider the deplorable condition of many thousands of children of tender years who are but too familiar with the pangs of unsatisfied hunger, and with the discomforts of scanty and ragged attire for their poor pinched bodies. Whether or not the parents may be liable to blame, these suffering little ones are at least innocent, and it is felt that no work is more Christlike than the endeavor to relieve the needs and alleviate the sorrows of which these helpless little ones have more than a full share. A distribution of boots and clothing, which took place recently at the Evangelical Hall, is represented at the foot of the frontispiece.

The work of clothing the naked goes on every Saturday evening throughout the winter. From the worst hovels of London they come, and, with the pathetic patience of the very poor, sit and stand, quietly awaiting attention.

A valuable adjunct to the work of the Samaritan Society is a

by the sea at which the sick poor are received and nursed, either free of charge or at low rates as the case may demand. From June, 1882, to July, 1883, no fewer than 232 persons were admitted and cared for.

Another agency of this mission is evangelistic work at a hall where every Lord's day, the good news of the Gospel is proclaimed "without money and without price." From this centre also radiate branches of kindred work. Sunday-schools, Bible classes, bands of hope, Gospel temperance meetings, and similar efforts are made by mission workers specially appointed to make tours of visitation among omnibus and car-drivers, and other classes who are largely deprived of the stated means of grace by the special circumstances of their occupation.

THE EMIGRATION WORK,

initiated by Mr. Jones two years ago, has made rapid strides, and is assuming large and increasing proportions. The continued prevalence of commercial depression and agricultural distress in England, joined to the opening up of great tracts of virgin soil in Canada and Australia, and the demand for labor there, have all combined to bring the question of emigration to the front.

During the past three years the Samaritan Society has assisted about 4000 emigrants to Canada; 800 to the United States; 400 to the Australian Colonies, and nearly 100 to South Africa. Not a week passes, during the summer and autumn seasons, but a considerable party are despatched to some place where honest, intelligent labor will be welcome; and this department of the work promises to render most valuable and satisfactory service to the industrial classes of the community. Mr. Jones also endeavors to provide for destitute and neglected children by inducing farmers in Canada to receive them into their homes and care for them.

It will be seen that the charity in which Mr. Jones and his colleague Mr. Hatton believe, is not the charity which gives a quarter to some importunate beggar and then forgets him. That is not charity in the true sense of the word. The schemes we have described are intelligent, far-sighted, and sagacious. They take into account the future of the poor, and endeavor to render that future happy and independent. In short, they help the poor to help themselves. Above all, their work is associated, in fact, it is inspired, by love of God and trust in Him, and their constant effort is to bring the poor they help to trust in God for their eternal as well as their earthly future. Who can say how valuable lives spent in such service are to the world! Those who are giving up their years to frivolous pleasures may well contemplate such lives and pause.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Novel Way of Stopping a Train was adopted by a station agent in the South in a moment of dire emergency. He received late one night a telegram directing him to stop at his station, Sewanee, a freight train which did not usually stop there, and switch it on to a siding out of the way of a special. The night was dark and stormy, and the wind blew in gusts, driving the rain into every crack and crevice. The freight train was on time, and when the station agent heard the whistle he took his lantern and went out on the track. The headlight flashed down the rails, and, through the torrent of rain and the roaring wind, the train came thundering on. The agent raised his lantern and swung it across the track, but before the signal could be given, a fitful gust of wind put out the light. The train was not two hundred yards off, and had not slackened its speed. There was no time to get another lamp. It was a moment of horror to the poor agent, for the special, with its freight of passengers, was coming just beyond the town, and a collision, with all its attendant slaughter, seemed inevitable. Some men would have been unnerved in such a crisis, but the agent thought quickly. He thrust his hand into his pocket, and grasped his revolver; there was a flash, a sharp report, and a bullet went crashing through the headlight. The lamp was extinguished, and the engineer, alarmed by the crash, stopped his train, which was then switched off in time to avert a collision. The time will come when, looking back over our lives, we shall see that some apparent disasters were sent upon us to arrest us in a course which could have ended only in a dire catastrophe (Job 33 : 16–24).

A Search for a Lover on a Battlefield was Described by the lady who undertook the ghastly task, to a fellow-passenger in a train which years afterward carried them over the scene of the struggle. She lived in Memphis in 1861, and her lover was an officer in the Confederate army, but she removed to Kentucky when his regiment was engaged there. A battle occurred and one of the wounded soldiers, who managed to crawl back to hospital, told her he had seen her lover fall, as he supposed, mortally wounded. He described, as well as he could, the spot where he lay, and the lady instantly started out for the field. As she went, the deep roar of the guns told her the battle was still in progress. But she thought little of her own risk of being hit by a stray ball. She thought only of her lover who might be needing the restoratives she carried. She walked through lines of dead and dying men, scrutinizing each face, until at length she came upon the form she sought. To her intense relief he was alive, but appeared to be slowly bleeding to death. Quickly she stanched the blood, and bound up the wound. Then she gave him her restorative, and waited till he was strong enough to rise, and leaning on her he dragged his way off the field to the surgeon's quarters. There his wound was properly dressed, and he recovered. At the close of the war he became the husband of the heroic woman who had saved his life. People would not call that man a fanatic, however ardently he loved his wife; yet that is the epithet applied to Christians who give their lives to the service of Him who has rescued them from eternal death (1 Cor. 6 : 20).

A TRAGEDY AVERTED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 13, 1884.

"Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb?"—GENESIS 22: 7.

A Tender, Affectionate Father—His Heart in His Son—A Thunderbolt from a Clear Sky—Abraham's Soliloquy—The Awful Secret—The Day of Tragedy—The Early Morning Journey—The Disclosure—The Matchless Scene of the Wilderness—The Knife Raised—Where it Fell—The Lessons—Implicit Obedience—Help in the Last Pinch—A Decrepit Woman Climbing Stairs—Two Onlys—No Arrest on Calvary—Bearing the Symbolical Cross—The Weight of Worlds on it—Why He did not Resist—A Voluntary Sacrifice—The Doves of St. Mark's.

HERE are Abraham and Isaac: the one a kind, old, gracious, affectionate father; the other a brave, obedient, religious son. From his bronzed appearance you can tell that this son has been much in the fields, and from his shaggy dress you know that he has been watching the herds. The mountain air has painted his cheek rubicund. He is twenty, or twenty-five, or, as some suppose, thirty-three years of age; nevertheless a boy, considering the length of life to which people lived in those times, and the fact that a son never is anything but a boy to a father. I remember that my father used to come into the house when the children were home on some festal occasion, and say: "Where are the boys?" although "the boys" were twenty-five, and thirty, and thirty-five years of age. So this Isaac is only a boy to Abraham, and is in him. It is Isaac here and Isaac there. If there is any festivity around the father's tent, Isaac must enjoy it. It is Isaac's walk, and Isaac's apparel, and Isaac's manners, and Isaac's prospects, and Isaac's prosperity. The father's heart-strings are all wrapped around that boy, and wrapped again, until nine-tenths of the old man's life is in Isaac. I can just imagine how lovingly and proudly he looked at his only son.

Well, the dear old man had borne a great deal of trouble, and it had left its mark upon him. In hieroglyphics of wrinkle the story was written from forehead to chin. But now his trouble seems all gone, and we are glad that he is very soon to rest forever. If the old man shall get decrepit, Isaac is strong enough to wait on him. If the father get dim of eyesight, Isaac will lead him by the hand. If the father become destitute, Isaac will earn him bread. How glad we are that the ship that has been in such a stormy sea, is coming at last into the harbor. Are you not rejoiced that glorious old Abraham is through with his troubles? No! no!

A THUNDERBOLT.

From that clear Eastern sky there drops into that father's tent a voice with an announcement enough to turn black hair white, and to stun the patriarch into instant annihilation. God said: "Abraham!" The old man answered: "Here I am." God said to him: "Take thy son, thy only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there as a burnt-offering." In other words, Slay him; cut his body into fragments; put the fragments on the wood; set fire to the wood, and let Isaac's body be consumed to ashes.

"Cannibalism! Murder!" says some one. "Not so," said Abraham. I hear him soliloquize: "Here is the boy on whom I have depended — Oh, how I loved him! He was given in answer to prayer, and now must I surrender him? O Isaac, my son! Isaac, how shall I part with you? But then it is always safer to do as God asks me to; I have been in dark places before, and God got me out. I will implicitly do as God has told me, although it is very dark. I can't see my way, but I know God makes no mistakes, and to Him I commit myself and my darling son."

Early in the morning there is a stir around Abraham's tent. A beast of burden is fed and saddled. Abraham makes no disclosure of

THE AWFUL SECRET.

At the break of day he says: "Come, come, Isaac, get up! We are going off on a two or three days' journey." I hear the axe hewing and splitting amid the wood until the sticks are made the right length and the right thickness, and then they are fastened on the beast of burden. They pass on—there are four of them—Abraham, the father; Isaac, the son; and two servants. Going along the road, I see Isaac looking up into his father's face, and saying: "Father, what is the matter? Are you not well? Has anything happened? Are you tired? Lean on my arm." Then, turning around to the servants, the son says: "Ah! father is getting old, and he has had trouble enough in other days to kill him."

The third morning has come, and it is

THE DAY OF TRAGEDY.

The two servants are left with the beast of burden, while Abraham and his son Isaac, as was the custom of good people in those times, went up on the hill to sacrifice to the Lord. The wood is taken off the beast's back, and put on Isaac's back. Abraham has in one hand a pan of coals or a lamp, and in the other a sharp, keen knife. Here are all the appliances for sacrifice, you say. No, there is one thing wanting; there is no victim—no pigeon, or heifer, or lamb. Isaac, not knowing that he is to be the victim, looks up into his father's face, and asks a question which must have cut the old man to the bone: "My father!" The father said: "My son, Isaac, here I am." The son said: "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" The father's lip quivered, and his heart fainted, and his knees knocked together, and his entire body, mind, and soul shivered in sickening anguish as he struggles to gain equipoise; for he does not want to break down. And then he looks into his son's face, with a thousand rushing tendernesses, and says: "My son, God will provide Himself a lamb."

The twain are now at the foot of the hill, the place which is to be famous for

A MOST TRANSCENDENT OCCURRENCE.

They gather some stones out of the field, and build an altar of three and four feet high. Then they take this wood off Isaac's back and sprinkle it over the stones, so as to help and invite the flame. The altar is done—it is all done. Isaac has helped to build it. With his father he has discussed whether the top of the table is even, and whether the wood is properly prepared. Then there is a pause. The son looks around to see if there is not some living animal that can be caught and butchered for the offering. Abraham tries to choke down his fatherly feelings and suppress his grief, in order that he may break to his son the terrific news that he is to be the victim.

Ah! Isaac never looked more beautiful than on that day to his father. As the old man ran his emaciated fingers through his son's hair, he said to himself: "How shall I give him up? What will his mother say when I come back without my boy? I thought he would have been the comfort of my declining days. I thought he would have been the hope of ages to come. Beautiful and loving, and yet to die under my own hand. O God! is there not some other sacrifice that will do? Take my life, and spare his! Pour out my blood, and save Isaac for his mother and the world!" But this was an inward struggle. The father controls his feelings, and looks into his son's face, and says: "Isaac, must I tell you all?" His son said: "Yes, father. I thought you had something on your mind; tell it." The father said: "My son, Isaac, THOU ART THE LAMB!"

"Oh," you say, "why didn't that young man, if he was twenty or thirty years of age, smite into the dust his infirm father? He could have done it." Ah! Isaac knew by this time that the scene was typical of a Messiah who was to come, and so he made no struggle. They fell on each other's neck, and wailed out the parting. Awful and matchless scene of the wilderness! The rocks echo back the breaking of their hearts. The cry: "My son! my son!" The answer: "My father! my father!"

Do not compare this, as some people have, to Agamemnon, willing to offer up his daughter, Iphigenia, to please the gods. There is nothing comparable to this wonderful obedience to the true God. You know that victims for sacrifice were always bound, so that they might not struggle away. Rawlings, the martyr, when he was dying for Christ's sake, said to the blacksmith, who held the manacles: "Fasten those chains tight now, for my flesh may struggle mightily." So Isaac's arms are fastened, his feet are tied. The old man, rallying all his strength, lifts him on to a pile of wood. Fastening a thong on one side of the altar, he makes it span the body of Isaac, and fastens the thong at the other side the altar, and another thong, and another thong. There is the lamp flickering in the wind, ready to be put under the brushwood of the altar.

THERE IS THE KNIFE,

sharp and keen. Abraham—struggling with his mortal feelings on the one side, and the commands of God on the other—takes that knife, rubs the flat of it on the palm of his hand, cries to God for help, comes up to the side of the altar, puts a parting kiss on the brow of his boy, takes a message from him for mother and home, and then, lifting the glittering weapon for the plunge of the death-stroke—his muscles knitting for the work—the hand begins to descend. It falls! Not on the heart of Isaac, but on the arm of God, who arrests the stroke, making the wilderness quake with the cry: "Abraham! Abraham! lay not thy hand upon the lad, nor do him any harm!"

What is this sound back in the woods? It is a crackling as of tree branches, a bleating and a struggle. Go, Abraham, and see what it is. Oh, it was a ram that, going through the woods, has its crooked horns fastened and entangled in the brushwood, and could not get loose; and Abraham seizes it gladly, and quickly unloosens Isaac from the altar, puts the ram on in his place, sets the lamp under the brushwood of the altar, and as the dense smoke of begins to rise, the blood rolls down the sides of the altar, and drops hissing into the fire, and I hear the words: "Behold the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world."

Well, what are you going to get out of this? There is an aged minister of the Gospel. He says: "I should get out of it that when God tells you to do a thing, whether it seems reasonable to you or not, go ahead and do it. Here Abraham couldn't have been mistaken. God didn't speak so indistinctly that it was not certain whether He called Sarah, or Abimelech, or somebody else; but with divine articulation, divine intonation, divine emphasis, He said: 'Abraham!' Abraham rushed blindly ahead to do his duty, knowing that things would come out right. Likewise do so yourselves. There is

A MYSTERY OF YOUR LIFE.

There is some burden you have to carry. You don't know why God has put it on you. There is some persecution, some trial, and you don't know why God allows it. There is a work for you to do, and you have not enough grace, you think, to do it. Do as Abraham did. Advance, and do your whole duty. Be willing to give up Isaac, and perhaps you will not have to give up anything. 'Jehovah-jireh'—the Lord will provide." A capital lesson this old minister gives us.

Out yonder, in this house, is an aged woman; the light of heaven in her face; she is half-way through the door; she has her hand on the pearl of the gate. Mother, what would you get out of this subject? "Oh," she says, "I would learn that it is in the last pinch that God comes to the relief. You see the altar was ready, and Isaac was fastened on it, and the knife was lifted; and just at the last moment,

God broke in and stopped proceedings. So it has been in my life of seventy years. Why, sir, there was a time when the flour was all out of the house: and I set the table at noon and I had nothing to put on it; but five minutes of one o'clock a loaf of bread came. The Lord will provide.

"My son was very sick, and I said: 'Dear Lord, you don't mean to take him away from me, do you? Please, Lord, don't take him away. Why, there are neighbors who have three and four sons; this is my only son; this is my Isaac. Lord, you won't take him away from me, will you?' But I saw he was getting worse and worse all the time; and I turned round and prayed, until after a while I felt submissive, and I could say: 'Thy will, O Lord, be done!' The doctors gave him up, and we all gave him up. And, as was the custom in those times, we had made the grave clothes, and we were whispering about the last exercises, when I looked, and I saw some perspiration on his brow, showing that the fever had broken, and he spoke to us so naturally, that I knew he was going to get well. He did get well, and my son Isaac, whom I thought was going to be slain and consumed of disease, was loosened from that altar.

"And bless your souls, that's been so for seventy years; and if my voice were not so weak, and if I could see better, I could preach to you younger people a sermon; for though I can't see much, I can see this; whenever you get into a tough place, and your heart is breaking, if you will look a little farther into the woods, you will see, caught in the branches, a substitute and a deliverance. 'My son, God will provide Himself a lamb.'"

Thank you, mother, for that short sermon. I could preach back to you for a minute or two and say, never do you fear. I wish I had half as good a hope of heaven as you have. Do not fear, mother; whatever happens, no harm will ever happen to you. I was going up a long flight of stairs; and I saw very decrepit, and with a cane, creeping on up. She made but very little progress, and I felt very exuberant; and I said to her: "Why, mother, that's no way to get up-stairs;" and I threw my arms around her and I carried her up and put her down on the landing at the top of the stairs. She said: "Thank you, thank you; I am very thankful." O mother, when you get through this life's work and you want to go up-stairs and rest in the good place that God has provided for you, you will not have to climb up—you will not have to crawl up painfully. The two arms that were stretched on the cross will be flung around you, and you will be hoisted with a glorious lift beyond all weariness and all struggle. May the God of Abraham and Isaac be with you until you see the Lamb on the hill-tops.

Now, that aged minister has made a suggestion, and this aged woman has made a suggestion; I will make a suggestion: Isaac going up the hill makes me think of the great sacrifice. Isaac, the only son of Abraham. Jesus, the only Son of God. On those

TWO "ONLYS"

I build a tearful emphasis. O Isaac! O Jesus! But this last sacrifice was a more tremendous one. When the knife was lifted over Calvary, there was no voice that cried, "Stop!" and no hand arrested it. Sharp, keen, and tremendous, it cut down through nerve and artery until the blood sprayed the faces of the executioners, and the mid day sun dropped a veil of cloud over its face because it could not endure the spectacle. O Isaac, of Mount Moriah! O Jesus, of Mount Calvary! Better could God have thrown away into annihilation a thousand worlds, than to have sacrificed His only Son. It was not one of ten sons—it was His only Son. If He had not given up Him, you and I would have perished. "God so loved the world that He gave His only—" I stop there, not because I have forgotten the quotation, but because I want to think. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Great God! break my heart at the thought of that sacrifice. Isaac the only, typical of Jesus the only.

You see Isaac going up the hill and carrying the wood. O Abraham, why not take the load off the boy? If he is going to die so soon, why not make his last hours easy? Abraham knew that in carrying that wood up Mount Moriah, Isaac was to be carrying His own cross up Calvary. I do not know how heavy that cross was—whether it was made of oak, or acacia, or Lebanon cedar. I suppose it may have weighed one, or two, or three hundred pounds. That was the lightest part of the burden. All the sins and sorrows of the world were wound around that cross. The heft of one, the heft of two, worlds: earth and hell were on His shoulders. O Isaac, carrying the wood of sacrifice up Mount Moriah. O Jesus, carrying the wood of sacrifice up Mount Calvary, the agonies of earth and hell wrapped around that cross. One would think that this audience would shriek out in sympathy. I shall never see the heavy load on Isaac's back, that I shall not think of the crushing load on Christ's back. For whom that load? For you. For you. For me. For me. Would that all the tears that we have ever wept over our sorrows had been saved until this morning, and that we might now pour them out on the lacerated back and feet and heart of the Son of God.

You say: "If this young man was twenty or thirty years of age,

WHY DIDN'T HE RESIST?

Why wasn't it Isaac binding Abraham instead of Abraham binding Isaac? The muscle in Isaac's arm was stronger than the muscle in Abraham's withered arm. No young man twenty-five years of age would submit to have his father fasten him to a pile of wood with intention of burning." Isaac was a willing sacrifice, and so a type of Christ who willingly came to save the world. If all the armies of heaven had resolved to force Christ out from the gate, they could not have done it. Christ was equal with God. If all the battalions of glory had armed themselves and resolved to put Christ forth and make Him come out and save this world, they could not have succeeded in it. With one stroke He would have toppled over angelic and archangelic dominion.

But there was one thing that the omnipotent Christ could not stand. Our sorrows mastered Him. He could not bear to see the world die without an offer of pardon and help, and if all heaven had armed itself to keep Him back, if the gates of life had been bolted and double-barred, Christ would have flung the everlasting doors from their hinges, and would have sprung forth, scattering the hindering hosts of heaven like chaff before the whirlwind, as He cried: "Lo! I come to suffer. Lo! I come to die." Christ—a willing sacrifice. Willing to take Bethlehem humiliation, and Sanhedrim outrage, and whipping-post maltreatment, and Golgotha butchery. Willing to be bound. Willing to suffer. Willing to die. Willing to save.

HOW DOES THIS AFFECT YOU?

Do not your very best impulses bound out toward this pain-struck Christ? Get down at His feet, O ye people. Put your lips against the wound on His right foot and help kiss away the pang. Wipe the foam from His dying lip. Get under the cross until you feel the baptism of His rushing tears. Take Him into your heart, with warmest love and undying enthusiasm. By your resistances you have abused Him long enough. Christ is willing to save you. Are you this morning willing to be saved? It seems to me as if this moment were throbbing with the invitations of an all-compassionate God.

I have been told that the cathedral of St. Mark's stands in a square in the centre of the city of Venice, and that when the clock strikes twelve at noon, all the birds from the city and the regions round about the city fly to the square and settle down. It came in this wise: a large-hearted woman passing one noonday across the square, saw some birds shivering in the cold, and she scattered some crumbs of bread among them. The next day, at the same hour, she scattered more crumbs of bread among them, and so on from year to year until the day of her death. In her will she bequeathed a certain amount of money to keep up the same practice, and now, at the first stroke of the bell at noon, the birds begin to come there, and when the clock has struck twelve, the square is covered with them. How beautifully suggestive. Christ comes out to feed thy soul to-day. The more hungry you feel yourselves to be, the better it is. It is noon and the Gospel clock strikes twelve. Come in flocks! Come as doves to the window! All the air is filled with the liquid chime: Come! Come! Come!

While I pause, and wait and watch for the result of this sermon, this audience seems to swim from my vision, and I see the congregations of the last day gathering in the air. Oh, what a retinue of flaming cloud and falling star. Behold! He cometh. "Behold! He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him." On that day it will be found out whether I preached the whole truth. On that day it will be found out whether any of you squarely refused the offer of eternal life. You will on that day think of this occasion, of where you sat or stood, of the text that was preached from, and your decision. This hour takes hold on that. Come! let us look each other in the face, that I may know you when I see you again in the judgment.

The Marquis of Lorne is Delivering Lectures in Great Britain on the subject of Canada, which are likely to largely increase the tide of emigration westward. In a lecture delivered at Birmingham on December 4th, he particularly praised the salubrity of the climate of the Dominion, and said fevers, which were too common in the United States, were unknown within its boundaries. He lauded Canada as a field for emigration, and expatiated upon the marvellous progress made by various towns. He instanced Pictou, in Nova Scotia, which, he said, with its cheaper labor, will soon rival Glasgow, Belfast and London as an iron shipbuilding port. He said Toronto is one of the most properous young cities upon the American continent and one that is destined to have a great future. Lord Lorne concluded by saying that the Canadian people are thoroughly devoted to their connection with the mother country, otherwise they would ha[illegible]ng ago discarded their allegiance.

The Hissing of an Indian Viceroy in Public has caused a sensation in that country. A calcutta despatch says: "The Marquis of Ripon, Viceroy of India, returned here on Saturday, and was welcomed by an immense crowd of natives. Banners of the natives, on which 'God Bless the Viceroy' was inscribed, were destroyed by Europeans and Eurasians. A mob of two hundred assembled at the Government House and hissed the Marquis and his wife when they drove to the gate. At a banquet on Friday, at which two hundred Europeans were present, a toast to the Viceroy was received in silence, and only twenty-four persons stood up." The cause of the Viceroy's popularity with the natives and his being disliked by Europeans is that he advocates a change of the law which would render it possible for Europeans to be tried before native judges.

FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY IN EGYPT.

By Rev. J. H. Alexander.

Past Greatness—Predicted Permanent Degradation—Governed Never to Govern Again—To be Desolated—A Land of Ruins—The Throne Always to be Filled by a Foreigner—Becoming Sterile.

No country is so prominently before the eye of the world at this time as Egypt. On many accounts it is one of the most wonderful countries on the face of the globe. The origin of that people by whom it was early inhabited is buried in remote antiquity. Some chronologists trace back the line of its ancient kings to Mizraim, a grandson of the patriarch Noah. In that land of wonders dawned the first light of Oriental civilization. According to Herodotus, 20,000 cities existed at one time within its narrow limits. Fertilized by the waters of the Nile, its territory supported a vast population, which has left all over Egypt the imperishable memorials of the skill and power of the generations who lived under the government of the Pharaohs.

With the history of the past before us, and the Bible in hand, an interesting question arises, What destiny did prophecy mark out for that people, who for centuries constituted one of the most powerful nations in the world? What did the prophets foretell concerning their character and their relation to other kingdoms.

PERMANENT DEGRADATION.

The prophet Ezekiel foretold that Egypt would be reduced to a kingdom of weak and inferior grade. These are his words: "I will cause them to return into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a base kingdom. It shall be the basest of the kingdoms." This remarkable prediction was uttered nearly twenty-five hundred years ago. But what are the facts in the case? To-day Egypt is down-trodden. The elements of her strength have perished. For generation after generation she has known little save the bitterness of oppression without the vestige of power to assert and maintain her national independence. Ignorance and a universal air of misery meet the eye of the traveller in every corner of the land. It was no human foresight that enabled the prophet to give this graphic description of the country as it is at the present day.

With equal clearness it was foretold that Egypt would never again rise to power, and hold dominion over the nations; that, on the other hand, she would be brought down from her greatness to a mere dwarf in the scale of nationality. Thus spoke the prophet about 600 years before the coming of Christ: "Neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations; for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations." Has this come to pass? Yes, verily. History records the fact that in less than one hundred years after the words were uttered a great Persian army entered their country. That entrance was the death-knell of the nation's glory. She has not, from that day to this, erected the standard of power permanently over her own land, much less has she been able to exact tribute from other nations.

UNDER THE YOKE.

Looking back through the annals of the past, we see that she has literally been diminished. Surrounding nations have successively held her in a state of vassalage. History comes to the stand and testifies that for more than 2000 years she has been under the yoke of foreign power, a mere tributary kingdom, and that she has not been able to exalt herself above the nations. To-day, in imitation of her many former fruitless struggles, her feeble yet resolute army has been aroused to desperation in an effort to repel from her borders a powerful foe, not perceiving the fact that European governments would not, for a day, permit the benefits of victory, if achieved by her, to accrue to her own land.

DESOLATION.

Contrary to all that seemed probable, prophecy pointed out for Eygpt a destiny of fearful desolation. When the whole land was fairly teeming with population, everything indicating strength, and showing no signs of decay, the word went forth, "They shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate, and her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted." At the date of this remarkable prophetic description the country boasted of matchless wealth. Its pyramids and labyrinths, and its Lake Moeris, vastly superior, according to Herodotus, to either, all in connection with its extraordinary fertility of soil, bespoke for it an endless perpetuity of resources and grandeur.

But, true to the sure word of prophecy, for more than 1000 years it has been famous as the land of ruins. A meagre and down-trodden population, composed largely of foreigners, rendered hideous by the touch of poverty and Mohammedanism, dwell amid its scenes of dilapidation and fallen grandeur. Every adjacent country has fallen, and every great city within or near its confines, with few exceptions, has come down to a bare cluster of huts. The traveller takes his stand amid her mouldering ruins and sees on every side monuments of wealth and power unsurpassed in ancient or modern times, and then feels the sensation of awe as he opens the Bible and reads, "I will make her rivers dry and sell the land into the hand of the wicked, and I will make the land waste, and all that is therein, by the hand of strangers." Persians, Arabs, Turks, Greeks, and Romans have constituted the strangers. Infidelity may well keep in the background while the argument from prophecy in favor of the Bible is in view.

SUBJECT TO FOREIGNERS.

It was a striking announcement of the prophet, that Egypt should never more have a sovereign ruler from among her own people. "The sceptre of Egypt shall depart away." Again, "And there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt." When these words were uttered the Egyptian monarchy had stood for more than 1600 years. For generation after generation her own sons had sat in succession on the throne. According to historians the Shepherd kings are hardly an exception, as they usurped dominion over only a part of the country. But the Pharaohs, long established in power, dreamt not that they could be disrobed of royalty, their mighty dominion broken, and the glory of the land pass away.

But what does history record in fulfilment of the prophecy that there should be no more a prince of the land? The following are the facts. About 525 years before Christ came, Cambyses, King of Persia, overran and subdued the whole country. Persia then for a period of 200 years provided rulers to whom they were forced to yield submission. By that Persian subjugation the country lost its liberty and independence, and from that day to the present it does not appear that Egypt has had a king from among her own sons settled upon the throne. Persian control terminating, the country came into the power of the Macedonians, and immediately passed into the hand of the Ptolemies, who held over it dominion for 294 years. Rome then became master, and ruled Egypt for the long period of 760 years.

The next rulers of the unfortunate country were the Saracens, that famous Arabian tribe, the terror to all the East. They governed the conquered province for more than 600 years. Then followed the Mamelukes, rulers who belonged to a tribe of Circassian slaves who rose to power and controlled Egypt for 263 years. At the expiration of their power, 370 years ago, the Turks acquired the dominion, and have ever since been the acknowledged sovereigns of the oppressed and miserable inhabitants.

Thus we see up to our day a fulfilment of the prophecy. All efforts of Egypt for 2400 years, to throw off the yoke of foreign power, and settle upon her throne a king or prince from among her own people, have proved failures.

GOD-APPOINTED BARRENNESS

Very remarkable changes, according to the testimony of travellers, have taken place in the physical character of the country. Strangely enough, prophecy pointed to these changes. The following words are found in the prophecy: "And the waters shall fail from the sea, and the river shall be wasted and dried up. And they shall turn the rivers far away, and the brooks of defence shall be emptied and dried up, the weeds and flags shall wither. The paper reeds by the brooks, and everything sown by the brooks shall wither, be driven away, and be no more." Has there not been a real and complete fulfilment of this prediction? Travellers affirm that vast accumulations of sand now exist over a very considerable portion of what was once the fertile valley of the Nile. The country, never large, has shrunk within narrow limits. Some of the ancient channels of the great river, as we are told, have disappeared. No trace is found of many of the canals which once were used for irrigation. Large sections of the richest alluvial soil of the earth have become an African desert. Vegetation has withered. Who but God could have foreseen what has come to pass in the land of wonders?

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"All Bright Now!"—The Rev. Mr. Patterson said at a recent meeting: "I meet with many inquirers every day, and a few nights ago as I was hastening out of an after-meeting, a young woman who was standing at the door, with a beaming face, caught me by the hand and said, 'Oh, sir, it is all right now!' She had been led to decision for Christ at a previous meeting, and in accordance with my custom, I asked her to return when she could and state how she was getting on."

A Good Hard Road to Walk on.—The Rev. R. Hood related: "I knew a good Christian man who died in a village on the other side of Hamilton. Just before the angel of death came to his side, and in kindness freed his soul from the pain-stricken and worn-out body, a sister in Christ asked him, 'How are you now, Thomas?' His reply was, 'I'm no walkin' on coglie (loose) stanes.' No, he was walking on firm, hard rock, the salvation of Jesus, which nothing could shake. Not even death or hell could remove him from Christ, the Rock of Ages."

"Is This Fit for a Rabbi?"—At Cowaddens, Mr. Baron said: "I remember when I was a boy in Poland, that my parents imbued my mind with the thought of the honorable position to which I was destined, that of a Rabbi. It is the highest position a Jew can obtain among his co-religionists. I was so filled with it that when my companions asked me to join certain company or tempted me to do evil, I communed with myself, 'Is this fit for a Rabbi?' 'No.' 'Then I cannot do it.' And so by looking to my high calling I was preserved from evil. If Christians would only look to their future position, and realize that even now they are heirs of God and princes made by God, they would not so often do those things which dishonor their Saviour."

Thawing a Frozen Man.—At Kirkintilloch one of Mr. Moody's Mizpah Choir lately said: "Before my conversion to Christ, I was very much given to drinking habits, and the sins which natually flow from them. One hard frosty night in winter, I was so drunk that I laid down on the bare street within a few yards of my own home—if home it could be called—and slept there all night. When I woke up in the morning I was frozen stiff. I managed, with difficulty, to crawl to the close where I lived. My wife, who had been waiting for me, heard my moans, and came down-stairs to see what was the matter. She roused a neighbor, and together they carried me into the house, laying me on the floor; they made up a big fire to thaw me. Oh, the pain I suffered, as the heat made my blood run through my benumbed body; it was excruciating. The illness which followed gave me time to think, and my conscience was roused. I was in deep mental distress, and could not see how I could be saved. When I got better, I went to a Gospel-meeting, where a Christian worker said, 'Sandy, Jesus is the same yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow.' I went home to my room, knelt down, and prayed, 'Lord, have mercy upon me; I have tried often and failed every time. Lord, have mercy on me.' I never rose from my knees till the Holy Spirit assured me that I was saved 'through the blood of the Lamb.'" (1 John 5 : 10).

"Tell me How it is to be Done!"—Mr. Wilson said: "On a recent evening I spoke to a man of whom a friend declared: 'That man seems to me to be the very incarnation of sin.' I do not think I ever heard such an appalling story of wickedness; I do not think I ever saw such a subtle net as the devil had woven round that man; but he was perfectly willing to have it broken on any condition whatever. His cry was: 'Tell me how it is to be done!' and he laid his career open before me without reserve, not by way of making a parade of it, but in the desperation of his heart to get liberty. It would be wrong for me to say I left that man rejoicing. I think it will be many days before he rejoices; for he has a work to do for those he has been leading into sin that will keep him broken-hearted for many a day; but I believe he is trusting in Christ for salvation."

A Memorable Dog-watch.—Captain Smith said: "I will tell you how the Lord took me out of the land of bondage with a high hand, and His strong arm carried me through the desert right into the Land of Promise, where I have ever since enjoyed freedom from all difficulties, because I trust my all to Him. Some years ago, when I was in the West Indies, I was awakened to great concern about my soul, from a state of bondage to sin and the devil—far worse than the children of Israel were in Egypt. For three weeks I struggled and fought for liberty, but my efforts were in vain till we were a week's sail from Trinidad. As I kept the dog-watch (from six o'clock till eight) one night, I gave up the fight, and told the Lord I could not go on any longer this way, and entreated Him to be my liberator. He answered my prayer, and light flashed upon my soul. It has never left me since."

Weary of Lying in Bed.—Dr. Cameron, Referring to Eccles. 9 : 5, used the following illustration: "I was called to attend a little girl who was very ill. My heart was touched by the patient look in her face and the gentle tones of her voice when she spoke. Her sickness proved to be a lingering and painful one. As time passed on, she began to feel the mere lying in bed to be more trying than the pain of the disease. One day, she said with a simple child-faith which moved me greatly, 'O doctor, I wish you would let me get up, for this bed is wearied of me.' She thought that the weariness induced by her long confinement was the bed showing anger against her for lying in it so long. This is just the way with those who are weary with the load of sin; they think God is angry with them, when it is just the reverse. The feeling of estrangement is in their own souls, not in God. Will such not ask Him now to lift them up from the bed of sin which pains them so much? He for His dear Son's sake will hear your prayer, make you quite well, and do it at once and for nothing."

Descending an Alpine Pass.—The Rev. Mr. Ewing said: "When I first went down an Alpine pass, our guide said, 'Now, we are going to slide; put your alpenstock under your arm, lean upon it, and so take your weight off your feet.' I thought that very easy. 'I'll do that easily!' We started, and I saw the guide and my friend going down smoothly, and fast leaving me. I was always coming to a halt, till at last I thought of calling on them to help me, but fear of confessing failure prevented me. I decided that I must get up with them in some way, but how to do it was the question. While cogitating over this problem, the guide's directions came to my mind, 'Put your weight on the alpenstock.' Quick as thought, I threw myself back upon it, so that my feet barely touched the snow, and in another instant I was shooting down toward them as though propelled by an invisible force. In like manner, if we will only put our whole weight on Christ, we shall cease stumbling, halting, or falling. He will uphold us with the right hand of His righteousness. There is safety only as we lean entirely and constantly upon Him."

A Closed Door Opened.—Dr. Moxey Called attention to an incident that occurred while Major Whittle was last in Edinburgh, as an indication of what very humble people may do. One day a man approached the place of meeting and hesitated at the entrance, not knowing whether to go in or not. He was in this uncertain condition when a woman said to him, "Come in, friend, we will be glad to see you in here." He said, "Well, I am afraid that Major Whittle only speaks to rich people." She answered, "Oh, no, to the poor the Gospel is preached. Come in!" When he found that the door was shut he looked at it rather blankly, and said to the woman, "There doesn't seem to be much of an invitation, the door is shut." She said, "We can open it," and added, "perhaps we shall hear something about the door to-night;" and, strange to say, when Major Whittle gave out his text, it was, "I am the door." The coincidence struck the man and he, perhaps, listened more attentively than he would otherwise have done; and the result of the sermon was that the man in the after-meeting accepted Christ—he went in by the door.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

By Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D.

A Glad Day for the Universe—Sending Out the Invitations—The Ingathering—The Lamb—The Lamb's Wife—The Betrothment—The Preparation—The Marriage.

IT will be a glad day for both heaven and earth when that voice is heard, the voice of the great multitude, the voice of many waters, the voice of mighty thunderings, "The marriage of the Lamb is come!" (Rev. 19 : 7). It will be a day of gladness not only for the Bridegroom and the Bride, but for the whole universe of God. It will be the festival of festivals, the jubilee of jubilees. But to that feast are sent forth in the midst of darkness and storm and sorrow. These are now going forth to the sons of men—come ye to the marriage, come to the feast, come, form part of that glorious company called the Bride, the Lamb's wife. Father, Son, and Spirit unite in sending to you this message of love. "Whosoever will!" Surely that takes in you.

This is the day of ingathering.

A LONG DAY

it has been—a day made up of ages; a day very unlike that coming day of glory for which the gathering is made. Why God should have made such brightness to rise out of such darkness, such blessedness to be evolved out of so much sadness, we know not. It will, we know, be to the praise of the glory of His grace wherein He hath made us accepted in the Beloved. Everything connected with this day of ingathering to the marriage and the tribulation through which we pass to it shall be seen to be the result of love to the gathered ones and love to Him to whom they are gathered as His eternal Bride. All things shall concur in telling out the love of the Father to His beloved Son and to the Church of the redeemed from among men. But here let us see—

THE LAMB.

This is the apocalyptic name for the Bridegroom. It occurs twenty-six times in this book, and it comes very aptly from the pen of him who recorded the words, "Behold the Lamb of God." It is His heavenly name; the name by which He is best known above; for angels in looking down upon the earth see but one place, Golgotha, and one object, the Cross! It is His nuptial name; for as the Lamb He is the Bridegroom. His relationship to the Bride is that of sacrificial blood; He gave His life for her; He washed her in His own blood; He clothed her in His own raiment. It is His Gospel name; the name round which the glad tidings all revolve—"He is led as a lamb to the slaughter;" He is the Lamb "without blemish;" and of Him as such the good news speaks to us from first to last. He is the Lamb "as it had been slain;" the Lamb on the altar; the Lamb of the daily burnt-offering; the Lamb of the Passover; the sin-bearing, sin-atoning Lamb.

THE LAMB'S WIFE.

She is called first the Bride and then the wife. She is the eternally chosen of the Father, the eternally beloved of the Son. She is one, yet many. She is the Church of God, made up of the redeemed from among men, chosen, redeemed, and called, according to the eternal purpose of the Father. As there is but one temple, yet many stones; many sons, but one family; so there is the great multitude that no man can number, but one Bride. The three great characteristics of the Church as a whole, and of each individual of the mighty company making up that whole, are—(1) chosen of the Father; (2) loved and redeemed by the Son; (3) renewed and sanctified by the Holy Ghost. She is the perfection of the Divine handiwork; "all fair," "without spot or wrinkle or any such thing;" Bridegroom and Bride clothed with the same glory, filled with the same Spirit, and partakers of the same throne.

THE BETROTHMENT.

From heaven the heavenly Bridegroom came to seek among the sinners of earth the Bride whom the Father had given. "In the lowly level (as one has written) of our poor humanity He wooed His Bride, and thus He won her love." He approached her with His words of love in the Gospel, wherein He made known to her all the fulness of His infinite heart. He looked upon her in her misery and pitied her outcast condition; He spoke to her and cast His skirt over her, and she became His. Through His messengers He espoused her to Himself as a chaste virgin (II Cor. 11 : 2), and from the moment that the Gospel found lodgment in her soul she was espoused, betrothed, so that she could say, "I am my Beloved's, and my Beloved is mine." Here upon this fallen earth this wonderful transaction took place, this blessed bond was knit, this union sealed. She become His betrothed for eternity.

THE PREPARATION.

The beginning of this is now, but the completion is just before the marriage, for in reference to that day it is that the words are spoken, "His wife hath made herself ready." Here the preparation is described as her own doing, just as in our Lord's parable the virgins take their lamps, their vessels, and go forth to meet the bridegroom as if all were their own doing. But we find other skill and other love engaged in fitting and decking this fairest among women: (1) the Father—He prepares; (2) the Son; (3) the Holy Spirit; each does His own work; yet in that work she is not merely passive, but active. She is "prepared," and she makes herself ready. This full preparation is reserved for the first resurrection; for it is in resurrection glory and beauty that she is to be attired for the marriage. The risen Bridegroom is united to His risen Bride.

THE MARRIAGE.

This is the actual union, the consummation of the glory. Caught up into the royal pavilion, to meet her Lord in the air, she is not only forever with the Lord, but forever His own chosen Bride, to sit upon His throne, to wear His crown, to share His love, to be invested with His glory. All this when He comes the second time to be glorified in His saints. Round this great event the fortunes of God's universe revolve. That marriage-hall is to be the centre of all blessing to heaven and earth. There the second Adam and the true Eve, the Church, are to have their dwelling, their palace, from which all light and love, all order and peace, all blessedness and glory, are to flow forth throughout illimitable space.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The National Wealth of the United States is the subject of an instructive article in Bradstreet's Journal, in which is arranged and tabulated the information derived from the returns of the last census. It appears from this article that the aggregate wealth of the United States in 1880 was $43,642,000,000; that the total amount of capital invested in business was $8,177,000,000, and the number of persons engaged in business was 703,328.

Mr. Dorsheimer's Bill for the Protection of foreign authors should have the careful and discriminating attention of the House before it is submitted to the vote. It provides that a foreign author shall have the sole right to publish and sell his book in the United States providing the government of his country grants equal and similar privileges to American authors. It limits the copyright to twenty-five years or until the author dies, if he die before the expiration of twenty-five years. It may be hoped that the bill will not pass in its present shape. Some provision is needed which will secure to American publishers the right of supplying the American market. Without this, we may have the English system of high-priced books introduced here. Cheap books are a necessity, but if the foreign author refuses to allow his books to be reprinted here and the American public is compelled to buy from the foreign publisher and pay the duty on importation, only wealthy people will be able to purchase such works. The poor student, to whom the books would be most necessary, could not possess them. It is only honest that the foreign author should enjoy a profit from his works, which under our present system is denied him, but in justice to our own citizens that profit ought not to be, and the law should prevent it being, so inordinate as to render the books inaccessible to those who need them. The provision withdrawing the copyright at the death of the author is ridiculous, as it generally happens that the widow and children of an author need the income, more than the author did in his lifetime. Legislation is needed in this matter, but not legislation of this kind.

The Effect of the New Tariff Law is Smaller than was expected by both the friends and the opponents of the measure. Mr. Nimmo, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, on January 9th submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury a statement in regard to the operation of the act, so far as the same can be shown from data at the present time. It appears that the reduction in the average ad valorem rate of duty on dutiable goods for the quarter ended September 30th, 1883, as compared with the corresponding quarter in 1882, was but a small fraction over two per cent. This reduction may, however, be increased in the statistics of the next quarter, as there was a rush to get certain articles through before June 30th, and other goods were postponed in order to obtain the benefit of the new rate.

A New Attempt to Solve the Mormon Problem has been made by Senator Cullom of Illinois. His plan, as explained in the bill he has introduced in the Senate, provides that the government of Utah shall consist of a governor and council of nine members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and they shall be citizens and qualified voters of the Territory. Mr. Cullom, in explaining his bill, was careful to say that he regarded it as only a temporary measure, rendered necessary by the persistent defiance of the government by the Mormons. He said the people of the Territory should, when this evil had been eradicated, have the control of their own affairs. Meanwhile, let the United States Government take the management of Utah into its own hands, discharge the incompetent and treasonable agents of the Mormons who are officers of the Territory, and purge out of its evil code every vestige of ecclesiastical polity. Mr. Cullom maintained the perfect constitutional right of Congress to do this under that clause of the constitution giving it the right to make rules and regulations for the government of the Territories.

The Survivors of the Fatal Jeannette Expedition and the heirs of the members of the expedition who lost their lives in the Arctic are the beneficiaries of a bill introduced in the Senate last week by Senator Edmunds. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Chief Engineer Melville and Lieutenant Danenhower $1000 each; to Raymond L. Newcomb, naturalist; John Cole, acting boatswain; W. T. C. Nindermann, seaman, and James H. Bartlett, seaman, $600 each, and to the remaining survivors $300 each. It also authorizes the payment of a sum equal to one year's salary of each of the deceased members of the Jeannette expedition and crew to their respective heirs.

The Catastrophe at the Convent at Belleville, Ill., on the night of Saturday, January 5th, was one of the most horrible events of recent times. The fire started in the basement after the nuns, and the pupils who were being educated there, had retired to rest. The flames raged in the lower portion of the building undiscovered, and when the inmates awaked they found their escape cut off. Before the engines arrived large numbers of people gathered around anxious to rescue the poor women and girls who could be seen in their night clothing at the windows shrieking for help. But the heavy oak doors in the basement were fast closed and locked, and for a long time resisted all efforts to force them open. At length a heavy piece of timber was procured and used as a battering ram. The doors were then driven in, and the men rushed up-stairs to rescue the imprisoned inmates. Then it was found that each bedroom door was locked and had to be separately forced in. Meanwhile the fire had increased in force, and the brave rescuers were forced to fly before they had saved half the women. A few of them jumped from the windows, sustaining dreadful injuries by their fall, but it is believed that at least thirty were burned to death. On the arrival of the engines the building was past saving, and the fire burned itself out.

Miss Clara Barton, the Heroine of the War, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 26th, 1883, has resigned her position as head of the Massachusetts Woman's Prison at Sherborn, which she has held since April 1st. She resigned in order to resume her work in the interest of the Society of the Red Cross. She resigned in November, but Governor Butler persuaded her to serve during the year. He now accepts the resignation with many kind words, saying: "In what you have done in this institution—and I speak this without any criticism upon anything done before—it certainly has become an institution of which the State may well be proud, so far as its administration goes, and you have proven that such an institution can be administered with the kindness of woman at the head, without blows, without imprisonment, without harshness, as effectively and with equally good discipline, as any institution of the kind conducted by men. Your administration and success has caused me one further appreciation of the fact that fit women are the fittest to take care of women."

The Temperance Work in the South, Conducted under the auspices of the National Temperance Society, is reported successful. The Rev. C. H. Mead, one of the speakers engaged to visit the colored people and to preach temperance among them, recently returned from a tour through a part of Virginia and North Carolina. He said that he was kindly received by the Southern people, white as well as black, and that his mission was appreciated. Wherever he preached immense crowds turned out to hear. Temperance literature was eagerly sought for.

A Refuge for Foundlings will be Opened during this month at Hammonton, N. J., under Protestant auspices. Hitherto the only institution of the kind has been managed by Roman Catholics. The Hammonton Institution is founded through the efforts of Miss S. S. Nivison, a graduate of the Woman's Medical College of Philadelphia, who has given the land for the buildings. Philanthropists in New York and Brooklyn have given the money to erect the home. The first cottage—now completed—will accommodate twelve children and two nurses, and it is intended to erect others as funds are supplied. The ground given by Miss Nivison comprises eighty-three acres, is situated in a healthy locality, and is under cultivation. It represents her entire savings from her profession for twenty years. Bishop Huntington, of Central New York, Dr. Houghton, and Dr. Ray Palmer are among the clergymen interested in the enterprise, of which the cottage now built will be the nucleus. It is called the Nivison Home.

The Gospel Temperance Work Conducted by Miss Jennie Smith at Garrett, Ind., has been signally blessed. The liquor dealers blaspheme and are loud in their threats against the services and those who take part in them. Two hundred converts have been made, chiefly among the railroad employés, and the saloon-keepers complain that their business is suffering.

A Reformation in the Mississippi Steamboat travel is announced. A Southern journal states that one of the largest of the boats in the Cincinnati and New Orleans trade has just been undergoing extensive repairs, and is now ready to resume her trips. The principal change effected in the boat is that there is now no liquor bar on board. Another owner engaged in the Cincinnati and Pittsburg trade, who controls several boats, has also refused to have a bar on any of them. Many river men believe that the sale of liquor on the boat increases the risk to the boat and the owner, and it is thought that a bar on a first-class boat will soon be the exception instead of the rule.

An Utterance on the Temperance Question has caused some surprise in Pennsylvania. Ex-Attorney-General Palmer delivered an oration at Wilkesbarre on January 7th, in the course of which he said the temperance question would be the issue in all future political campaigns in that and other States, and that in the end it would triumph. He contended that it costs the people five times as much money for the liquor traffic as all the burdens of society put together, comprising all the taxes. He claimed that ninety-five per cent of all the crime committed in the county was due to the whiskey traffic, and closed with an eloquent appeal to all present to exert their influence in behalf of the good cause. Mr. Palmer's bold stand on the temperance question will, it is said, kill his political prospects.

The Best Drink to Keep the Cold Out was the subject of discussion on the front platform of a street car in New York during one of the intensely cold and windy days last week. A policeman recommended ale with black pepper, but the car driver, whose occupation rendered him a more reliable authority, said: "I never tried the pepper part of that prescription, but ale is, I know, thought to be very warming. We car drivers have colder work than policemen do, I think, and the old ones among us have tried every drink you ever heard of. A lot of us were talking the whole thing over the other night. Hot rum, hot whiskey, brandy and ginger, and all the cold clear alcoholic drinks were discussed. But the majority were in favor of hot coffee. That is the least hurtful, the most heating, and the longest lasting drink I know of."

The Flight of a Ten-Million-Dollar Fortune agitated Wall Street recently. Mr. Henry Villard, the great railroad magnate whose fortune was, on a moderate estimate, stated at ten million dollars, resigned the presidency of the enterprises with which he was identified, and handed his property to his creditors for distribution. The magnificent building on Madison Avenue in which he resided, and the decoration of which was not finished when the shrinkage of values and the consequent collapse came, he has abandoned, and he is now, say the newspapers, utterly ruined. He would have been considered a smarter man if he had protected himself when he had opportunity; but having persuaded other people to embark in the enterprises which have now ended disastrously, he felt it his duty to sacrifice his own fortune in the general ruin. A millionaire who relinquishes his millions rather than his integrity is an example which should be useful in these days in which men seem to have forgotten that anything, even the soul itself, is of more importance than money (Luke 12 : 15).

An Emphatic Condemnation of Tobacco has been published by a Philadelphia physician. The occasion of the publication was a report that he approved the use of the weed in the Moyamensing Prison, and advocated its being supplied gratuitously to the inmates on account of its beneficial effects. In contradiction of this report, Dr. Casper Wister, who is President of the Board of Prison Inspectors, declares that he never made any such statement, and says that he believes that the withholding of tobacco from the inmates of Moyamensing Prison during the past eight months has had a most beneficial effect upon the general health of the institution. He says the budget for 1884 contained no item for tobacco, because "it was an outrage upon the city of Philadelphia that it should be called upon to pay $600 a year to gratify the personal appetites of its law-breakers."

A Curious Suit against Rumsellers is now pending in a district court of Kansas. The action is brought against eight saloon-keepers. The petition alleges that for some eighteen months prior to the 1st day of October, 1883, the plaintiff's father was in a constant condition of intoxication, caused by intoxicating liquors sold, bartered and given to him by the defendants. That by reason of such intoxication he was wholly incapacitated for business of any kind, and was drunken, idle, and profligate, weak, sick, and disabled in body and mind, and during said period of eighteen months wholly neglected to provide for himself, and that the plaintiffs have been compelled to support the family. The amount of damages claimed is $5 per day, or $2600.

A Medal Worth $150 is to be Presented by the Iowa Legislature to Miss Kate Shelley, who on July 6th, 1881, crawled along the trestle work of a bridge and averted a railway accident. Besides the medal the sum of $200 in money has been voted her. The medal represents Kate in the act of crossing the railway bridge over the Des Moines River. Above are the words: "Heroism, Youth, Humanity;" on the reverse of the medal is the following inscription: "Presented by the State of Iowa to Kate Shelley, with the thanks of the General Assembly. In recognition of the courage and devotion of a child of fifteen years, whom neither the terror of the elements nor the fear of death could appall in her efforts to save human life during the terrible storm and flood in the Des Moines Valley on the night of July 6th, 1881." An effort of a larger and more permanent character on the heroine's behalf will also be made. Her family is poor. The father, who was a section foreman of the Chicago and North-western Railroad, was killed in an accident about ten years ago. The mother has since then endured many hardships and privations in the endeavor to bring up her five children.

Alarm is Manifested in the Mormon Camp at the general indignation aroused throughout the country by Mormon practices. At the monthly meeting of the Salt Lake Mormon priesthood, held in Salt Lake City on January 5th, Bishop John Sharpe, who was present, said that while in Washington recently he had seen enough to convince him that no power but that of the Almighty could save the Mormon people. "If God does not pilot the ship," he said, "she will go down." The Bishop was right in saying that only the Almighty could save the Mormon people. The first step, however, must be repentance and reformation. God will "pilot the ship," if its crew will cease their abominable practices.

A New Missionary Ship is to be Built for the service of the Micronesian Mission in the Pacific Islands. It, like its predecessors, will be called the "Morning Star." It will be the fourth ship of that name. The first was built in 1856. The second in 1866. This, after about three years, was shipwrecked. The third replaced it in 1870, and now this, after thirteen years of service, is to give way to a steamer better adapted to the needs of the service. It is estimated that the cost will be $45,000. No contract will be made by the Board of Commissioners until all the funds are in hand or assured. As in the case of the former ships the main reliance of the Board for the money is on the children in the Sunday-schools.

A Significant Matrimonial Experience was related in a court at Yonkers, N. Y., last week. A comely young German girl, who came to this country a few months ago appeared to complain of her husband's neglect. She crossed the Atlantic for the purpose of marrying her lover, who had preceded her. When she found the young man he refused to make her his wife, and she bestowed her heart and hand upon another man who was attracted by her beauty, and offered her marriage after only an hour's acquaintance. He could speak no German and she could speak no English. The couple lived very happily together until they learned to understand each other's language, and then they began to quarrel. The wife then complained to the judge, but she was not able to prove her accusations, and the husband was discharged after promising to treat his wife properly in the future. It would seem that the matrimonial trouble in this case, as in others, was produced by words, not actions. It is an amusing commentary on the apostolic warning (James 3 : 5, 8).

RENEWING STRENGTH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength."—ISAIAH 40 : 31.

Human Strength Must Fail—Physical, Mental, Spiritual—Divine Strength Inexhaustible—The Two Connected—I. How a True Church May be Described—They that Wait on the Lord—Upon the Lord Alone—For Grace—For Strength—With Expectation—With Patience—II. What the Lord's People Need—Renewed Strength—Because They are Human—Imperfect—For Safety—For Honor—It is Promised—III. How to Renew Strength—Continual Waiting—By Eating—Resting—Bathing—A Dying Christian's Testimony.

HUMAN strength is of many kinds, but in any form it will spend itself in due time. God can lend to men immense physical force; but though a man had the strength of a lion and an ox combined, he would one day fail. The force of flesh must fade like the grass to which it is likened. Samson sometimes becomes exhausted, and he is like to die of thirst, though he has slain a thousand men; yea, more, he must ultimately die and his mighty thews and tremendous muscles must yield to the worm and return to the dust of death. Since even to constant wear and tear, assuredly man's frail body cannot long be a thing of strength.

> "Our days a transient period run,
> And change with every circling sun;
> And while to lengthen'd years we trust,
> Before the moth we sink to dust."

Mental strength is a noble possession, but it also fails its owner, for at best it is a finite power. The wisest of men by and by feel the infirmities of age creeping upon them, and frequently present the sad spectacle of second childhood. Death pays no regard to science or eloquence. The fool dies, and as surely dies the senator, the philosopher, the divine. When you take up the skull of a sage, you find no weight of wisdom there, nor trace of all the curious movements of a potent brain. Knowledge, genius, imagination, prophetic fire, all depart; even before death they often fail. Baffled by mysteries, balked by prejudice, blinded by pride, the man of great understanding may yet be driven to his wit's end.

So far as even spiritual strength is of the man, himself, so far as you can conceive of it apart from the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost, it also cannot be depended on. The most devout may grow lukewarm, the strongest believer may doubt, the most sanctified may backslide; it is a heavenly strength, but so far as it is transfused into our humanity and becomes a part of ourselves, it also may wax weak, though, blessed be God, it can never utterly die.

Let every man know therefore that whatever his strength may be, of body, mind, or spirit, if it be his own it will fail him one day. Let him see to it therefore that he does not trust it; especially that he does not trust it with eternal hazards or rest upon it for his soul's safety, for which it never can be equal. It will be to be leaning and to find your staff fail you when you are on the edge of a measureless precipice. It will be terrible to be building and to find your foundation washed from under you, and all your handiwork carried away by the flood! Yet so it must be if we are depending upon anything that comes of ourselves.

On the other hand, what a contrast there is as to divine strength! That never fails. It seems almost a superfluity to say as much as that; it abides in joyous fulness, never in the least diminished. In your dire necessity you may draw largely upon Him, but you cannot exhaust Him. You may bring your boundless wants and have them all supplied, but you shall no more diminish His all-sufficiency than when an infant dips his cup into the sea and leaves the sea brimming over upon ten thousand leagues of shores.

What then? These two things seem very far away—man with his faintness, his strength gradually drying up; God with His eternity and inexhaustible omnipotence. If we can bring these two together, if by an act of faith you that are human can be linked with the divine, what a wondrous thing will happen! Then the sacred words of the text will be fulfilled and your strength will be renewed. You are weakness itself, but if you are united to the divine strength you shall be infinitely strong. The cipher is nothing, but with a unit before it it becomes ten. A man is nothing, but with God in him he makes hell tremble.

I have now to speak from my text, first, upon how a true church may be described. "They that wait upon the Lord." Secondly, upon what such a church needs; to renew its strength; and, thirdly, how such a church may renew its strength, and that is by waiting upon the Lord. That which serves as a description of true believers serves also as a direction to true believers: They that wait upon the Lord are the men who may most hopefully be encouraged still to wait upon the Lord that their strength may be renewed.

I. First, then, here we see how may be described; "They that wait upon the Lord." A church such as a church ought to be, consists of men who depend upon the Lord alone, for waiting signifies dependence. Their hope is in God. They rest in God's righteousness as their righteousness, and they receive the great sacrifice provided by God to be their atonement and their acceptance. No man is really a Christian who finds his hope and confidence within himself; he must be looking out of himself to God in Christ Jesus. It is absolutely essential that it should be so. He that is God's beloved is a believer in God; that is to say, a truster in God, a waiter upon God. His one sole confidence is in God his Saviour. This being so with each individual, the whole church can sing,

"Our spirits look to God alone,
Our rock and refuge is His throne;
In all our fears, in all our straits
Our soul on His salvation waits."

If Christians are what they ought to be, they depend upon God alone in their church capacity. God's word is their only creed; they do not add to it anything whatever—no, not a sentence, a gloss, or a thought. They have greatly erred who look upon anything as the authoritative standard of faith but God's own word. The Bible and the Bible alone is the religion of Christians. Those who wait upon the Lord for their creed shall never need to give up their faith for something better, but they shall renew their strength.

Faithful to her Lord in doctrine, a true church also waits upon the Lord for grace, and has faith in the doctrines of grace as the testimony with which she is to work. What am I to teach to my people if I am a Christian minister? If a church is rightly constituted, it says to the pastor, "Teach you what God has taught. Preach Christ crucified. Preach not your own thoughts, nor notions of your own inventing, but what is revealed of God—preach you that, for it shall be the power of God unto salvation." Of this I am assured that, if the truth will not save a man, a lie will not. If the bare unaltered truth of God will not break a man's heart, then it certainly will not break it when it is rounded and toned down and made to look pretty so as to suit the prevailing tastes. No, a church that waits upon the Lord uses only the doctrine of Scripture as its battle-axe and weapons of war.

A church that is waiting upon the Lord always knows namely, in its God. What is the power with which men are to be converted? Eloquence, say some. The church of God says, "Not so. Not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord." I solemnly believe that so much of human oratory as there is in a sermon, so much there is of the weakness of the flesh; for all the power must be of God working with the truth, through the Holy Ghost. Therefore we should use great plainness of speech and never speak for the sake of the language, but always for the sake of the truth we have to say, that God may bless it to the hearts of men. No man in this world was ever converted except by the Holy Spirit, and never will any man be truly converted by any other power.

Bang your drum, brother, and blow your brass instrument if you like, but neither cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, nor any other kind of music, will ever save a soul. Deck your altar out as prettily as you like, and burn your most fragrant incense, but no soul ever finds heaven by the light of candles nor by the scent of censers. The Gospel has salvation in it when the Holy Spirit works by it, but no other doctrine can save. The Spirit of the Lord alone must bless the truth, and He will bless the truth alone. This is the church's sole power with souls. You may go through the world ranting and raving, or you may go arguing and discussing, but you cannot touch a dead heart to make it alive either by excitement or by philosophy. You cannot breathe into the nostrils of a dead soul the life eternal, though your winds should blow hot with fanaticism, or chill with rationalism. Spiritual life can only come in God's way, and it is by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.

But waiting upon God means something more than dependence upon God; so I go a step further; if we depend upon God our expectation is from Him. We wait upon God as the birds in the nest wait upon the parent bird, expecting from her their food. Before she comes you hear their cries, and when she comes if you look into the nest you will see nothing but so many gaping mouths, all waiting, expecting to be filled by the mother-bird. Now, that is just what a church of God ought to be—a company of wide-opened mouths waiting to be filled by the Lord alone. I find it such a blessing to have expecting people about me, for they make a flourishing church. Some brethren here at this time are men of great expectations, for even now while I am preaching they are planning whereabouts they will be in the aisle to talk with folk going out; they reckon that some will be converted by the word, and they are on the look-out to pick them up. These brethren are grieved and surprised if after a service they do not meet with one or two inquirers or convicted sinners, that they may join with them in tearful prayer. They are believers in the power of the Gospel, and they act accordingly. When I fire the gun they are on the alert to pick up the birds, for they believe in of the Word. They could not be content with ineffectual preaching; they expect that the Word will be fruitful, and so they bring their basket to put the fruit in. Oh, if a church would but wait upon God in this sense of expecting great things from Him, it should have them; for He will never allow His people to complain that He has been a wilderness to them. So then a true church depends upon God and expects from God, and in this sense answers to the description—"They that wait upon the Lord."

To make up waiting, I think there is a third thing, and that is patience—to hold out, and wait the Lord's time and will. The three together—dependence, expectation, patience—make up waiting upon the Lord. This "patience" is to the uttermost desirable in a thousand matters, that we may endure affliction, persevere in holiness, continue in hope, and abide in our integrity. Patience is the long life of virtue, and sets on its head the crown of experience. It is no child's play to continue to suffer affliction with joyfulness, and to remain for years perfectly acquiescent in the will of the Lord, let that will be what it may. It needs the eyes of faith to see God in the dark, to believe in His love when He is angry, and to rest in His promise when it tarries long.

Some of my dear brethren in Christ are ardent followers of Christ, but they do not seem to have learned the meaning of that word "patience." They are working for Christ, and they are depending upon the Lord, and they are looking for results; but when they do not quite see them immediately, straightway they are offended and depressed. They are in such a hurry that they seem half inclined to cry "Why should I wait for the Lord any longer?" I dare say that you were much the same when you were children; you wanted everything there and then, and waiting was dismal work to you. We are all impatient as long as we are imperfect. It is the mark of the child that he is in a violent hurry where men are steady. What a sweet thing is

THE CALM LEISURE OF FAITH!

—"He that believeth shall not make haste." Fret and worry, hurry and haste, are all slain by the hand of faith. God has plenty of time; nay, He fills eternity; and therefore He can bear with man's waywardness with much longsuffering. You and I are in feverish haste, but when we get to be linked with God we also can wait, even as God waiteth to be gracious, and hath patient compassion upon men.

That is a description of what a Christian ought to be, "waiting upon the Lord;" depending upon God, expecting from God, and patiently tarrying for God, till He shall give the desired blessing.

WHAT IS NEEDED.

II. But now, secondly, we see what the Lord's waiting people need. They need to renew their strength. Even those saints that wait upon God for everything, may grow faint, and require reviving. And that is, first, because they are human. As long as you and I are mortal we shall be mutable; as the world is full of changes, so are we. Some friends never seem to be either high or low in their feelings; their life has neither hills nor valleys in it, but is comparable to an unbroken plain; they traverse a perpetual level. It is not so with others of us; we are all Alps and Andes. These favored pilgrims march steadily and evenly through the world, always at one pitch and pace; but others of us who mount up into the heavens in burning zeal and holy joy, go low, very low down, into the depths, till our soul sinketh because of sorrow. The best and bravest of the saints are poor creatures. Creatures whose home is on the earth cannot always live upon the wing; they must feel faint at times; and hence the necessity of this blessed promise, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." They will rise again: from their deepest depressions they will leap into supreme elevations; they shall dwell on the heights, they shall soar above the clouds.

They need renewing, also, because in addition to being human they are imperfect. The sin that dwells in us drags us down. However high we have ascended when we have walked in the light, still we have needed that the blood of Christ should cleanse us from all sin. What a blessing it is that failing, flagging, fainting, falling spirits, by waiting upon the Lord, shall renew their strength! Even shall be recovered. "Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down; for the Lord upholdeth him with His hand." Though our sands run very low, God shall fill the glass again, and the believing man shall again rejoice in the Lord, and have confidence in the God of his salvation. Creatures have their rises and their falls, and to us also there must be times when we need to renew our strength; and we shall renew it, for here the promise comes, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength."

Brethren, I will suppose that I am addressing some who have become weak and failing. You must renew your strength. It must be renewed, for otherwise it will decline still further, and this would be painful, dangerous, and dishonoring. The Lord would not have us utterly fail, nor fall prone upon the ground in the heavenly race; therefore, to those who have no might, He increaseth strength.

It is for God's glory, and for our own usefulness, that we should be strong; and if we fall into decline and weakness, pray do not let us stop there. Let us try to escape from a SPIRITUAL CONSUMPTION.

If I address believers, who lament that the whole church with which they are connected is getting weak, I charge them not to suffer it to be so with themselves. Brothers, shun a spiritual wasting away. A pining sickness is an awful disease for a church to die of. Do not linger in such a state. Up with you, and cry mightily unto the Lord, and you shall yet be restored; for it is written, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength."

At this time I should be very glad if this dear church, over which the Holy Ghost has made me an overseer, would have its strength renewed. Everything around us needs to be renewed, and revived, and refreshed; and just at this time I wish that it might be laid on the hearts of the members of the church to pray that we might renew our strength. Your minister grows old; not very old in natural age, it is true, but thirty years of continuous labor in preaching to so vast a congregation has taken much more out of his strength than almost any other form of service would have done; and therefore he needs to be invigorated again—physically, mentally, and spiritually. Many of you are in a like condition, and need that your strength be renewed like the eagle's. This can be done for us all by that great Master, in whose hand the residue of the Spirit abides. He can lay His hand on us, and say, "Be strong, Fear not."

It is promised, and therefore, if we do not have it, it is our own fault. God's promises are our precepts. What He promises to give, it is our duty to seek; and if He promises that we shall renew our strength, why not let us have the promise fulfilled to our faith? I wish that it might come to pass that my dear brethren and sisters in Christ here—men and women who are working for Him, and are a little weary and faint—may be encouraged, cheered, refreshed, and led to say, "From this very time we will serve our Lord with all our youthful vigor, and with a great deal more."

III. So I close with the third point, which is this—

HOW TO RENEW OUR STRENGTH?

If we are God's people we must renew our strength by continually waiting upon God.

When a man wants his bodily strength renewed his purpose may be effected by eating a good meal. He has grown empty through hunger, and there is nothing in him; he must be filled up with substantial nourishment, and then the human engine will generate fresh force. Oh, ye who are weak in spirit, come and feed upon Christ! They that wait upon the Lord in that way, by feeding upon the body and blood of Christ, shall find Him to be meat indeed and drink indeed, and so they shall renew their strength.

Sometimes a man may renew his strength by taking a little rest. He has grown weak through stern labor and long fatigue, and he must be quiet, and repose till he recovers. Oh, ye weary, heavy-laden, where is there rest for you except in the Christ of God? Oh, come to God, and rest in Him, and wait patiently for Him! Then shall your peace be as a river, and then shall your strength be restored right speedily.

We have known strength to be restored by a bath. A weary one has plunged himself into the cool flood, and he has risen quite another man. Oh, for a baptism into the Spirit of God! Oh, to plunge into the Godhead's deepest sea—to throw one's self into the might and majesty of God; to swim in love, upborne by grace!

We have known men's strength renewed by breathing their native air. They have risen out of a hot and fœtid atmosphere into the cool breeze of the mountain side, and the bracing breeze has made them strong again. Oh, to have the breath of the Spirit blowing upon us once again! By Him we were born, by Him we were quickened, by Him we have been revived from former faintness, and it is by breathing His divine life that we shall be filled with life again. Oh, that at this moment we might each one feel the power of the Lord entering into us!

In a word, if a church wants reviving, if saints individually want reviving, they must wait upon God—first in prayer. Oh, what a blessing a day's prayer might be! If you cannot get as much as that, how much renewing may be gained in an hour's prayer! Get with God, brother; be much with God. I am sure that we, none of us, are enough alone with God; but in prayer, laying hold upon the invisible, we shall win strength for service.

Add to that a re-dedication of ourselves to the Lord who bought us. Then afresh realize your entire dependence upon God. Put yourself into the Lord's hands absolutely. Then go forward to renewed action. In renewing your strength, ask the Lord that you may undertake fresh work, and that this work may be done to a nobler tune—that you may have more expectancy, more confidence, more faith, more God-reliance. What things are done by men in common life with self-reliance! But with God-reliance we work impossibilities, and miracles fly from us like sparks from the anvil of a smith. When a man learns to work with God's strength and with that alone, he can do all things. So would I stir my brothers up one by one, and then as a body, to work for God with renewed energy.

I have almost done. I know that there are some here to whom this appears to have very slight reference. Yet if you are an unconverted man, my dear friend, after all, this is a lesson for you; for the pith of it all is that if ever you are to be saved you must get away from yourself into God, and your confidence must be in Christ the Son of God and not in your own strength. One of my greatest delights is to see

HOW OUR PEOPLE DIE.

I have never for years visited the dying-bed of a single member of this church in which I have seen a shade of doubt, or the least suspicion as to their triumphant entrance into the kingdom. I have been somewhat astonished to find it always so. I just now sat by the bedside of one of our brethren who is melting away with consumption; and it was sad to see his wife lying by his side almost equally ill; but when I spoke with him who was so soon to be with God, he said, "As for my faith, dear sir, it never wavers in the least degree. I have my times of depression of spirit, but I take no notice of that. You have told us not to look to feelings, but simply to trust in the infallible Word of a faithful God. Fifteen years ago, sir," said he, "one Thursday night I dropped into the Tabernacle to hear you preach, and, blessed be the day, I looked to Christ and found salvation. I have had plenty of ups and downs, but Jesus has never left me nor forsaken me, and I am not going to think that He will do so now. His word stands fast forever. My strength is in my God." He added, "I am not resting upon man in any degree or measure, but wholly upon the faithful promise of God, and the precious blood of Christ."

I wished that I could get into his place, and not come here to-night, but just slip off to heaven as he is doing. It makes one sure of the Gospel when you see men dying so. It nerves me to come and tell it out again to men and women. The Gospel which I preach to you is good to live upon, and good to die upon. If you will but trust my Lord you shall find it a blessed thing to depart out of this world, and be forever with the Lord. Death shall lose every air of dread; every ghastly gloom shall be taken from it. It shall be but undressing to go to bed, that you may wake up in the morning in royal robes as a courtier of the King of kings. Only you must have done with yourself, and commit yourself to Christ.

Say to-day in life what you will want to say when you come to die—"Father, into Thy hand I commit my spirit." That is a Gospel-prayer. If you are waiting upon the Lord in the sense of complete reliance upon the merit of Jesus, you shall in dying renew your strength, and leap out of your frail body into the presence and glory of God. In due time also you shall reassume your body, but it shall be made like unto Christ's glorious body, and in its resurrection you shall emphatically renew your strength. Blessed be His name that He has taught many of us to wait upon the Lord! May He teach you all to do so, for Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. Spurgeon writes from Mentone to the readers of his sermons: "Thus have I completed twenty-nine volumes of sermons without a break. When I commenced printing them, little did I dream that 1756 would follow in succession, and continue to be received by the Christian Church with favorable regard. I am very grateful. How great a labor this publication has thrown upon me, few of my readers can ever know; but their edification has been my full reward. I make bold to beg the renewed prayers of the thousands of my readers. Many of them have sent me help for my many Christian enterprises, and I am sure they will continue to do so, and will also yield me their loving intercessions. Long as time lasts, may these discourses speak in many tongues the glorious Gospel of the blessed God! No new notions are preached in these pages. The truth of the unchanging Word is that which I have always proclaimed. 'Modern thought' finds no friend or spokesman in me. Quite enough boast of their 'progress;' my glory is to be 'steadfast, unmovable.' Pray that I may be as a brazen wall to this generation."

THREE WELCOME DOLLARS.

By S. A. K.

IN the year 1860 I was living with my sister in Maryland. I had agreed to work with her for my victuals and clothing, but whenever I could get a day's work in the neighborhood I was to have what I earned thus for spending-money; but as wages were low and work scarce, I never had much money.

One Sunday morning I walked five miles to a school-house in York County, Pennsylvania, to attend a meeting, the object of which was to organize a Sunday-school there. A young man, Mr. K., addressed the meeting, and then went round to see how much he could get subscribed toward the expense of starting the school. He asked me what I would give. I could not say, as I had no money on hand, but he told me I could have some time to make it up, so, hoping to earn it, I said he might put down one dollar for me. He did so, and went to the next one, who agreed to give fifty cents; another subscribed twenty-five cents; the object was gained, the school organized, and we were all told to bring the promised money at the time appointed.

As I walked home in company with several young ladies, one said to me, "Why did you put down one dollar? Now, I promised fifty cents, and I know my parents will be displeased, and it is your fault." "It is the same way with me," said another; "I subscribed twenty-five cents, and I would not have done so if it had not been for you. I know my parents won't like it."

I did not blame them for dreading the displeasure of their parents, as I was at that time myself an exile from my father's house because I had gone to church against his will; but their words pained me, as I was sorry to think that my giving had caused them trouble.

We soon came to two cross roads, and while they took the left-hand road that led to their several homes, I alone took the right-hand road, which led for about three miles along a forest, where, as it was noonday, the trees made a refreshing shade.

Three Welcome Dollars. (See page 43.)

As I walked along this lonesome road I felt very sorry for my young friends, and as the tears began to roll down my cheeks, I thought, "What if I cannot earn the money, and will have to ask my sister for it? She may not like it; and she cannot afford to give it to me."

My distress now became great, but just then there came a gentle whisper, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." "Yes," I said, thinking that sweet text had come to my relief, "'The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof;' there is nothing impossible with God, He can well supply my wants, and I will ask Him for the money;" so I went into the forest behind a rock, and kneeled down and poured out my heart in prayer to God. I told Him that the earth was His, and the fulness thereof; and He could provide me with the dollar I needed,

As I walked on I thought perhaps I would find the money, as Mr. L., a minister, did, when he, a boy, prayed for money to get school-books, and found just the amount he needed in the road; but when I arrived at my sister's house without finding it, I changed my mind, and thought some one would employ me to work, and I could earn it thus. So every day I looked for some of the neighbors to come and employ me to work for them, and every evening as I retired to rest the tempter would say, "Now another day is gone and you have not got that money yet." But, as often, I would say, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof; there is nothing impossible with God—He can enable me to get the money yet."

Saturday evening came at last; the next day the money was to be paid.

Just at that crisis I saw a gentleman whom I knew ride up to the house. Thinking he would be a guest for the night, I hastened to the dairy and went about my duties. But he did not go into the house, but came to the dairy, and after speaking a few words to me he said, "Here, Susie, I will give you a present," and at the same time handed me a small bit of paper, so small that I feared there was nothing in it, but that he was going to play a joke on me; yet I thanked him for it, and after he had mounted his horse and rode away, I entered the house, and going to the candle, I said to sister, "Mr. L. gave me a present; I must see what it is." But judge my surprise when I saw enclosed three little gold dollars.

With a glad and thankful heart I carried one of the gold dollars to the Sunday-school on the morrow: and I taught four little girls in the Testament class all that summer. They are grown women now, some of them in homes of their own, and I hope to meet them in a better home by and by.

The man that gave me the three dollars was a stranger in the place; he lived many miles away, and whatever led him to come there just at that time and give me the gift I never could understand; but I never doubted that God sent him.

GEORGE CLIFFORD'S FLIGHT.

"WE are all here except George," said a white-haired gentleman, looking around the room one Thanksgiving evening. "He is seldom out of my thoughts, but on Thanksgiving day I think of him all the time."

It was the old story of the ninety and nine. Gathered in that room with Mr. Clifford and his wife were their three sons and two daughters. They were all intelligent and dutiful, grown now near to manhood and womanhood, but honoring their father and mother, and heedful of their wishes with even more care than when they were children. The old couple were happy in the thought that their prayers were answered, and that each one of their five children had given their hearts to the Saviour. But one son was not there. George, the favorite boy, the wittiest, brightest of the family, was absent, and none knew where he was.

"Father," said Charles, the youngest son, "why did George go away so secretly? Was no reason ever discovered for his sudden disappearance?"

"Yes, my son, your mother and I know the reason, but we have never spoken of it, for it could do no good. But we may not live to see you all here again on another Thanksgiving day, and I think—eh, mother?—it is time the secret was told."

"Yes, father," said the old lady, as two tears ran down the withered cheeks, "tell them; it is better they should know."

"You all remember," began the aged father, "the sad day five years ago when the news came that George was missing. You remember I went to New Orleans, where he was employed, to find out all I could about it. It was little enough I discovered after the long journey. His accounts were correct, and his employers gave him the best character for honesty and ability. At his boarding house there was nothing to be learned. They could not, or would not, account for his sudden flight. It was only after I returned home that I learned the cause.

"One morning I received a letter from George's wife. A poor, miserable, ill-written, ill-spelled letter, asking for money. I had inquiries made, and found out how much the poor boy must have suffered before he resorted to the desperate course of running away. The marriage was regular and valid. I saw the proofs of it. But the wife—she was the most hopeless case I ever saw. George met her first, it appears, at a variety theatre. The boy was passionately fond of music, and he was induced to go, as so many young men are, 'just once,' to hear a new song well sung. The boy was enchanted, and went again and again. His fancy was taken by the singer; he was introduced to her, and eventually married her.

"Nothing but misery could come of such a union. The girl—she was little more—had not a single sentiment or taste in common with George, except the love of music. She was gay, frivolous, lazy, dirty, and fond of liquor and cards. All this she concealed until George had married her, but he must have suspected something of it or he would not have kept his marriage a secret from his mother and me. Finally, the boy left her and went to reside at a boarding-house, giving her two thirds of his income for her support.

"George was not quit of her on those terms, however. She was continually in debt and constantly sending him appeals for more money. She went back to the variety stage, but her earnings were spent as quickly as she received them. Finally, she took to applying to your brother at his employer's store, and George pawned and sold all he had—except his clothes—to satisfy her. At length, driven to despair, he one day quitted the city, leaving no trace behind."

"Poor George," said Etta, "I never had any idea of this. He must have been mad, though, to run away."

"Ah! my dear, we do not know how distracted he must have been. I only pray that he did not commit suicide. If he is but alive to-day there is hope for him, and I charge you all that if ever he returns when I am dead, that you give him a hearty welcome. Tell him that his father and mother forgave his desertion and never ceased to pray for him while they lived."

A deep silence fell on the family group as the venerable man ceased speaking. Every one was absorbed in sorrowful thought. "Let us pray," said Mr. Clifford, and then, bending before the throne of grace, he poured forth an earnest petition for his son's repentance and restoration.

It was some six months later that a letter arrived from Australia for Mr. Clifford in the well-known handwriting. "Father, forgive me," were its opening words. "I have by God's grace found mercy in His sight, but I long for your forgiveness, and I am coming home to obtain it." Then followed a confession of all his sad story, of which he supposed his father was ignorant.

The letter found Mr. Clifford stretched on a bed of sickness, but the flickering life received new vigor as he learned that the wanderer was coming home. He would have risked his life by going to meet him at the docks if he could have had his way, but his son Charles pledged himself to be there without fail, and the old man, charging him with the kindest messages, remained at home.

Charles Clifford was the first of the crowd of waiting friends to step on board the vessel as she drew up alongside her wharf, and running up the gangway clasped George's hand with both his own.

"Are my father and mother still alive?" was George's first question. For five years he had never asked, but now it seemed as if he was bursting with anxiety. He "had come to himself."

There was a long and anxious talk that night about George's wife, and finally it was decided that he should go and bring her to his northern home. Removed from bad associations and under the influence of George's mother and sisters, it was hoped that she might be rescued. It was too late to do much for her life George found, when he saw her. The fatal disease, consumption, had fastened its hold upon her. But he carried her to his home, and there, tenderly nursed by his mother, she spent the few remaining months of her life. It was not without hope that they laid her body in the tomb, for her husband's unexpected kindness and the gentle influences of his home had a softening effect upon her in her physical weakness, leading her to repentance and faith.

George Clifford commenced life anew, and sought by constant care to atone to his father and mother for the years of sorrowful anxiety his misconduct had caused them. But there are some things it is impossible to undo. He saw with deep remorse that his father's white hairs and the furrows on his mother's brow were largely due to his sin, and he constantly prayed that God would forgive him the sins of his youth.

The Native Elders of the Churches of Amoy, China.

SEVEN NATIVE ELDERS.

THE progress of mission work in China is in one of its characteristics a type of Christianity everywhere. Other religions have a caste or tribe set apart for priestly service, and the work of propagating the doctrines of that religion. But Christianity expects every convert to be a worker. The man whose whole being and life have been transformed by the Holy Spirit, and who by faith in a living Saviour is living a resurrection life, must tell to his fellow-men the good news of a free salvation for all.

This is what has been done in China. The converts have willingly undertaken to distribute religious tracts and to explain, as far as they were able, the doctrines of Christianity, and much good has resulted from their labors. Among the most earnest of these native converts were the seven men whose portraits appear on this page. Their conversion was due to the blessing of God on the labors of the missionaries of the Presbyterian Church, and they immediately commenced work for Christ. So energetic and so earnest were they, that in the Amoy district not less than six hundred persons in various villages made a profession of Christianity. It was thought well to form a small church in each village, and that being done these seven men, having proved by their lives the sincerity of their profession, were appointed elders over them. The missionaries continued to exercise the oversight of the churches, but the work of teaching and visiting was committed to the native elders.

They have justified the confidence reposed in them, and God has abundantly blessed their labors. The prejudice existing in China against foreigners has been one of the most stubborn obstacles in the way of American and English missionaries, but this obstacle does not impede the native preachers. They have been able to preach the Gospel to people who would not listen to a foreigner, and in places where none but a Chinaman would obtain admission.

Gradually but surely this vast people, who have so long sat in darkness, are being brought to see the great Light. The accounts sent home by American missionaries and by missionaries from England, notably by those who are working under the auspices of the China Inland Mission, encourage the hopes of the Church. The Gospel of Jesus is as potent in its influence there as in professedly Christian lands. Christ, who saves men from drunkenness and debauchery and all kinds of sin, can save the heathen from his idolatry. It is only necessary that the Church be in earnest in this matter, praying continually for God's blessing and supplying the missionary societies with funds. God will keep His promise, and His word will not return to Him void.

POVERTY'S PREY.

The Burglars.

IT was a dark night when Blackett and David, having matured their well-laid plans, entered the quiet street, and surveyed the front of the house they were about to break into. The street-lamps made it clear enough. On one side stood a high warehouse, empty and closed for the night, unless there should be some watchman in it, of whom there was no sign; on the other was an unoccupied dwelling-house, with the bills "To let" grown yellow in the windows. There was no light to be seen in any casement in the short street; for people who work hard go to bed early. To get to the little yard at the back of Mrs. Linnett's house, it was necessary to turn down a narrow passage beyond the unoccupied tenement, and to climb over a wall, in which there was no door. But there was no difficulty in doing this, even for Blackett; and David was over it in an instant. It was the dense darkness of a cloudy night, and the overshadowing gloom of the high walls surrounding them, which created the only perplexity.

"It's as dark as the black hole," muttered David; immediately afterward stumbling over a bucket, the iron handle of which rattled loudly. He stood perfectly still and motionless, while Blackett grasped the top of the wall with both hands, ready for instant flight.

But there was not a sound to be heard in the house, or in either of the buildings on each side. All about them there was a dead hush, unbroken by any of the numerous noises of life and toil with which the streets were full in the day.

This little, ancient dwelling-place, left standing between two more modern and much loftier buildings, looked as if it was pinched in and hugged between them, with its old, half-timber walls, and low yet high-pitched roof, with a single gable, and a dormer window in it. David could make it out in the gloom, as he stood breathless and motionless in the shadow of the wall, listening for any sign of moving within. He was not afraid; there was nothing to be afraid of. In three minutes he and Blackett could be safe away.

But he felt something like reluctance to break the stillness and tranquillity of the little, quiet house. Besides, there were only an old man and old woman in it. If they made any noise and resistance, what would Blackett do—Blackett, who was always savage when his blood was up? A number of thoughts seemed crowding through his brain, as he paused, with his eyes and ears all alert, to catch any token of the waking and stirring of the old folks. But it was only for a few minutes. A church-clock near at hand chimed four quarters, and then struck one. The spot was as desolate at this hour as it ever could be.

"We're not going to do 'em any hurt, you know," he whispered to Blackett, "for luck's sake. They are old folks, you said. We'll not hurt 'em."

"No, no!" answered Blackett, laughing within himself in the darkness. He would like to be even with old Euclid, and pay off the grudge he had owed him these many years. There was bound to be a scuffle, though there was no danger for himself or David in it. Two strong, active men would find it mere play to overpower Euclid and Mrs. Linnett; and Bess would not count for much. What would David do if he found out that Bess was in it? If he could, he would silence her first, before David knew who she was.

But though there was no light to be seen, and no movement to be heard, in the dark little house before them, there was a quiet, noiseless stirring within, which would have frightened them away, or hurried them on in the execution of their project, if they had but known it. Mrs. Linnett was a light sleeper; and she had been broad awake when David stumbled over the bucket, and she heard the clatter as loudly as he did. Her bedroom was the one whose window overlooked the yard; and she had drawn aside the curtain a very little, and peeped cautiously into the gloom. Blackett's figure, with his hands upon the wall, ready to leap back, from the inner side of it, was quite visible, even in the dark night.

Would it be safe to increase the alarm of the thieves by showing herself? She was afraid to do that, lest it should fail. Her room was crowded with seamen's chests, piled one upon another, seven or eight of them, left in her keeping by old shipmates, who had trusted their possessions confidently to her care. She stepped quietly back to the bed, and woke up Bess, who was sleeping the deep, unbroken sleep of girlhood.

"Hush, Bess! hush!" she whispered, laying a hand on her mouth. "There's robbers in the yard! Get up quietly, and slip out at the front, lass, and run for your life to the police. It's for me and Euclid, and the mates away at sea. It's nigh upon one o'clock in th' night; and we might all be murdered before anybody 'ud hear us shout for help."

So, while David was listening and watching in the yard, Bess was rapidly getting on some clothing; and, as Blackett began to remove the pane through which he could unfasten the kitchen-window, she was creeping down-stairs, from step to step, with stealthy and noiseless feet. She heard the quiet grating of the tool Blackett was using, and her teeth chattered with fright. But she stole by unseen into the little shop beyond; and letting down the old-fashioned wooden bar, and turning the key cautiously, she opened the door, closed it after her, and fled swiftly down the deserted and silent street.

There was so little difficulty in opening the kitchen-window, that, in a few minutes, Blackett and David were both inside, and now lighted the small lantern they had brought with them. They moved about as quietly as they could, though they had no fear of the consequences of arousing the inmates, whom they could easily gag and bind if need be. But there was still no sign or sound of waking in the house. Mrs. Linnett, indeed, was standing within her room, with her door ajar, hearkening, and peering down the staircase, and wondering, as she trembled with dread, how long Bess would be; but they could not know she was watching for them until they went up-stairs.

And now fly, Bess! fly! If you meet any belated wayfarer in the street, or see the light of any watcher in a window, give the alarm quickly. Give way to no terror that might hinder you. Every minute is worth more than you can count. Run swiftly—for old Euclid, fast asleep after the day's toil; for Mrs. Linnett, shivering with helpless fright; for the mates at sea, and for Roger, whose goods are in danger. And yet, Bess, if you did but know who it is that has broken into your quiet house as a thief and a robber, you would fly back more swiftly than you are running for help; and with your arms about his neck, as when you were little children together, and your voice pleading in his ear, you might save him even now at the last moment!

Blackett cast a glance over the little shop with its miscellaneous wares, and round the small kitchen; but it was plain there was no booty there. The miser's hoard and the seamen's chests must be in the bedrooms, and they wasted no more time before mounting the narrow and winding staircase. Euclid was not sleeping in his closet, as Victoria was away; and the door of the front room stood at the top of the crooked stairs. They pushed it open, and the light of their lantern fell full upon the old man's face.

"Why, it's old Euclid!" shouted David in a loud and angry voice.

"Ay, ay! Is it time to be stirring?" he asked, rousing himself, and looking up in bewilderment.

"Curse you! you never told me who it was!" cried David, turning fiercely upon Blackett.

But the old man had already sprung up, forgetful of his feebleness; and, calling upon Mrs. Linnett to fasten herself in her room, he flung himself with desperate courage upon Blackett. Blackett shook him off with ease, and, seizing him by the throat, threw him down on the floor, and knelt upon his chest, with a savage cruelty in his eyes.

"Get up!" cried David, struggling to pull him away; "you sha'n't murder him, and me stand by."

"I'll half-murder him," muttered Blackett. 'I'll have my revenge."

Then began a deadly conflict between them; Euclid, as soon as Blackett's hand was off his throat, helping in the fray with the feeble daring of old age. The chair on which David had set down the lantern was upset; and the light went out, leaving them in utter darkness as they swayed to and fro about the room, never loosing one another, amid oaths and threats, and smothered groans from Euclid, growing fainter and fainter, as Blackett and David fought above him.

But now Bess was speeding back again, with two policemen running at a few paces behind her. The clanking of their footsteps on the pavement below was the first sound which broke in upon the struggle, and brought it to a pause. David heard it first, and loosed his grasp of Blackett in an instant. The steps had not yet reached the door; and in a moment he was down the staircase, and ready for flight by the way he had come. But Bess, whose light, swift feet had made no noise, was already within the house; and she sprang forward to arrest him, clasping him in her strong young arms with a vehement and tenacious grasp, from which he could not free himself. The policemen were but a few paces behind her.

"Oh, be quick!" she called. "He's here! I can't hold him long."

Her voice was shrill and strained; but David knew it too well. It was Bess who was holding him with such passionate strength, and his own strength seemed to melt away at the sound of her cry. The little sister he had loved so well, and been so proud of—his poor mother's little lass!

"Bess," he groaned, "it's me—David!"

With a wild, terrified, heart-broken shriek, the girl's arms fell from their close grasp of him, and she sank to the ground at his feet as if he had struck her a deadly blow. But, had he wished it, there was no time to escape; for the foremost policeman caught him firmly by the arm, and held it as if it had been in a vise.

"If you want to hinder murder," cried David, "be sharp up-stairs. Take me along with you; but, for mercy's sake, lose no time."

Were they in time? or was it already too late? Old Euclid lay motionless on the floor, his withered face and gray hair stained with blood; and Mrs. Linnett was kneeling beside him, calling to him to speak, or look up at her. The window was open, showing the way by which the murderer had escaped. The second policeman started off at once in pursuit of him; while the other, who dared not loose his hold of David, looked on at Mrs. Linnett's vain attempt to raise the old man, and lay him on his bed. The whole room was in disorder; for the short struggle had been very violent.

"I'm David Fell," said the prisoner in a strange and lamentable voice. "I never knew as it was old Euclid we were goin' to rob. I'd ha' cut off my right hand first. Handcuff me, and tie my feet together, if you can. Only see if the old man's dead or not."

"Nay, I must see you safe first," the policeman answered. "None o' your tricks and dodges for me. Come along, and I'll send help as soon as I can."

Bess was crouching on the floor down-stairs, slowly coming to her senses; and David stood still for a moment, as the light of the policeman's lantern lit up her white and scared face, and terrified eyes.

"She's my sister," said David again, in the same strange and lamentable voice. "Bess, I'd sooner have drowned myself in the river than come here to spoil your life!"

Bess covered her face with her hands, shivering, and listened, in faint and deadly sickness, to the sound of David's retreating footsteps, till they were lost in the stillness of the night.

When Bess, after a few minutes of almost deadly anguish, crept feebly up-stairs, she found Mrs. Linnett still kneeling beside old Euclid, who was stretched upon the floor. The policeman's lamp, set upon the mantel-shelf, lit up his blood-stained face and hair, and displayed the disorder of the room. She helped Mrs. Linnett to lift up the old man, and lay him on the bed; and then she sped away again to fetch a doctor, though not so swiftly as she ran before for help against the housebreakers. Would she ever run so fast again?

By the time she returned, a woman had been sent from the police-station, and a policeman was on duty in the house. The doctor, who followed her quickly, after a brief examination of old Euclid, said he could discover no serious wound, but that it was impossible to tell how grave the injuries he had sustained might prove. He had the blood washed from his face and hair; and, after that, Euclid lay still, much as if he had been asleep; only his pulses beat very faintly, and life seemed to have ebbed away to its lowest tide.

The morning came; and policemen were coming and going all day long, examining the premises, and asking the same questions over and over again—or so it seemed to Bess. Neighbors crowded in to chat with Mrs. Linnett about the perils of the night, and to take a peep at the unconscious old man, who had been almost, if not quite, murdered. The question was, whether he would die or live. David refused to give up his accomplice; but Blackett had been arrested on suspicion.

Nothing more could be done until Euclid's consciousness returned—if it ever returned—and he could give his evidence. A policeman was stationed there until this should happen. At last night came on again, and Bess, refusing to leave old Euclid, persuaded Mrs. Linnett to go to bed; while the doctor, finding three or four neighbors whispering and buzzing in the room, ordered them all away, and told Bess to watch him by herself. She sat beside him hour after hour, sleepless, yet almost stupefied by her sorrow. Could it be true that David had done this cruel, wicked deed? And, oh! if Euclid died, what would be done to him? The sickness of despair filled her whole heart as this thought came back to her in spite of all her efforts to shut it out.

"Bess," whispered a very low, faint voice, in the dead of the night, "it was our David!"

"Yes," she whispered back again in Euclid's ear. But a deep throb of agony struck through her as she heard him say it was David.

"He fought for me agen Blackett," said Euclid. "He saved my life. Blackett 'ud ha' murdered me."

With a loud sob, Bess fell on her knees by the bedside. Thank God, David was not as bad as he had seemed! He had not joined with Blackett in his savage purpose. David was not a murderer! Oh, what a load seemed suddenly rolled away from her girlish heart! Her brother was only a thief!

"He saved my life," murmured old Euclid over and over again, as though his brain was bewildered still. "Bess, he saved my life."

THE GOSPEL IN THE LIFE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 27, James 4 : 7–17. Golden Text, Gal. 2 : 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

How to Live the Gospel—Nothing Expected of the Dead—Submission the First Step—Painful Ordeals—The Duty of the Double-Minded—Death Precedes Life—Discipline Directed to the Weak Point—A Common Sin—Violation of the Law of Love—Plan-making—An Unremembered God—Deferring to God's Will—Christ's Rule.

OUR golden text shows us the ground on which we can live the life taught us in our lesson for to-day. Paul is speaking of his own experience, when he says, "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me." As crucified with Christ, we can have no self-life, and therefore can expect nothing from ourselves, and God can expect nothing from us. To blame a dead man would be absurd, to expect anything from him, equally absurd. If we really, by faith, take the place of death, and reckon ourselves, not only condemned, but executed on the Cross, in the body of Jesus, we shall then understand what it is to deny, or ignore ourselves in every sense, and acknowledge Jesus only.

Paul knew, and fully entered into,

and consequently we never find him considering how things affected him, but always how they affected Jesus; we find him never counting on himself, but always on Jesus. When misjudged he said, "With me it is a very small thing to be judged of you, or of man's judgment" (1 Cor. 4 : 3). When in prison, he did not feel any self-pity nor any bitterness against the Roman Government — not Paul lived; it was Christ in him who owned that he was "the prisoner of Jesus Christ," "the prisoner of the Lord" (Eph. 3 : 1; 4 : 1). When writing from his prison to the Philippians, instead of grumbling that he was restrained from preaching the Gospel, he saw the divine side (Phil. 1 : 12–20). His occupation in prison was as far from self-consideration as anything could be; he wrote to cheer the very disciples who were out of heart because of his imprisonment; and prayed such prayers "in the Holy Ghost" as might perhaps never have been possible in the midst of his activity (Eph. 3 : 13–20). In all this we see he ignored himself; living as though he was never to be thought of, and taking his very own place, as a member, and only a member of another body, another life, Christ. "To me to live is Christ" (Phil. 1 : 21), "not I live but Christ," and thus he was enabled to see all things from the divine side, all persons (himself included) from the divine standpoint. Thus he knew that "all things work together for good to them that love God." Many Christians take this stand, but when they are tried, they leave the ground of faith, and recommence to recognize themselves instead of Jesus.

The Apostle James is very practical; and in our lesson he gives what might be considered practical directions for leading a life crucified with Christ "Submit yourselves therefore to God:" i.e., in every circumstance recognize God. Is there some unexpected turn in your business which may lead to ruin?

SUBMIT TO GOD;

if He wants you to be ruined, then submit; you and your business too are His property, if you are a consecrated man, and it is worth the loss of all you have, to do or suffer the will of God. Has something arisen in the life of one nearly connected with you, which may appear to other Christians as though you were most inconsistent in your teaching, and you have no power to justify yourself, although your whole soul has been against it? Well, your Christian reputation belongs to God; if He wills it to perish, so long as you count it His, He has a right to dispose of it; submit to God. Has something occurred to bring your children into the very surroundings from which you have always shrunk, and you are powerless to help it? what then? Does God love those children less than you? Is His desire for their full salvation less than yours? His, who died to save them? Submit to God, and leave the consequences to Him, counting Him able to keep them even in the fire. Are you hindered from doing that Christian work which has been your joy for years? Submit to God; He loves souls a thousand times more than you do. Wherever He calls us to trust Him in the dark, the consequences are safe with Him, He cannot err.

But we are to resist the devil or withstand the devil. How? Just by submitting to God. In every circumstance, the devil is ready to suggest, "God demands such and such a thing of you; now in such circumstances you see it is impossible." And so he will seek to bring God in guilty. Now, when we acknowledge God in everything, we withstand the devil, by standing on ground where he cannot reach us. So long as persons and circumstances occupy us, we are on ground which is open to Satan, for we leave our position as crucified with Christ; but as soon as our refuge is in God, we are unassailable. It is thus we "draw nigh to God and He will draw nigh" to us.

The apostle next speaks to the unreal,

THE DOUBLE-MINDED,

who, while claiming a position as God's children, seek also the friendship of the world. James does not spare such; "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded. Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness." There is no slipping into a deeper experience of God, without going through humiliation. There are many who will come to holiness conventions, and patronize the speakers, as though they would deceive both them and themselves into the belief that because they agree with the teaching, they are therefore possessors of the experience. In the Christ-life, death always precedes, for His is resurrection life. There must be a breaking down of the human, before there can really be the divine. "Be afflicted" does not mean afflict thyself, but "give in when God afflicts thee, own thou art in the wrong when God convicts thee." Often the hinderance to blessing is on one single point; it may be idolatry of the creature, it may be intense self-love, it may be self-confidence, it may be a want of exactitude. God will bring about circumstances which will bear on this very point, and it is that God says, "Be afflicted, and mourn and weep. . . . Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and He shall lift you up." Thank God, He never wants to keep us down, and only desires us to humble ourselves in order that He may lift us up.

James now reproves evil speaking, one of the most common among the sins of Christians. "Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law." James has before spoken of the royal law "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" and he now shows how all the evil speaking among Christians is in direct condemnation of this law of love. "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye have love one to another" (John 13 : 35). It is not in love that we speak evil of another, and our very words show us false witnesses of the law of love. As crucified with Christ, and seeing all from His standpoint, the failings of others are the opportunity to bring them in contact with God. Jesus Himself, who "came not to judge the world, but to save the world" (John 12 : 27), said, "Judge not, that ye be not judged" (Matt. 7 : 1). Paul said, "Thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest." Christ in us cannot judge, but seeks to save. The Lord permits us often to see the fault in another, on purpose that we who know His power and love in lifting us up, may lead them to know it also. To speak evil of them may result from the desire to contrast ourselves with them—a clear evidence that I live and not Christ in me; or from a fault-finding disposition, which is again a strong evidence of self-life, "There is one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy: who art thou that judgest another?"

The apostle next speaks of

without the recognition of the will of God. Unbelief has discarded this deference to the will of God in our plans which we are here taught, and introduced it to neutralize the prayer of faith. Thus we find Christian people starting a new business, if it suits them, without any reference to the will of God; taking journeys, making engagements, spending money, or accumulating it, as the case may be; making acquaintances, building houses, etc., without ascertaining the will of God. But when it comes to claiming a distinct promise which the Lord has given, they will introduce, "If it be Thy will." Now, we believe that if the will of the Lord were deferred to in the entering into Christian work, as is always the case with George Müller, Dr. Cullis, Mrs. Guiever, etc., there would be no more desperate appeals to man for money, because there would be a confident appeal to God for help; not an "If it be," but "Because it is Thy will." When we are subject to the will of God in any of our undertakings, we are as willing to give them up as to carry them out, should the Lord show it to be His will and thus subject, He makes His will clear to us. But the very common prayer, "Lord, do this, if it be Thy will," precludes the possibility of faith; we know, without praying at all, it will be as He wills, and thus prayer becomes unreal.

Again we come back to the crucifixion with Christ; if I am crucified with Christ, then my will is crucified; not my will lives, but Christ's will lives in me. Christ did nothing of Himself (John 5 : 30), but only carried out His Father's mind and will (John 14 : 10). Christ in us can have no choice, can desire nothing but to know the Father's will and do it; and therefore can do nothing without deferring to God; choice about anything shows clearly that we live and not Christ in us. Thus James teaches us that it is becoming to say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that," and that any rejoicing in our own boasting is evil. "Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Most lovingly does God show us here that He does not condemn us for lack of knowledge which we do not yet possess. As we walk near to God, light is ever on the increase, it is ours to live in all the light we have.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Christian Inhabitants of Khartoum, native and foreign, have commenced their flight toward Egypt proper. Warning has been given that the False Prophet will put to death all who, falling into his hands, will not declare themselves true Mohammedans. His mission he regards as essentially religious, and he is declared to entertain a more ferocious hostility toward Egyptian Christians than toward Europeans. The Mohammedan inhabitants are preparing to sack the city as soon as the Christians have finally withdrawn, and it is only with difficulty that a general massacre and pillage has been prevented. England has insisted that Egypt shall abandon the Soudan to El Mahdi. The Khedive is reluctant to obey, but as he cannot conquer it himself and cannot obtain assistance for the work, it is expected that he will yield.

The Egyptian Cabinet Resigned on January 7th. The cause of the downfall of Cherif Pacha and his colleagues is believed to have been the decision of England as to her future policy in Egypt. It was communicated on Saturday, January 5th, and two days later the premier and the other officials vacated their offices. England assured the government that she would maintain her position in Egypt. The ministers, apparently deceived by French boasters, thought that England would retreat. England also guaranteed to the Khedive protection against the Mahdi or any other foreign enemy, stipulating however, that there should be a reform in the administration, and that she would only defend Egypt proper against invasion. Nubar Pacha, the new Premier, is an Armenian Christian who has travelled extensively and is familiar with European courts. The reforms he has undertaken will be carried on under the superintendence of an English agent.

China Evidently Expects to go to War with France. The demand for an indemnity, if made, is likely to bring matters to a crisis. The Viceroy of Canton has notified the consuls of his intention to blockade the northern approach to the city, and also to lay torpedoes at the other approach, known as the Macao Reach, which is obstructed by a bridge at the south end of Dane Island. A threat has also been made that the duty on foreign importations into China, instead of being abolished, will be doubled, to recoup China for her heavy expenses in placing the army on a war footing. French advices from Pekin report that the feeling of the Chinese populace is all for war. The movements of native military forces are incessant, and it is calculated that over two hundred thousand Chinese troops are now armed with Remington rifles. Strong earthworks and fortifications are being constructed upon the roads leading to Pekin, especially on the road from Chang-Hai-Kouan, as the Chinese engineers think that invasion by any other route is impossible.

The King of Belgium has Invited General Gordon to assist Mr. H. M. Stanley in opening up the region of the Congo. General Gordon has accepted the offer solely in order to continue the crusade against the slave trade in Africa. As a measure toward extirpating slavery he declares that he will enlist a force of at least one thousand blacks, with which he will hunt the slave dealers, intercept their caravans and release their victims from the Congo to the Red Sea. He applied to the British Government for permission to undertake the duties maintaining his rank in the British army, but the permission was refused the distinguished officer, who then, at considerable loss, placed the resignation of his command in the British army in the hands of the government.

The Feud in Ireland between the Orangemen and the Nationalists still rages. The Orange lodges have published a platform on which they demand that every loyal citizen shall take his stand, but the Roman Catholics of all classes repudiate it. In the county Cork alone one hundred and forty-eight magistrates have declared that loyalty and Orangeism are incompatible, and that they will not be coerced into inaction or submission by the braggadocio of the anti-Catholic partisans. The Orange societies are making arrangements for a series of meetings to be held in England and Scotland, but the efforts of the rival religious factions to create a kulturkampf for Ireland excite small interest outside of Ireland.

The Famous Indian Reformer, Keshub Chunder Sen, is dead. He was not a Christian, though he did a good work in preparing the way of Christian missionaries in India by attacking the errors of the Hindoos and Mohammedans. The miseries produced by the maintenance of caste especially received his attention, and though he was of high caste he voluntarily forfeited his privileges, and taught his disciples to regard all men of every caste as brethren. He published several volumes of sermons and tracts, in which he avowed a belief in the unity of God, in immediate revelation, in the necessity of a new birth, in the immortality of the soul and the efficacy of prayer. His morality was pure, and he inculcated reverence for the character of Jesus Christ, but repudiated the doctrines of Christ's divinity, mediation and atonement as taught in the Gospels. His creed was similar to that of the Unitarians.

Anglo-Indian Feeling against the Ilbert Bill, which permitted native Indian judges to try Europeans, has been so decided that in deference to it the government has granted a compromise. In the present form of the bill no native of lower rank than a district judge or magistrate will be empowered to exercise criminal jurisdiction over Europeans. Moreover, when a European is brought before a native judge, the prisoner will be entitled to be tried by a jury, the majority of which must be composed of Europeans. This compromise has disarmed the opposition, and the London Times correspondent, who has vigorously denounced the Bill, praises "an arrangement which, if not very logical or symmetrical, has at least the advantage of putting the law on a firm and, it is to be hoped, a lasting basis, and of closing the most acrimonious controversy ever witnessed in British India." A yet more burning question, however, is likely to arise, as it is stated that Lord Ripon is about to carry out the wishes of the Home Government, and disestablish the English Church in India. To commit so delicate a task to a Roman Catholic Viceroy is sure to excite suspicion of personal animus.

Mr. Henry George is Receiving an Ovation in England. The working men crowd to hear his explanation of his theory of the land question, and applaud vigorously his denunciation of landowners. His scheme for stripping the landlords of their estates and nationalizing the land evokes, however, the violent opposition of the press, even of the radical newspapers. The London Pall Mall Gazette, which has always taken the lead in the land reform problem, repudiates Mr. George's pet measures for the non-compensation of landlords for the land which, by legislation, may be wrested from them. This, it says, would be simply wholesale robbery, supplemented by sickening cant. The editor concludes: "We have no objection to socialism plus the ten commandments."

Successful Temperance Work in Ireland is being conducted by Mr. T. E. Murphy, who has been holding large meetings in the Protestant Hall, Bandon, where about 200 signed the pledge; and in the Protestant Hall and Town Hall, Waterford, where 500 signed the pledge. He has also visited Monegall, and the Town Hall, Newtownards, and in each place was received with much enthusiasm, and realized gratifying success. Archdeacon Stewart, of Banridge, and Bishop Chester, formerly at Parsonstown, took a prominent part in his meetings in the localities mentioned, Sir William Cunninghame, at Moneymoor, being among the latest of those who have cordially espoused the temperance cause. Mr. Murphy on January 1st, 1884, commenced a mission in Larne, near Belfast, then in Belfast Ulster Hall on January 4th. The newspapers are comparing the enthusiasm aroused by Mr. Murphy, Jr., to that of the memorable movement of Father Mathew which they say did not surpass in interest or area of success this work of Mr. Murphy's. His eloquence, untiring energy, and unfailing good humor have won him goodwill wherever he has been.

A Modern Prison Philanthropist has Appeared in the person of Mr. Charles Cook, the well-known evangelist of London, who is about to visit the prisons of Asia and Africa. His chief object is to carry about 10,000 copies of the Gospel to the prisoners in those countries. He hopes also to visit Italy for the same purpose. On the African coast poor prisoners are often thrown into dungeons and left to rot or starve, uncared for by the authorities. A hole is left in the wall, where any person may throw them food, but they only exist by the charity of the people. Mr. Cook expects no difficulty in obtaining access to these places, and asks our readers to help him by prayer in carrying the Word of God to those who have no chance of otherwise getting it. Mr. Cook's portrait and a sketch of his life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 15th, 1881, when he visited America.

The Day of the Dead in Paris has Recently been observed. This year the ceremony seemed more general than usual, and the cemeteries were crowded from morning till night. Some 500,000 persons visited the various graves, Père La Chaise claiming the largest number of visitors, and many who had no relative or dear friend buried in Paris paid their respects, and hung their wreaths on the tombs of different celebrities. Some monuments were perfect beds of flowers, and even the poorest cross had its tiny medallion or bead wreath, to be bought from the stalls on the way to the cemeteries. The floral wreaths grow bigger each year, and some of the most beautiful were made of natural dark purple heartsease tied by a pale blue ribbon embroidered with gold pansies, or of white chrysanthemums—emblems of despairing love—fastened with black velvet embroidered with doves.

The Christian Officer.

FREDERICK HUGH CHANCELLOR, the genial and accomplished Christian officer, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece this week, was born in Scotland on the family estate of Shieldhill, Lanarkshire, in the year 1824, and at the time of his sudden death in November, 1882, was in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

His impulses attracted him toward an active life, and he was characterized by a marked affability of temperament; he chose the profession of a soldier, and went to Woolwich, when quite a young man, for the purpose of qualifying himself to hold an officer's commission in the Royal Artillery, and at once plunged with his whole heart into the frivolous and fascinating pleasures in which his fellow-pupils spent their leisure time, with whom, on account of the general attractiveness of his manner, he became and remained a general favorite.

IN SPAIN AND CANADA.

Having been intrusted with a command, Mr. Chancellor was for some time quartered in Spain, where his unreserved surrender of himself to enjoyment ended, unhappily, in his leading a wild life, undisturbed by any thought of God, or of the perilous condition of an impenitent sinner before Him. His removal to Canada when he was about twenty-four years old only seemed to intensify his love of pleasure, and he became conspicuous, even among his worldly-minded brother-officers, for his devotion at the shrine of earth's unsatisfying pursuits and glittering frivolities.

In the year 1850, however, the Holy Spirit convicted him of sin, and showed him his need of a Saviour. He was stricken down by a sense of his sinfulness and by the consciousness that if death came to him while he was in that state he would be lost to all eternity. His penitential cries for mercy were prolonged and earnest, and, as is always the case when such prayers are offered from the heart, they were heard, and henceforth, in the exercise of an unquestioning faith in Christ, he realized the unspeakable joy of salvation. Never was change more complete, or transformation more thorough. Everything was altered, all things became new. The process, however, leading up to this crowning consummation was an interesting one, and its relation may have a beneficial significance for others.

When the light of truth was first flashed into his mind, and anguish and sorrow followed his recognition of his real state before God, he, in his search for peace, very naturally sought the society of some whom he knew to be real followers of the Saviour, but they, regarding him as avoided him. Disappointed and pained, therefore, he was thrown upon his own resources, as he supposed, though he afterward realized that he had the unfailing compassion which God extends toward every penitent prodigal son. One day as he was riding on horseback, his heart bowed down with grief, and the sunshine of life apparently extinguished by his overwhelming conception of his unworthiness in the sight of heaven, he was startled by the recollection crossing his mind apparently unconnected and unbidden of the pathetic words in Luke 15: "But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him," he at once saw God's love for sinners and His eager willingness to save them, and make them happy.

It was not long before he became the friend of some earnest Christian men in his own regiment, among whom was Captain Vandeleur, a man of singular purity of character and deep spirituality. Young Chancellor joined in their prayer-meetings, Bible-readings, and other services with conscious and abiding benefit. Through their instrumentality he arrived at a clear perception of the danger and folly of worldly society and amusements, and severed himself from them. But one evening he had been induced by former friends and by the force of circumstances, which Satan often employs to attract back to his service those who are escaping, to attend some festivities, which unexpectedly ended in a dance. The result of that dance might have been the loss of the young man's soul, if God had not used the remark of a careless, unconverted comrade, not a Christian friend, as the means of wrenching him finally from the fascinations of the ball-room. Amid the whirl of the giddy dance that night he suddenly encountered the amazed and mocking gaze of a former companion of jovial hours, who, exclaimed somewhat derisively,

"WHAT! YOU HERE, CHANCELLOR!"

(See frontispiece.) The young Christian, instantly recognizing his inconsistency, watched his opportunity to escape, and fled at the first moment possible, bidding adieu to the ball-room forever. From this time he entirely abandoned all worldly amusements, and he afterward always and most emphatically urged upon young Christians the same course, as being the only one of loving loyalty to their Lord and of safety to themselves.

The words of a brother-officer and intimate companion, together with a few incidents, will best describe him as he was in the earlier stages of his new life:

"IN AMERICA

it was our frequent custom, when off duty, to take a walk into the country and admire the marvellous works of God, for to Chancellor every leaf seemed to speak of a gracious Creator—every flower reminded us of Him who spoke so touchingly of the lilies of the field; and even the rocks and the waters of the great lakes told of Christ, who could still the winds and the sea by His word. Our wanderings were seasons of profit to us both.

PRAYER IN A FOG.

"On one occasion when I had to visit an island about twenty miles from our station, Chancellor accompanied me. We breakfasted with our common friend, Captain L., who had offered to take us out in his yacht. We started accordingly, a fourth friend joining us. The text for the day given in the Christian calendar we both used, was Prov. 3: 6—'Trust in the Lord with all thine heart and lean not to thine own understanding.' The wind was fair, and we ran about ten miles out, when we got into a dense fog, and the wind dropped into a dead calm. We knew not what to do, and there was no little danger in remaining where we were, and still greater danger in going ahead. Remembering the words of the text, we knelt down on the deck and asked God to fulfil to us His Word and direct our path.

"Chancellor and another went to the bow and the other two to the stern to look for God's answer. Almost immediately, those at the bow saw the fog open about two yards, and, looking through the lane thus opened, the lighthouse was distinctly visible about ten miles off. Chancellor instantly shouted, 'Bring the compass! make haste! I see the lighthouse.' The compass was brought, and the bearings taken with all possible speed. (See frontispiece.) Then came the question, 'Have you got it all right?' 'Yes; all right!' No sooner was this answer given, than the fog closed in again and all was as dense as before. We were all amazed and filled with praise to God. Soon afterward a breeze sprang up, and we steered through the fog by compass, and ran in harbor as securely as we could have done in broad daylight.

AN INDIAN SQUAW.

"On another occasion we decided to hunt up a poor Indian squaw in her wigwam, several miles in the depth of the forest. We followed a deer-track, and at last arrived at our destination. This woman had heard some years before from a Christian missionary the good news of the Gospel, and had embraced it. She was a Christian, and had much blessing from God. She had been brought safely across the bay in a small canoe by two drunken Indians, and when we asked her if she was not frightened at the sight of the waves, the reply was, 'Me never saw the waves, me see Jesus only.' We then asked her if she had had any particular answers to prayer. Her reply was, 'No, nothing extraordinary, only one day my husband came in from moose-hunting, and threw himself down on the wet floor of the wigwam. He had had no food for three days, and was so completely exhausted that he could not move. I thought he must die. I tried to move him and drag him on to the bed. I pulled one arm, then the other, but as he was a heavy, tall man, I could not move him. I then said, O Lord, help me! then I take him up and put him on the bed quite easy, but that's all.'

"A few years after his conversion Colonel Chancellor had a long and wearisome illness, and often upon referring to it, he said if he had not been a Christian he could not have borne all he then went through. At this time he was brought face to face with death, and had a realization of spiritual things which he never lost. He seemed like one who had had a glimpse of the unseen world, and when at last raised up from his bed of suffering he went forth with a burning and quenchless desire—to win souls to Christ."

INTEREST IN MISSION WORK.

Regarding the Free Kirk of Scotland as the true realization of what a Christian church should be, Colonel Chancellor identified himself with its membership, became one of its elders, and remained in fellowship with it until the day of his death. He took a deep and ever-growing interest in evangelical mission work, both at home and abroad, and occasionally spoke at the meetings of Mr. McAll, Miss de Broen, and Miss Booth, in Paris. His special delight was in talking to soldiers of the love of Christ, and he very frequently obtained leave of absence, and took long journeys to address the old pensioners at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, as well as the men in the Soldiers' Homes at the great military camps in different parts of the country. (See frontispiece.)

SERVICES FOR HOTEL SERVANTS.

His hand and his heart were ever ready to aid and urge forward the Lord's work. He was an active member of an open-air mission, and often took his part in street-preaching in the most degraded districts of the East End of London. He also cordially seconded the efforts of his amiable and devoted wife in throwing open their house for weekly meetings, especially for the benefit of hotel servants. Of these, large numbers, both native and foreign, attended, and many date their conversion to Christ to the loving words and Gospel invitations they heard in Mrs. Chancellor's drawing-room. The Germans who came were much struck by the fact that the services were conducted by people who were not clergymen, and that among the speakers were lords and counts, who had no selfish motive in making the effort to do them good. Until they attended those meetings, they had the idea that those who spoke on religion did so as a matter of business.

One day a German came to Colonel and Mrs. Chancellor and said that he was going back to his own country. "Sir," he said, "I always thought that those who spoke to men about their souls did so because it was their business; but when we see such gentlemen as you going to the trouble of turning your drawing-room upside down, regardless of the inconvenience or expense, it has made me, for one, think that religion must be a very real thing."

A TOUR THROUGH EUROPE.

In the summer of 1880, Colonel Chancellor took a tour through Europe with his wife. They visited Brussels, first, just at the time of the Exposition Nationale, and it occurred to both of them that it would be doing an acceptable and useful service for their divine Master to invite the waiters of the hotels and Exposition to a tea-meeting in a large tent in the neighborhood. The idea was quite novel to the foreigners, and failure was prognosticated, but the gathering took place, and with the happiest results. At the close, each of the guests was presented with a copy of the New Testament, as a souvenir. One man said, "I must tell my wife, that she may come to your meetings while you are in Brussels; I never knew there was such a Saviour who cared for us."

One day the colonel with his wife and two friends took a carriage which they filled with tracts and Gospels, and drove to the principal Exhibition gate, where the mixed crowd of peasant bourgeois and noblesse passed in. There they took up their position, and were soon surrounded by an eager crowd anxiously asking for the little books. Many a priest came up, curious to know what was going on, and asking also for a little book. So crowded was their carriage this day with eager applicants for tracts, that they had frequently to drive away lest they should block up the road. They were then pursued by boys running after them, crying out breathlessly, "Un petit livre, Monsieur, s'il vous plait!" (a little book, sir, if you please).

MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS.

In October, 1882, Messrs. Moody and Sankey conducted their memorable mission at Plymouth, and Colonel Chancellor went down specially to help in the work of the inquiry-room and after-meetings. "It is the most glorious time I ever spent in my life," is the remark he expressed in a letter, written from the very midst of the joyous scene in which he found employment.

The following month the distinguished evangelists were at the ancient university city of Oxford, and on November 24th, Colonel Chancellor went down with the intention of again engaging in the happy work of leading anxious penitents to the feet of the Saviour. But on his arrival he found that there were no after-meetings, with the exception of those held by Lord Radstock, in the Clarendon Rooms, for the undergraduates, and in these he thankfully took part. On Saturday evening, November 25th, after a solemn address by the Rev. Mr. Christopher, the colonel was desired to say a few words. He did so, and with earnestness and affection pressed upon the audience the solemn truth, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." He said: "I could not lay my head peacefully on my pillow if I were not assured by believing the Word of God that all who truly believe in Christ are 'justified from all things' (Acts 13 : 39). The state of uncertainty about their salvation which some Christians think to be the normal thing is a most unsatisfactory state, which can never promote grateful love to the Saviour and willing work for Him."

He then narrated the particulars of a conversation which he once had with a brother-officer who was living an ungodly life. He strove to persuade him to repent and give his heart and life to the Lord Jesus, saying: "Your horse or mine might stumble this moment and either of us might be suddenly killed. While you remain in unbelief, apart from Christ, you have the wrath of God above you and hell beneath you. But I know from God's Word that as I truly trust in Christ as my Saviour, sudden death would be to me, a sinner saved by the grace of God, sudden glory."

This avowal was made with solemnity and assurance. Colonel Chancellor reiterated at the meeting the statement he had made to his friend, and spoke of the quiet peace and comfort which he enjoyed in consequence of that conviction. He closed by urging all who heard him to seek salvation through Christ, assuring them of a like result in their own case. A deeply solemn feeling was produced in the meeting by the colonel's address. But two days later that feeling was suddenly and strangely deepened. Those who had listened to Colonel Chancellor's avowal heard with surprise that the event of which he had spoken as a possibility had actually occurred.

had come upon him.

November 26th was Sunday, and Colonel Chancellor rose in his usual health, and after breakfasting set out to walk to church. He was proceeding down one of the principal streets of the city when he was observed to stagger and fall. (See frontispiece.) A passer-by hurried to his side, and others speedily arrived. Medical aid was summoned, but without avail. The good colonel, who had so recently declared his conviction that sudden death would be but a sudden introduction to the glories of heaven, had passed away in a moment. A spasm of heart disease did its fatal work quickly, and the spirit, which in health and youth had been committed to Christ's keeping, winged its flight to Him who had redeemed it.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Rapid Disappearance of Lake Tulare in California is announced by a San Francisco journal, which characterizes the phenomenon as one of the most remarkable geographical changes of this country within historical times. A few years ago the lake was thirty-three miles long by twenty-one miles wide, and now it is but fifteen miles long and has an average width of less than eight miles. This result is attributed largely to human agency. The cutting of timber on the mountains, and more especially the tapping of the water courses by which the lake is replenished, by the boring of artesian wells, and appropriating the waters of rivers for irrigation, make it impossible that the lake should supply the loss incurred by evaporation and maintain its former level. The human agency described did not, it will be observed, remove water out of the lake—that was done by natural processes—it simply diverted the sources from which it was replenished. The operation is a type of the drought of spiritual life in the soul. The believer who permits his habit of reading God's word and communion with his Father to be interrupted will find his religious life dry up (Jer. 3 : 21–23).

A Train was Stopped by Antelopes in the West, recently. The Elko (Nev.) Independent describes the narrow escape from a serious accident experienced by the passengers on a west-bound train between Green River and Granger, on the Union Pacific Railroad. It appears that the snow was quite deep and drifted in places, and as the engineer looked ahead he saw a herd of more than a thousand antelopes running on the roadbed, finding that the easiest road to travel in. When they were first encountered many of them were killed, and the engineer, seeing that the train might be derailed unless it was slowed up, decreased the speed. The antelopes kept a short distance ahead of the engine, but kept to the road which they occupied for a quarter of a mile. They would occasionally get some distance from the engine and then they would stop, turn round, and watch the headlight until the engine was fairly upon them. They delayed the train half or three-quarters of an hour. The animals had not the sense to leave the path on which the monster was travelling, which had slain some of their number. The poor creatures, not being endowed with reason, were unable to recognize the safe course. The same excuse, however, cannot be made for men who do not quit the path of drunkenness and other vices, though they see their fellows slain by their side (Prov. 7 : 26).

A Discarded Horse has been Reinstated by a Fire Brigade at Virginia, Nev. The horse was known as "the Old Gray." A Virginia journal says: "Old Gray was trained regularly every day, and he soon came to know as much as anybody about what he ought to do. After a year or two of hard work Old Gray was retired to a furniture wagon. Three days after his retirement he was in front of an auction store, hitched to an express wagon loaded with furniture. All at once an alarm of fire was sounded. Old Gray waited about the length of time that he thought it should take to hitch him to the hose-cart, and then he started. The furniture was scattered from one end of the street to the other, but Old Gray reached the fire before the opposition cart, and with a self-satisfied air backed up to the hydrant. Next day he was returned to the department. His devotion to duty was appreciated." This prompt obedience to the call of duty was the result of habit in the old horse. It is not the first time that the lower creation has set an example to human beings (Isa. 1 : 3).

Ten Years of Darkness Ending in Restoration to the light have led to strange sensations in an eminent professor in Union College, N. Y. The Schenectady Union, referring to the recent successful operation by which Dr. Backus has been cured of cataract, says: "Dr. Backus's joy on returning to his family, able to see their faces for the first time in ten years, cannot be described. Many whose voices were perfectly familiar to him, were in their faces entire strangers. He had never seen his grandchildren. Some friends had changed and grown old in ten years, and but for their familiar voices would scarcely have been recognized. In the city the changes have been as great. The Young Men's Christian Association, of which Dr. Backus had been an influential member for many years, had built a large and handsome structure on State Street, and he had passed it every day for years, but never saw it until last week. So throughout the city the doctor is almost a stranger, and each day finds some improvement over ten years ago." Many of the sights the good doctor is now enabled to see would not be so great a surprise to him, because his former enjoyment of sight must have prepared him for them; but to one who was born blind such an experience must be passing strange. It is a fit type of the change that the Holy Spirit works in conversion, when old things pass away and all things become new (John 9 : 39).

A Child Rescued from a Bear in Colorado Appears to have had an experience neither she nor her parents are likely to forget. It appears that a ranchman in Grand Valley, named George Swift, when riding away from home recently, put his little daughter on his horse, and after she had ridden about forty rods from home he lifted her off the animal and told her to run home. On returning about an hour later he found that the little one had not arrived, and, going to the place where he had last seen her, he found bear-tracks in the sand. A posse was formed, and a careful search was made for the lost child. As the searchers were passing a swampy spot where the undergrowth was thick, they heard her voice. They called to the little girl to come out of the bushes, but she replied that the bear would not let her. The men then crept through the brush and when near the spot heard a splash in the water, which the child said was the bear. They found her standing upon a log, extending half-way across the swamp, and it seemed as though the bear had undertaken to cross the swamp on the log, and, being pursued, left the child and got away as rapidly as possible. She had received some scratches about the face, arms, and legs, and her clothes were almost torn from her body, but the bear had not bitten her seriously, though the marks of his teeth were found upon her back, where he had taken hold of her clothes to carry her. The tracks of the bear and the marks of its teeth on the child furnished convincing proof of the truth of her story. The great enemy of souls, who is ruthless as a bear, and who is constantly carrying off children, young men, and maidens, from our midst, is not so easily scared from his prey. Only when One mightier than he comes to the rescue is the perishing soul delivered (Luke 4 : 36, 41).

THE GLORIOUS MARCH.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached on Sunday Morning, January 20, 1884.

"Fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."—SOLOMON'S SONG 6 : 10.

Unfair Criticism of the Church — Unjust Disparagement — Christian Philosophers — False Shame—An Old Captain's Advice—Threefold Glory—I. Fair as the Moon—Her Beneficent Rule — Plaintive and Soothing — A Borrowed Light—The only Light-Giving Institution—II. Clear as the Sun—The Joy Giver—Banishing Gloom and Terror—And Mystery—The Church at Full Meridian—III. Terrible as an Army—The Old Flag—The Banner of Recruit—Assured Victory—The Troops—Two Wings—The Shout of the Army of Xerxes—Welcome to Victorious Germans—The Celestial Gates.

THE fragrance of spikenard, the flash of jewels, the fruitfulness of orchards, the luxuriance of gardens, the beauty of Heshbon fish-pools, the dew of the night, and the splendor of the morning—all contribute to the richness of Solomon's style when he comes to speak of the glory of the Church. In contrast with his eulogium of the Church, look at the denunciatory things that are said in our day in regard to it. If one stockholder become a cheat, does that destroy the whole company? If one soldier be a coward, does that condemn the whole army? And yet there are many in this day so unphilosophic, so illogical, so dishonest, and so unfair as to denounce the entire Church of God because there are here and there bad men belonging to it.

There are those who say that the Church of God is not in which we live; but I have to tell you that, notwithstanding all the swift wheels, and the flying shuttles, and the lightning communications, the world has never yet been able to keep up with the Church. As high as God is above man, so high is the Church of God—higher than all human institutions. From her lamp the best discoveries of the world have been lighted. The best of our inventors have believed in the Christian religion—the Fultons, the Morses, the Whitneys, the Perrys, and the Livingstones. She has owned the best of the telescopes and Leyden jars; and while infidelity and atheism have gone blindfolded among the most startling discoveries that were about to be developed, the earth and the air and the sea have made quick and magnificent responses to Christian philosophers.

The world will not be up to the Church of Christ until the day when all merchandise has become honest merchandise, and all governments have become free governments, and all nations evangelized nations, and the last deaf ear of spiritual death shall be broken open by the million-voiced shout of nations born in a day. The Church that Nebuchadnezzar tried to burn in the furnace, and Darius to tear to pieces with the lions, and Lord Claverhouse to cut with the sword, has gone on, wading the floods and enduring the fire, until the deepest barbarism, and the fiercest cruelties, and the blackest superstitions have been compelled to look to the East, crying, "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"

Yet there are people who are ashamed to belong to the Church of Christ, and if you ask them whether they are in such associations, they say, "Yes, I sometimes attend the church;" instead of realizing the fact that there is no honor compared with the honor of being a member of the Church of God. I look back with joy to the most honored moment of my life, when in the old country meeting-house the minister of Christ announced my name as a follower of the Lord.

You who are floating about in the world, seeking for better associations, why do you not join yourself to some of the churches?

was riding in the cars toward Philadelphia, and a young man sat down beside him. He said, "Young man, where are you going?" "I am going to Philadelphia to live," replied the young man. "Have you letters of introduction?" asked the old captain. "Yes," said the young man; and he pulled some of them out. "Well," said the old sea-captain, "haven't you a church certificate?" "Oh, yes," replied the young man; "I didn't suppose you would want to look at that." "Yes," said the sea-captain, "I want to see that. As soon as you get to Philadelphia, present that to some Christian church. I am an old sailor, and I have been up and down in the world, and it's my rule, as soon as I get into port, to fasten my ship fore and aft to the wharf, although it may cost a little wharfage, rather than have my ship out in the stream, floating hither and thither with the tide."

O men and women, by the tides of frivolity and worldliness swept this way and swept that way, seeking for associations and for satisfactions for the immortal soul, come into the Church of Jesus Christ. Lash fast to her. She is the pillar and the ground of the truth. I propose to speak of the threefold glory of the Church, as it is described in the text:

I. First,

"FAIR AS THE MOON."

God, who has determined that everything shall be beautiful in its season, has not left the night without charm. The moon rules the night. The stars are only set as gems in her tiara. Sometimes before the sun has gone down the moon mounts her throne, but it is after nightfall that she sways her undisputed sceptre over island and continent, river and sea. Under her shining the plainest maple leaves become shivering silver, the lakes from shore to shore look like shining mirrors, and the ocean under her glance with great tides comes up panting upon the beach, mingling, as it were, foam and fire.

Under the witchery of the moon the awful steeps lose their ruggedness, and the chasms their terror. The poor man blesses God for throwing so cheap a light through the broken window-pane of his cabin, and to the sick it seems like a light from the other shore that bounds this great deep of human pain and woe. If the sun be like a song, full and loud and poured forth from brazen instruments that fill heaven and earth with harmony, the moon is plaintive and sad, standing beneath the throne of God, sending up her soft, sweet voice of praise, while the stars listen and the sea! No mother ever more lovingly watched a sick cradle than this pale watcher of the sky bends over the weary, heart-sick, slumbering earth, singing to it silvery music, while it is rocked in the cradle of the spheres.

Now, says my text, "Who is she, fair as the moon?" Our answer is the Church. Like the moon,

SHE IS A BORROWED LIGHT.

She gathers up the glory of a Saviour's sufferings, a Saviour's death, a Saviour's resurrection, a Saviour's ascension, and pours that light on palace and dungeon, on squalid heathenism and elaborate scepticism, on widow's tears and martyr's robe of flame, on weeping penitence and loud-mouthed scorn.

She is the only institution to-day that gives any light to our world. Into her portal the poor come and get the sympathy of a once pillowless Christ, the bereaved come and see the bottle in which God saves all our tears, and the captives come, and on the sharp corners of her altars dash off their chains, and the thirsty come and put their cup under the "Rock of Ages," which pours forth from its smitten side living water, sparkling water, crystalline water, from under the throne of God and the Lamb. Blessed the bell that calls her worshippers to prayer. Blessed the water in which her members are baptized. Blessed the wine that glows in her sacramental cups. Blessed the songs on which her devotions travel up and the angels of God travel down.

As the moon goes through the midst of the roaring storm-clouds unflushed and unharmed and comes out calm and beautiful on the other side, so the Church of God has gone through all the storms of this world's persecution and come out uninjured, no worse for the fact that Robespierre cursed it, and Voltaire caricatured it, and Tom Paine sneered at it, and all the forces of darkness have bombarded it. Not like some baleful comet shooting across the sky, scattering terror and dismay among the nations, but above the long howling night of the world's wretchedness the Christian Church has made her mild way, "fair as the moon."

II. I take a step further in my subject—

"CLEAR AS THE SUN."

After a season of storm or fog, how you are thrilled when the sun comes out at noonday! The mists travel up hill above hill, mountain above mountain, until they are sky lost. The forests are full of chirp and buzz and song; honey-maker in the log, bird's beak pounding the bark, the chatter of the squirrel on the rail, the call of the hawk out of the clear sky, make you thankful for the sunshine which makes all the world so busy and so glad. The same sun which in the morning kindled conflagrations among the castles of cloud stoops down to paint the lily white and the buttercup yellow, and the forget-me-not blue.

WHAT CAN RESIST THE SUN?

Light for voyager on the deep; light for shepherds guarding the flocks afield; light for the poor who have no lamps to burn; light for the downcast and the weary; light for aching eyes and burning brain and consuming captive; light for the smooth brow of childhood and the dim vision of the octogenarian; light for queen's coronet and sewing-girl's needle. "Let there be light."

Now, says my text, "Who is she that looketh forth clear as the sun?" Our answer is, the Church. You have been going along a road before daybreak, and on one side you thought you saw a lion, and on the other side you thought you saw a goblin of the darkness, but when the sun came out you found these were harmless apparitions. And it is the great of Jesus Christ to come forth "clear as the sun," to illumine all earthly darkness, to explain, as far as possible, all mystery, and to make the world radiant in its brightness; and that which you thought was an aroused lion is found out to be a slumbering lamb; and the sepulchral gate of your dead turn out to be the opening gates of heaven; and that which you supposed was a flaming sword to keep you out of paradise is an angel of light to beckon you in.

The lamps on her altars will cast their glow on your darkest pathway, and cheer you until, far beyond the need of lantern or lighthouse, you are safely anchored within the veil. O sun of the Church! shine on until there is no sorrow to soothe, no tears to wipe away, no shackles to break, no more souls to be redeemed. Ten thousand hands of sin have attempted to extinguish the lamps on her altars, but they are quenchless; and to silence her pulpits, but the thunder would leap and the lightning would flame.

The Church of God will yet come to

and in that day all the mountains of the world will be sacred mountains touched with the glory of Calvary, and all streams will flow by the mount of God like cool Siloam, and all lakes be redolent with Gospel memories like Gennesaret, and all islands of the sea be crowned with apocalyptic vision like Patmos, and all cities be sacred as Jerusalem, and all gardens luxuriant as paradise, with God walking in the cool of the day. Then the chorals of grace will drown out all the anthems of earth. Then the throne of Christ will overtop all earthly authority. Then the crown of Jesus will outflame all other coronets. Sin destroyed. Death dead. Hell defeated. The Church triumphant. All the darknesses of sin, all the darknesses of trouble, all the darknesses of earthly mystery, hieing themelves to their dens. "Clear as the sun! clear s the sun!"

III. "TERRIBLE AS AN ARMY

ith banners." I take one more step in this ubject, and say that if you were placed for the efence of a feeble town, and a great army were een coming over the hills with flying ensigns, hen you would be able to get some idea of the error that will strike the hearts of the enemies f God when the Church at last marches on like an army with banners."

You know there is nothing that excites a soldier's enthusiasm so much as an old flag. Many man almost dead, catching a glimpse of the ational ensign, has sprung to his feet and start-d again into the battle. Now, my friends, I on't want you to think of the Church of Jesus Christ as a defeated institution, as the victim of nfidel sarcasm, something to be kicked and uffed and trampled on through all the ages of he world. It is "an army with banners." It as an inscription and colors such as never tirred the hearts of any earthly soldiery. We ave our banner of recruit, and on it is inscribed, Who is on the Lord's side?" Our banner of efiance, and on it is inscribed, "The gates of ell shall not prevail against us." Our banner f triumph, and on it is inscribed, "Victory hrough our Lord Jesus Christ!" and we mean o plant that banner on every hill-top and wave at the gate of heaven.

With Christ to lead us we need not fear. I ill not underrate the enemy. They are a tre-endous host. They come on with acutest trategy. Their weapons by all the inhabitants f darkness have been forged in furnaces of verlasting fire. We contend not with flesh and lood, but with principalities and powers and piritual wickedness in high places; but if God e for us, who can be against us? Come on, ye all into line! Close up the ranks! On, hrough burning sands and over frozen moun-ain-tops, until the whole earth surrenders to od. He made it; He redeemed it; He shall ave it. They shall not be trampled with hoofs, hey shall not be cut with sabres, they shall not e crushed with wheels, they shall not be cloven ith battle-axes, but the marching and the onset nd the victory will be none the less decisive for hat.

With Christ to lead us, and heaven to look own upon us, and angels to guard us, and artyr spirits to bend from their thrones, and he voice of God to bid us forward into the com-at, our enemies shall fly like chaff in the whirl-ind, and all the towers of heaven ring because he day is ours. I divide this army with ban-ers into —the American wing and the European wing. he American wing, starting from these Gospel atitudes, will march on across the wilds of the Vest, over the tablelands, come to the ocean, o more stopped by the Pacific than the Israel-tes were stopped by the Red Sea, marching on ntil the remaining walls of China will fall be-ore this army with banners, and cold Siberia ill be turned to the warm heart of Christ, and ver lofty Himalayan peaks shall go this army ith banners until it halts at Palestine.

TWO WINGS

The European wing will march out to meet it, nd Spanish superstition shall be overcome, and rench infidelity shall be conquered; and over he Alps, with more than Hannibal's courage, hall march that army with banners, and up hrough the snows of Russia, vaster in multi-ude than the hosts that followed Napoleon into he conflict. And Hungary and Poland, by the lood of their patriots and by the blood of hrist, shall at last be free. And crossing into sia, the law shall again be proclaimed on Sinai, nd Christ, in the person of His ministers, will gain preach on Olivet, and pray in Geth-emane, and exhibit His love on Calvary. And hen the army will halt in front of the other ing, the twain having conquered all the earth or God.

History tells us that one day

TWO ARMIES OF XERXES

shouted all at once, and the vociferation was so mighty that the birds flying through the air dropped as though they were dead. Oh, what a shout of triumph when all the armies of earth and all the armies of heaven shall celebrate the victory of our King—all at once and all together: "Hallelujah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Hallelujah! for the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ."

When the Prussian army came back from their battle they were received in 1866 at the gates of Berlin, and a choir stood above the gates, and as the first regiment advanced and came to the gates, the choir in music asked them what right they had to enter there. And then the first regiment in song replied, telling over the stories of their conflicts and their victories. Then they marched in, and all the city was full of gladness and triumph.

But oh, the greater joy when the army with banners shall come up to

THE GATES OF OUR KING!

It will be choir to choir, music to music, hosanna to hosanna, hallelujah to hallelujah. Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let them come in. Then will be spread the banquet of eternal victory, and the unfallen ones of heaven will sit at it, and all the ransomed of earth will come in and celebrate the jubilee, with unfading garlands on their brow telling of earthly conquests.

All the walls of that celestial mansion will be a-glitter with shields won in victorious battle, and adorned with the banners of God that were carried in front of the host. Harp shall tell to harp the heroism in which the conquerors won their palm, and the Church that day will sit queen at the banquet. Her wanderings over, her victories gained, Christ shall rise up to introduce her to all the nations of heaven; and as she pulls aside her veil and looks up into the face of her Lord the King, Christ shall exclaim, "This is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

A BOSTON STREET WAIF WHO BECAME A MINNESOTA LAWYER.

(From the Youth's Companion.)

TWENTY years ago, a gentleman visited the Massachusetts Reform School, and selected a boy to take into his family. The one chosen was a wild, wiry fellow, who had been sent there from the Boston streets. He quietly accompanied the gentleman, until they arrived in Boston. While on the way to a depot, his old impulses to evil returned, and he suddenly darted from the gentleman's side and ran up a side street full of tenement houses, the abodes of crime and dissipation. The gentleman, being fleet of foot, soon collared the boy and forced him to walk to the cars.

Unpromising as was the beginning of the effort to make a good man of a bad boy, the gentleman determined to persevere.

After a few weeks, his kindness won the boy's heart. Love for a good man took the place of his evil desires. The expulsive and impulsive power of a new affection caused him to slough off his wild influences and gave him a new purpose. Then he began to show himself tractable, obliging, steady, and gifted with unusual force of will.

The love of a good person is a transforming power. It creates a desire for good; the desire inspires a right purpose. One of the most noble things a good person can do is to often allow a weak person to share their sympathy and society.

One day the boy did not surprise his patron by telling him that he would like to go to school. He had been expecting it, and had formed his plans. Instead of sending him to an academy and paying his expenses there, he helped him to obtain work, by which he paid his own bills.

He took a special course at a neighboring academy, and as soon as he had completed it, announced that he intended to be a lawyer. His foster-father, staggered at this rapid stride, tried to dissuade him from his purpose, as he thought him unfitted for that profession. But the boy, with characteristic determination, persisted.

He entered a lawyer's office, earned a little money, and after a year's study went West.

He who a few years ago was a wild boy, trying to break away from all good influences, is to-day one of the most successful lawyers in Minnesota, and better than that, a man whose influence in society is elevating, Christian, and helpful to others.

Is it not thus that Christ transforms life by leading us to love Him who is holy, and bringing a new purpose out of our new affection?

The Amount Received by the Treasurer of the Hospital Fund from the recent Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections amounts to $37,-742.08. The sum is comparatively small for the great city of New York, but it forms an acceptable addition to the funds of the hospitals. Other cities which have not yet commenced the system will do well to inaugurate it.

Husband and Wife Beaten for Christ.—The Rev. J. R. Wolfe, who is engaged in a prosperous missionary work at Hong-Puang, in China, writing home recently, describes the readiness with which the people listen to his words about Christ, and the earnestness shown by the converts to learn all they can about Jesus. Some of the members of this Hong-Puang congregation have suffered severe persecution during the year on account of their faith. One poor woman was dragged through the mud and cruelly beaten because she would not worship the ancestors according to the heathen practice, nor pay money toward the idolatrous ceremonies. Her husband had also been beaten, but as he was able to escape, he did not suffer very much. The poor wife lay speechless on the bed for some days. "While in this condition," says Mr. Wolfe, "I visited her, and it was indeed sad to look on the pale, wan face of the poor bruised body lying one the pallet, but delightful to witness the number of Christian men kneeling with me around her bed, asking God to forgive their persecutors and to turn their hearts."

Restoring the Colors in Faded Stained Glass is a process not generally understood. It was described by a lecturer at the meetings of the Science Association. He said: "Every kind of glass, except some of the white flint glass, such as is used for fine glassware and optical goods, shows some change of color after long exposure to sunlight. It is interesting to know that some of the colors seen in the windows of old cathedrals now, must be different from what they were when the glass was first put in. It is a curious fact that, whatever change the color of a glass may have undergone under the influence of sunlight, the original tint can be restored by exposing it to the heat of a glass-stainer's kiln." This scientific fact illustrates an important truth in the Christian life. A Christian actively engaged in business or in other worldly affairs too often finds the lamp of his soul becoming dim. his life is not the expression of the faith and love that were the mainspring of his actions at the commencement of his Christian career. The only mode of restoring the glass to its original color is the mode God often adopts with the backslider, and in the furnace of affliction the soul is restored (Ps. 119: 67).

INCIDENTS OF MISSION WORK IN CHINA.

Turning the House Inside Out.—One Day a native Evangelist was preaching in the open air, and at the close of his address, said: 'If there is an opium smoker here, if there is a gambler here, if there is an immoral man here who desires to be freed from the bondage of his sin, let him come to Christ my Saviour and he will be saved from its influence.' A notorious man who was standing in the crowd stepped forward, and looking into the preacher's eyes as though he would pierce him through and through, said, 'Do you know me?' The preacher said, 'Yes, who does not know you?' 'Will your Saviour, of whom you speak, save me?' If there had been any doubt in his mind, in all probability that man would have gone home unsaved; but he answered clearly, and firmly, 'Yes, He can and will.' 'When?' 'Now, if you will let Him.' 'I will.' The preacher took the inquirer home, and gave him further instruction, and before he left for his own home the man was saved through faith in Christ. His house had long been a refuge for bad characters and a gambling hell. When he reached it he turned everybody and everything out, saying, 'This house is closed, and will only be opened again for the preaching of the Gospel of Christ.

How the Wife was Led to Christ.—This same Chinese gentleman's first thought after his own salvation was, 'How can I get my wife and family saved?' Many times he tried to speak to his wife, but his courage always failed him. She was a strong-minded Chinese lady, so that he felt afraid of her scorn. While cogitating over the best means of winning his wife to the Lord's side, it struck him, 'It was by the prayers of that missionary and my own that I was saved, why may not my wife be saved in the same way?' He laid the matter before the Lord till night came, and when the rest of the household had retired, he said to his wife, 'Please stay up for a little; I want to speak to you alone.' They went to his room together. A Chinese gentleman's room is furnished very simply; it has a row of chairs, with a small table between every two chairs. The lady took one chair, and he took another. He tried to speak, but to his dismay he found that he could say nothing. For a few minutes they both sat silently looking at each other. At length she broke the ice, by saying, 'I thought that you wanted to speak to me?' It was enough to loose his tongue, and so he told her all. To his surprise and delight she told him that for a long time back a deep spirit of unrest had been on her, and that what he said had removed it. They both got on their knees, and returned thanks to God for His great gift to them, and entreated that He might visit the other members of the family with the salvation of Christ.

A Chinese Gentleman's Prayer Answered.—The Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, relates: "Mr. Stevenson, one of our missionaries, went into China to preach the Gospel, and disseminate the Bible and tracts. One day a literary gentleman, a Chinaman, of course, called upon him to get an explanation of some new book which he had got. Mr. Stevenson gave the desired information, and then inquired, 'Have you ever read any of our Christian books, say the Bible?' 'Yes,' was the reply, 'I have read a few of your tracts, but they are unintelligible to me.' 'That is because your eyes are blind,' said Mr. Stevenson. 'At one time I thought as you do now, and was so blind that I would not read about God.' 'How could you read if you were blind?' the gentleman asked. 'I do not mean the natural eyes, but the spiritual eyesight,' Mr. Stevenson answered, and said further, 'What you should do is to take your New Testament, go into your own room, close the door, kneel down and pray that God would enlighten your understanding; then rise up and read: you will find it another book.' 'We literary men do not believe in prayer; then if we did, do you think that if there be a God such as you say, He has not something more to do than listen to such as I? Don't you know that I can't even speak to the governor of this small province? How could I speak to the God of the earth?' Pointing to a small stove, Mr. Stevenson replied, 'You might argue very learnedly that water in a suitable vessel put on the top of a fire could not boil, but by the time you finished I would say, "Look! the water is boiling!" and it would have more influence with me than all your argument. God has frequently answered my prayers. Do as I say, and see the result.' The gentleman went home, got to his room, and threw himself into his chair. He took up the New Testament, looked at one side, then at the other, opened it, and said, 'O God! if there be a God, help me to read this book.' He began to read, and to his surprise found it was a new book. So engrossed did he become in it, that he did not look up till far into the night. He did not rest until he received Jesus as his Saviour."

"STRONG DELUSION."

By Rev. H. W. Congdon.

A Judicial Punishment—Spiritualism a Mixture of Fraud and Ancient Sorcery—Prohibited in the Old Testament—Spirits in the New Testament—Their Malign Influence—An Infallible Test—Modern Spiritualism—Partly Fraud—Clairvoyance—Psychology—Wholly Unreliable—Opposed to Revelation—Immoral in its Tendencies—Must be Avoided.

BY referring to II Thess. 2 : 11, it will be seen that the "strong delusion" of the last days will come as a judicial punishment because men "receive not the love of the truth." "Not liking to retain God in their knowledge, God gives them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient" (Rom. 1 : 28), and so they are taken captive at the will of Satan, in all his snares. A strong delusion certainly is the revival of demonism under the modern name of spiritualism. But all there is in it beyond mere fraud and trickery, is as old as the Bible itself. It would be well for every one to give heed to the testimony of God's Word concerning it.

IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

we find, in the first place, that all commerce between living men and the other world whether beings of another order or the spirits of departed men, was prohibited under pain of death. See Exod. 22 : 18; Lev. 19 : 31; 20 : 6, 27; Deut. 18 : 10–14. In addition to those who use the mysterious arts and divination especial mention is made in these passages of those who "consult with familiar spirits"—demons, and of "necromancers," or those who deal with the dead.

In the next place, Old Testament examples of these sins may be seen in the case of Manasseh (II Kings 21 : 6; 2 Chron. 33 : 6); and in the case of Saul (1 Sam. 28 : 8–21; 1 Chron. 10 : 13). From II Kings 23 : 24, we infer that this in the time of Israel's apostasy, and was one of the signs of the divine retribution soon to fall upon the nation. In all of these cases the displeasure of God was manifest; and the special judgments which He denounced, as well as the general penalty of death prescribed by the law, all show the estimate which God puts upon such dealings with spirits. And this estimate is still further seen in the prophets: Isa. 8 : 19; 19 : 3; Jer. 27 : 9; 29 : 8,9; Micah 3 : 7; Zech. 10 : 2. It is evident that God regards with very great disapprobation this whole business of "seeking for the living to the dead," instead of seeking "to the law and to the testimony." There were very great reasons for all this severity. If men believe in Jehovah and love His commandments, they will govern their conduct by His law, instead of running after the "spirits." If being of such a mind as this, they want practical guidance in cases of doubt and perplexity, they will consult the oracles of the living God rather than seek mediums that "peep and mutter," and "whisper out of the dust." And it is only when people have lost their faith in God (at least in a large degree), regard His Revelation as insufficient, and the practical guidance of His providence and Spirit as unsafe and unreliable, that they will turn away from Him to listen to

VOICES FROM ANOTHER WORLD.

And as under the conditions of society in the times of the Old Testament, apostasy meant contamination with all the pollutions of the heathen, God ordained that all dealing with the other world, except through His own oracles, should be punished with death.

In the New Testament, the agency of spirits appears very frequently in the narrative, but generally as the possession of living persons by the unclean spirits of demons. The most casual reader of the Gospels and Acts will remark how numerous these cases are, and that Christ and His apostles recognized fully their demoniacal character. For examples see Matt. 12 : 22–28; Matt. 8 : 29; Mark 5 : 7; Luke 8 : 28; Acts 16 : 16. The nature of the request made by the demons of Gadara is worthy of particular remark—they did not want to be sent into the abyss to be "tormented before the time." They understood that there is a day appointed in which God will judge both fallen spirits and wicked men (II Pet. 2 : 4). They also knew that the place of their punishment is the abyss—in Hebrew Abaddon, in Greek Apoleia, in the Revelation of St. John, the Lake of Fire—and recognizing Jesus to be the Son of God and Judge of all, they were in terror lest He would consign them at once to this place of torment. Hence their entreaty.

In 1 Tim. 4 : 4, we have

that these malignant agencies will continue till the end of the present dispensation; and in 1 John 4 : 1–3, we have a test which, taken in connection with Isa. 8 : 20, will enable any one to decide infallibly whether a communication purporting to come from the other world has been sent by God, or proceeds from a fallen spirit. The Word of God will remain forever true, and Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is its Divine Interpreter. If any "medium" contradicts the "law and the testimony," or rejects the divine authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, it is then certain that he either speaks from his own deluded and perverted mind, or else from the inspiration of a fallen and wicked spirit.

And now in this light derived from the Bible let us look at

MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

We note the following facts concerning it: By its own acknowledgment it is necromancy and demononism. Its whole teaching is directly attributed to communications from spirits, either of dead men or beings of another order. It is thus directly within the prohibitions of the law forbidding such intercourse with the spirit world.

It is inseparably mixed up with frauds and delusions. Many persons under its influence are entirely honest without doubt; but it invites to its ranks all sorts of impostors, from the mere sleight-of-hand trickster to the adept in the mysteries of the black art. Its secret séance, its darkened room, its required attitude of expectancy on the part of the spectator—indeed all the conditions of the "manifestation" favor the imposition of fraud upon its innocent victims.

Another element of uncertainty in it is delusions produced by clairvoyance and mesmerism. Any one who has studied the subject knows that the human mind possesses certain capacities and undeveloped faculties, not in exercise in our normal condition, in the present state. When they do occasionally come into exercise, we catch glimpses of possibilities to be realized, probably in another state of life. Such is that power, exhibited in the mesmeric trance, of putting the mind into connection with things at a distance, or even into direct communication with the minds of other people so as to be able to disclose matters entirely hidden from ordinary knowledge. This is called by the name of clairvoyance.

Similar to this is the power sometimes called by which one person may obtain such complete control over another person's mind as to make all its faculties subject to his dictation. In this condition the subject may experience delusions of mind and hallucinations of senses, and yet be utterly unable to discriminate between the true and the false, all being equally real to him. He will see things that never existed, and hear sounds that never vibrated in the air; or if there is a slight foundation in fact for these pseudo-phenomena, it is so distorted and exaggerated as to be essentially false as presented to the mind of the confiding dupe. All this is simply mesmerism in one of its many forms.

Now, how much of this there may be in the phenomena of spiritualism at any given time, no one can know except those who work the mechanism of the séance. It is certain that the usual expectancy and credulity of the spectators, as well as the conditions demanded for the "manifestation," favor the frequent intervention of mesmerism. In all this there is nothing supernatural; but it enables bad men to invoke these mysterious agencies, under the guise of the supernatural, to give credit to their vicious and pernicious teachings.

It is entirely unreliable. The spirits themselves are unseen and unknown, and can be judged of only by their own utterances. They come promiscuously—good, bad, and indifferent—and the hearer must judge between them. Now he listens to one who speaks against the Bible and the Christian religion; directly another comes along to tell him that the Bible is a good book, and the better he knows and practises what is in it the better for himself.

Besides this, the spirits often personate others. No one can be certain that the spirit communicating is the one he is alleged to be. When a living person comes to inquire of the spirit of a good dead man, it may be a departed relative—there is no assurance that the spirit responding is the one called for. It may be a wicked spirit, or a demon who is passing himself off in place of the one asked for. And if the facts of mesmerism and clairvoyance teach anything, they teach us that it is possible for the medium to be so completely en rapport with the inquirer as to be able to obtain from his own mind all those facts which appear so supernatural when given in the communications. Now, amid all this uncertainty, the inquirer is thrown back entirely upon his own judgment to discriminate between the true and the false, the good and the bad. No candid spiritualist will deny the facts stated above concerning spirit communications; and on spiritualism is utterly unsafe and unreliable, either as a medium for finding the truth, or as a practical guide for the present life and the life to come.

It is opposed to God, to the revealed Word, and to Jesus Christ. The very fact that any one turns from the Bible to consult spirits concerning the future world and a due preparation for it, shows that he has lost his faith in the revelation which God has given for our guidance in these very matters. And the further fact is indisputable—that nearly every modern spiritualist repudiates the divine authority of God's Word, entirely rejects its teachings concerning sin, atonement, and the necessity of a spiritual regeneration; and especially denies the divine nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, the absolute truth of His teachings, His sacrificial death, and His resurrection-life in heaven. In other words, as of old, so even now, spiritism is entirely against God, His Word, and His Christ.

ITS TENDENCY IS IMMORAL.

In ancient times it was connected with the pollutions of the heathen. Its tendency in modern times is in the same direction. Its doctrine of "spiritual affinities" invades the sanctities of the domestic relations. It tends to a light estimation of the sanctity of marriage and the relations of the sexes; to induce people to enter upon such relations without the binding obligations of marriage itself; to easily lay aside these obligations when they have once actually been assumed; and finally to end in the communism of free love. The restraints of true religion—such as the fear of God, the love of Christ, and the hope of His glory, all bring reward; and the spirit doctrine of an endless progression in good for every soul of man in the world to come being substituted for this, each man is left to follow his own natural bent in the moral conduct of this life. The absolute standard of God's law being abrogated, with nothing put in its place but the uncertain and contradictory testimony of the spirits, each man is left to make his own moral standard from his own view of right and wrong. That to each man is a law unto himself, to do what seems good in his own eyes.

Such is spiritualism. It is a revival of the demonism of ancient times. It is a stupendous delusion, a snare of the devil. The only course for any one to take who would not be captured by it and led astray from eternal life, is to let it entirely, absolutely alone.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Quite Satisfied.—Rev. J. G. Cunningham said at a recent meeting: "One of the friends in dealing with an aged woman found that she was in great darkness, weeping bitterly, and she put the question to her, 'Are you satisfied with Christ?' She pointed out a number of passages of Scripture to her, in which it was shown that Christ was infinitely worthy of our confidence. The worker did not see her again for three or four days, when she had a beaming countenance, and, entering into conversation with her, she found that on the night when she had been spoken to she had gone to bed in a very agitated, anxious state, but had not gone to sleep before she was able with her whole heart to say she was satisfied with Christ."

Sad Wreck of a Noble Life.—Mr. Johnstone relates: "Many years ago, when the Juvenile Temperance Movement was started, a fine young fellow joined us and worked with heart, soul, and voice. So highly was he esteemed that the friends of the cause presented him with a fine gold watch as a memento of their admiration for him. His private friends, his mother, father, sisters and brother, were vehemently opposed to the temperance cause, and put every obstacle in the young man's way that they could devise. Every day drink was laid on the table, and he was pressed to partake of it. Woe for the young man! and still greater woe for those who put the bottle to his lips! He gave way to the tempter and fell, never, so far as I have heard, to rise again. He married a young woman and sailed to America, where he did no good, for his father had to support his wife. The responsibility which lies upon those who put drink before their children is very great. How will you who are guilty in this matter answer to God for doing it?"

A Revelation at a Ministers' Conference.—The Rev. William Ross said: "A conference of one hundred and twenty-five ministers met to consider the best means of carrying on the work of God. Some said the efforts should be made among the grown-up people, as they feared it was almost useless to work among children. Others again said that the work among children was surest and best. The discussion waxed warm till a motion was made, and seconded, 'that it be postponed till the evening.' Glad to get rid of it for a time, all agreed. While they were at dinner one young minister suggested, 'Why not get this question settled now; let each of this company, numbering one hundred and twenty-five, write on a slip of paper the age they were when converted to Christ, fold it up, and then let a neutral party examine the slips, and see whether most of the company were converted when children or when grown-up, and let us abide by the majority.' This was at once agreed to, and it was found that one hundred and twenty-two were converted when under fifteen years of age, and all that company were changed in heart before they were twenty-two years of age."

Pinioning the Arms of Cowards.—Mr. Graham, a devoted missionary to seamen, says: "I was going along a street in Ayr one day, and saw two men shamefully abusing a poor half-witted lad. There was no use speaking to the men, so I just got behind one of them and seizing his arms, held them back till the lad escaped from his tormentors. What made these two big strong men ill-use the poor stunted half-wit? They were cowards, and knew that the poor weak fellow could not retaliate, and they therefore thought that they could do wrong with safety, forgetting in their contemptible malice that God saw their actions. What makes the sceptic laugh at God? He thinks that his poor puny mind is stronger than the intellect of God, his Creator. Alas for him! when the mighty God pinions his arms behind his back, and he has to look the Lord straight in the face without being able to cover it (Psalm 53 : 1).

No Grog-Shops in Heaven.—The Rev. William Ross says: "A Sabbath-school teacher, anxious to make her children think of the goodness of God, asked them, 'Will you kindly bring me written on a slip of paper what you think you have most reason to be thankful for?' Next Sabbath, as the lady went over the replies one by one, she came upon a remarkable one. It was, 'I am thankful that there are no grog-shops in heaven.' This told of the little one's hope of heaven, and the certainty with which she felt heaven would be free from the greatest evil which afflicted her on earth. This child had experienced the bitter evils which arise from the use of intoxicating drink; the darkness of the foul demon's presence had fallen upon her home; she had seen others debased and embruted by it, and she therefore thanked God for the absence from heaven 'of whatsoever worketh abomination.' 'Those holy gates forever bar pollution, sin, and shame.'"

A Profane Railway Traveller Rebuked.—"Some years ago I was travelling by rail to the South of England. A young man entered the same carriage, and when bidding his friends farewell, almost every word he used was an oath. When he drew in his head, and had taken his seat, I said very quietly, 'I have a book in my pocket which says, "The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain."' The young man changed color, and after a silence of half an hour or so, he said, 'Are you a clergyman?' 'Never you mind that,' I replied; 'I have got a book in my pocket which says that, "The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain."' 'If you have such a book in your pocket,' said the young man, 'you must be a clergyman.' I repeated my answer without a word of explanation. I believe that the young man was convicted of sin before our journey was at an end, and that he was led to find full forgiveness through the blood of Christ. Sow the seed beside all waters."

An Invalid's Sunday Morning Dream.—Mr. Sloan says: "A Christian man was lying ill. One bright Sunday morning the window of his room was opened so that the pleasant sound of the church bells, calling the people to worship, floated into the room. He fell asleep with their musical chimes ringing in his ears, and dreamed that he was carried away to the church where he usually worshipped, and thought that he was looking down upon the assembly, and that he saw shining ones here and there in the gallery and in the body of the church. In a few cases there appeared quite a glow of light, but in most cases there were intensely dark bodies next the shining ones. Still dreaming, he thought he saw the people as God saw them. The shining ones were those who were filled with Christ, and the dark bodies were those who were not 'washed in the blood of the Lamb,' and were therefore filled with a gross darkness. It is even so. All men unillumined by Christ and the Holy Spirit are both dark and dead. In Christ alone is there light and life."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island, was Elected by the Senate on Monday, January 14th president pro tem. He, however, felt it his duty, owing to the critical state of his health, to decline the high office, and the Senate then re-elected Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont. At the caucus previously held, Mr. Anthony told the Republicans that he felt he could not accept the office when there was the remotest possible contingency that he might be called upon to step into the seat of the President of the United States. It was decided, however, by the caucus that it would be a graceful recognition of his long services to elect Mr. Anthony. Mr. Edmunds was retained in the chair by his own consent. He told the Senators that if it was their wish he would be willing to serve as long as he could give his time to the duties of the office, but later in the session he would feel compelled to give up the office.

A Temperance Debate in the Senate took place on January 16th. The occasion was the adoption of joint rules, among them Rule 13, which prohibits the sale of spirituous or malt liquors within the Capitol. Senator Bayard, of Delaware, moved to strike out the words "or malt." He had no objection, he said, to the prohibition of spirituous liquors, but he did not believe in shutting out malt liquors. Senator Frye, of Maine, horrified the Senators with a description of what he had seen in the Capitol. He said he had seen the restaurant of one of the houses of Congress become an open, notorious, low, miserable groggery. He had actually seen a man there with his trousers in his boots and wearing an old, coarse blouse, drinking miserable whiskey out of a cheap crockery cup. They called it "tea," and anybody could call for and get his "tea" served in a cup with a saucer. Mr. Frye said he was so disgusted with the sight that he had put in the rule a provision requiring the sergeant-at arms "strictly" to enforce it, so that that officer might not be guided by his own opinion. Mr. Bayard assured the Senate that after the terrible picture drawn by the Senator from Maine he had no suggestion to make against the strictest enforcement of a rule against spirituous liquors, but he wanted no rule against malt liquors. Mr. Frye finally offered to make the rule prohibit only "intoxicating" liquors, and to this Mr. Bayard and the Senate consented, and the rule so amended was adopted. "Congressional tea" will probably after this be added to the slang vocabulary of the bar-rooms.

The President Sent to Congress on Thursday a recommendation of an appropriation for an expedition to relieve Lieutenant Greely and his party in the Arctic. The President impressed on Congress the urgency of the case, and reminded it that Lieutenant Greely had been promised, before setting out, that efforts would be made to communicate with him and replenish his stock of provisions in 1882 and 1883, and that in the event of those efforts failing, a well-stored relief station would be established at Smith's Sound. He was also directed to retreat to Smith's Sound, if no communication reached him, and to commence his journey there not later than September 1st, 1883. No relief has reached him, and the station at Smith's Sound is but scantily supplied with provisions. The imperative necessity of prompt action is therefore evident, and the President, in accordance with the report of the Advisory Board, recommended the purchase of two stout steam whalers properly equipped with boats and sleds. These should be ready to start north by May 1st; also that a smaller vessel shall set out even at an earlier date, in the hope that by taking the greatest risks relief may be afforded to the Lady Franklin Bay party earlier than the main expedition can do it. An essential point in the recommendations is that the expedition shall be entirely in control of the Navy Department.

A Remarkable and Gratifying Statement of the progress of manufactures in the South is published in a Baltimore journal. It says there are now 314 cotton mills in the South, having 1,276,422 spindles and 24,873 looms, while at the time the census was taken in 1880 the South had only 180 mills, with 713,989 spindles and 15,222 looms. In 1880 the value of the manufactured cotton produced at the South was a little over $21,000,000, while in 1883 the value had risen to between $35,000,000 and $40,000,000.

The Prospect of Prohibition Legislation in Iowa is reported encouraging. Senator James F. Wilson, of that State, says he has no doubt that the Legislature of that State will pass prohibitory laws, and insure total prohibition. "I am in favor of this course," he says. "Positive prohibition can be enforced and will be enforced." The report to which we recently alluded of a canvass of the members of the Legislature, by a Chicago journal, is declared by correspondents from Iowa to be unreliable, and many temperance men have written us speaking hopefully of the resubmission of the amendment and the determination of the State to carry it at the polls.

A Terrible Steamship Disaster Occurred on Friday last off the coast of Massachusetts. The steamer, City of Columbus, of the Boston and Savannah Line, left Boston on Wednesday, January 16th, and was proceeding on her voyage to Savannah when, about three o'clock on Friday morning, she struck upon the rock at the Devil's Bridge, off the south-western extremity of Martha's Vineyard. The vessel was quickly backed off, but she filled so rapidly that the passengers and crew were compelled, in less than half an hour after she struck, to climb into the rigging, the deck being completely under water. The waves were very rough, and many passengers were washed away. The ship's boats were launched, but could not live in the sea, and were instantly swamped. A raft was constructed on which seven persons took refuge. Small boats were sent at imminent risk from the lighthouse, and by their means seven of the poor creatures clinging to the rigging were taken off. Between twelve and one o'clock the revenue cutter Dexter came in sight, and took the remainder of the passengers and crew off the rigging, except two men, who were frozen to death. One of the rescued men was also so badly frozen that he died in a few minutes after being rescued. One hundred and twenty-four lives, most of them women and children, are believed to have been lost. The captain of the wrecked vessel is a man of experience who has sailed over the same course for fifteen years. The rock on which the steamer struck is well known, and for that reason is not considered dangerous, as, though under water, it is marked by a buoy. It is supposed that the captain was deceived as to the leeway his vessel had made.

The Immigration Returns for the Past Year have been published. The number entered at the port of New York for the year was 388,541. These figures compared with those of 1882, show a falling off in the immigration at this port of 66,864. Of the imgimrants who arrived during 1883 about 170,000 were Germans; a little more than 90,000 came from the British Isles, and of these over one-half were Irish; about 25,000 came from Italy; Sweden followed with about 20,000 immigrants, and Norway and Hungary each contributed over 11,000. During the past year 58,596 cabin passengers from Europe landed at this port. This shows an increase of 549 over the figures of 1882.

The Garfield Memorial Hospital Association held a general meeting in Washington last week, at which Judge Miller, who presided, reported the progress already made. He said: "The property purchased as a site for the hospital contains seven acres of ground and cost $37,500; upon this there was paid cash $15,500, and there remains due $22,000. The title is held in the name of Henry A. Willard, under a declaration of trust. The total cost of the property, together with the improvements so far authorized, will amount to $49,500. The property transferred to the institution by the late Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, consisting of real estate, has not yet been sold, but produces a small annual return in the shape of rent. It has been the intention of the Board, acting under the advice of the agents managing the property, to offer it for sale during the next spring, when, it is hoped, a satisfactory disposition may be made of it, and the proceeds applied to the extinction of the debt on the hospital."

Governor Murray, of Utah, has Made an earnest appeal to the Legislature to voluntarily reform the affairs of the territory instead of waiting for Congress to compel reform by force. He urges the enactment of local laws that "will retire Utah affairs from the halls of Congress and forever bury out of sight the charge that ecclesiastical power dictates legislation in Utah." The governor's advice, however, is not likely to be heeded, as the representatives are controlled by the heads of the Mormon Church, and they have laid down a line of policy for their followers at the conference of the Church, from which the Mormon representatives dare not swerve. The order was to stand by polygamy and to resist by all means the Edmunds law and all other similar measures which Congress might pass.

The Temperance Question is before the New York Legislature. A bill introduced by Mr. Roosevelt proposes to raise spirit licenses to $500 and fermented liquor licenses to $250. The more radical proposal of prohibition is also under consideration, Mr. Thomas, in the Senate, and Mr. Olin, in the Assembly of this State, having each introduced a proposition to submit to the people a Prohibitory Amendment to the Constitution. In the lower house it is referred to the Committee on Internal Affairs.

The Sad Circumstances Attending the Death of Mr. Charles Delmonico, the proprietor of the four famous restaurants of New York, caused a painful sensation throughout the city last week. He left his home on Saturday, January 5th, in a state of mental aberration, and was supposed to have wandered into New Jersey. The most diligent search failed to secure any satisfactory information of him, until his body was found on Monday, January 14th, on Orange Mountain, near the roadside, where he had perished in the cold a week previous. It is supposed that he was seeking the house of an intimate friend, who resides near the spot where his body was found. Mr. Delmonico knew the neighborhood well, but in the unbalanced condition of his mind was apparently unable to find his way. It often appears to Christian workers that inquiring sinners are similarly afflicted, but in their case the Holy Spirit does not suffer them to perish on their way to an Almighty Friend. (John 14 : 26.)

The Tabulated Reports of the Internal Revenue Department recently issued, show that the people of the United States spend every year not less than $600,000,000 for alcoholic beverages, and $500,000,000 for tobacco. The annual cost of the manufacture of alcoholic beverages in the United States is not far from $65,000,000. To carry on this branch of business, including retail dealers, requires a force of more than 130,000 persons. The growth, manufacture, and sale of the tobacco used require about 75,000. Thus more than 200,000 persons are engaged in these two departments of business. The amount of money expended in those two articles, when compared with the amount raised for religious and philanthropic purposes, suggests matter for sad reflection.

The Name of an Anonymous Philanthropist has been disclosed, owing to his death. For several years past the editor of the New York Tribune has been sending at different times parties of destitute children to homes in the West. Their expenses were defrayed by a gentleman who desired that his name should not be disclosed. A few days ago the cable brought the news that Mr. Julius Hallgarten had died in Switzerland, whither he had gone to spend the winter. It now appears that Mr. Hallgarten was the anonymous benefactor for whom Mr. Reid acted as trustee. The deceased gentleman leaves $159,000 to be distributed among charitable and philanthropic institutions. The largest bequests are to Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., and the University of New York, each of which is left $50,000.

Jerry McAuley is again Compelled to Suspend his labors at the Cremorne Mission by illness. He has been laid aside for several weeks, but remained at the mission in the hope of restoration to health. He has, however, made little progress, and the severe weather continuing he has been ordered by his physician to leave the city for a time. He will stay at Lakewood, N. J., until spring. Mr. P. W. Hill will conduct the work of the mission during his absence. Mr. McAuley will be able to continue the work on his newspaper, which will be issued as usual.

The Young Women's Christian Association of New York held its annual meeting on January 14th, when a gratifying report was submitted of its progress and the benefits it has conferred. It was stated that there are believed to be 100,000 working women in the city, a fact which proves the need and the extensive sphere for Christian labor of the character the association performs. The following is an extract from the report: The whole expense of the association, including wages to teachers, house bills, printing, etc., amounted to $10,173.86. To meet this sum, were the annual subscriptions, $2473, and the interest of a legacy and class fund, $450. The deficit of some $7000 was made up by voluntary contributions and donations. After paying expenses there was a small sum on hand, which has been set aside as a nucleus for a building fund, to be used in enlarging the reading and employment rooms. Of the $10,000 which we hope to raise for this purpose, $1000 has already been subscribed. The Bible Class has a permanent membership of 524, and a transient membership of 833. The fresh air fund amounted to $544, and its benefits were enjoyed by sixty-two women. Our free educational classes were crowded. Four hundred and twenty women received instruction.

The Rev. Jacob Freshman's Work among the Jews of New York continues to enjoy God's blessing. His congregation now meets in Room 24, Cooper Union. Services are held on Saturday afternoon in a hall at 73 Allen Street, when the Scriptures are read in English, Hebrew and German. A prayer-meeting is held every Friday evening at Mr. Freshman's home, 25 Seventh Street. Two Sunday-schools are conducted for youth and are well attended. The report states that the Lord has abundantly blessed the efforts put forth in the conversion of Hebrews. The expenses for the year under review were not quite $3000, all met by voluntary contributions. Mr. Freshman has three assistants in the work, young men, who, like himself, are Hebrew Christians. A small monthly paper is now issued for the benefit of Jews, each issue containing matter well calculated to assist them in seeking for light concerning the Messiah. The issue of this journal for January states that $1900 is in hand toward the purchase of a building that shall give a permanent home to the cause.

The Rapid and Alarming Increase in the number of insane persons is a subject to which the New York Herald and other journals are calling public attention. From published reports of the various States it appears that in the past ten years the proportion of insane persons to the total population has about doubled. Careful investigation would probably show that the enlarged list is due partly to the fact that more insane people are sent to institutions now than in the days when an asylum was little more than a place of confinement. It is undoubtedly true, however, that insanity is more common in the cities than of old. Excitement and anxiety, two almost inevitable torments of the intelligent classes of city population, are potent causes of insanity, while liquor, which the Herald says is "used to excess almost unknown in the rural districts," makes sad havoc with the brains of the million. The remedy is not far to seek. The religion of Christ which, when its influence is not resisted, makes men calm and tranquil of mind and enables them to restrain their appetites, would remove these three potent insanity-producers.

Intense Excitement has been Aroused in Chicago by an exposure reflecting on the character of the matron of a charitable institution near that city. It appears that an Industrial Home was started four years ago, and many prominent philanthropists were enlisted in the scheme. The Home was moved out of the city in September last on the recommendation of the matron, who desired to free the children from the temptations of a great city. According to the statements of officers who visited the place recently all the children were covered with vermin. Their beds were both filthy and insufficiently warm. The food consisted of nothing but mush, bread, potatoes, and cold water served up in small doses; the windows lacked panes so that the snow would drift into the room where the half-starved children were huddled together with every gust of wind. The two stoves which were supposed to heat the floor hardly had a handful of coal in them both. There are also specific charges of acts of cruelty done to the children and unfortunate women, besides starving and half freezing them. Many neighbors have volunteered to testify in that connection. The matron has been arrested, and the charges will be investigated. The accused states that she can disprove the allegations. The money contributed last year for the maintenance of the institution was $3512.

THE SPIRIT OF BONDAGE AND OF ADOPTION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."—ROMANS 8 : 15, 16.

Fourfold Work of the Spirit—I. Bondage—Not Always the Work of the Spirit—The Bondage of Conviction—Not Needless Bondage—Close Sinners—The Result is Fear—Five Kinds of Fear—Outgrowing the Bondage—II. Adoption—Includes Liberty—Confidence—Child-Likeness—III. Prayer—A Child's Cry—The Place for Slaves—IV. The Spirit of Witness—How the Holy Spirit Witnesses.

THESE two verses are full of the word "spirit," and they are also full of spiritual truth. We have read in previous verses about the flesh and of the result that comes of minding it, namely, death. But now, in this verse, we get away from the flesh, and think only of the work of the Holy Spirit upon our spirits, and of the blessed privilege which comes of it—"that we should be called the sons of God." We cannot enter into this except by the power of the Holy Spirit, for spiritual truth must be spiritually discerned; our eyes need God's light, and our spirits need the Holy Spirit's quickening. We breathe our prayer to the Great Spirit that He would make us feel the full meaning of His word.

I think that I see in the text the fourfold work of the Spirit: first, the spirit of bondage; secondly, the spirit of adoption; thirdly, the spirit of prayer—here it is, "Whereby we cry." And fourthly, the spirit of witness: "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

I. Consider, first of all,

THE SPIRIT OF BONDAGE.

Much of the bondage in which we are plunged by our fallen nature is not the work of the Spirit of God at all. Bondage under sin, bondage under the flesh, bondage to the fashions and customs of the world, bondage under the fear of man—this is carnal bondage, the work of the flesh, and of sin, and of the devil. But there is a sense of bondage, to which, I think, the apostle here mainly alludes, which is of the Spirit of God. Before the Spirit of God within us becomes the Spirit of liberty, He is, first of all, the Spirit of bondage.

That part of the bondage which I shall now describe is altogether the work of the Spirit of God. That is, first, when men are brought into bondage through being convinced of sin. This bondage is not the work of nature; certainly, never the work of the devil. It is not the work of human oratory, nor of human reason; it is the work of the Spirit of God; as it is written, "When the Spirit of truth is come, He shall convince the world of sin." It needs a miracle to make a man know that he is in very deed a sinner. He will not own it. He kicks against it. Even when he confesses the outward transgression, he does not know or feel the inward heinousness of his guilt, so as in his soul to be stunned, and confounded, and humbled, by the fact that he is a rebel against his God. Now, no man can ever know a Saviour without knowing himself a sinner; even as no man can value a physician while he is ignorant of the existence and evil of disease.

The Spirit of God is always the Spirit of truth, and therefore He only convinces men of that which is true; He puts them into no false, or fanciful, or needless bondage. "When the Spirit of truth is come, He shall convince the world of sin"—because it is sinful. When the Spirit puts men into bondage because they are sinners, He only puts them into their right place. When He came to some of us by the law He made us feel what we were by nature; and what we felt and saw was the truth. He made us see THINGS AS THEY REALLY WERE.

Until He came, we put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter, darkness for light and light for darkness; but when the Spirit of truth was come, then sin appeared sin. Then we were in bondage, and it was but the very truth.

The Spirit of God also brought us farther into bondage when He made us feel the assurance that punishment must follow upon sin, when He made us know that God can by no means clear the guilty, and that He was not playing with us when He said, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." We were made to feel the sentence of death, that we might not trust in ourselves.

And then, further, the Spirit of God operates as a spirit of bondage upon the hearts of those whom God will save, by bringing them to feel the utter impossibility of their hoping to clear themselves by the works of the law. We heard this sentence thundered in our soul—"By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight; for by the law is the knowledge of sin." We could not meet our God under the law; we looked up to Sinai's fiery summit, whereon the Lord revealed Himself, and we felt that its crags were too steep for our tottering feet to climb. Even if the way were smooth, how could we dare to pass through the thick darkness, and hold communion with Jehovah, who is a consuming fire? The Spirit of God once for all weaned us from all thought of a righteousness of our own. This result is always produced in every child of God, but not always by the same degree of bondage. Fetters of different weights are used in this prison-house, as wisdom and prudence appoint. The spirit of bondage comes not to all alike; for some find peace and life in a moment, and come to Calvary as soon as Sinai begins to thunder.

I have known this spirit of bondage come with great force to men who have been open transgressors. Others who have been kept by the preventing grace of God from the extremes of open sin have not felt so much of it; but men that have blasphemed God, broken the Sabbath, and violated every holy thing—when they are brought before God under a sense of sin, have frequently had a hard time of it. I should not wonder if some of my hearers, who may have gone far into outward transgression, are made to feel, when brought to spiritual life, great grief and humiliation under a sense of their sin.

Such bondage often happens to those who, as the old authors used to say, were —men who did not even know that they were sinners at all, but, in consequence of their morality and the strictness of their lives, had a high conceit of their own excellence in the sight of God. Certain of these people experience most fearful convictions of sin; as if God would say to each one, "I must rid thee of thy self-righteousness. I must cure thee of trusting in thy moral life; and therefore I will let thee see into the depths of thy depravity. I will discover to thee thy sins against light and knowledge, thy sins against conscience, thy sins against the love of God. Thou shalt be brought into sore bondage; but that bondage shall heal thee of thy pride."

"CLOSE SINNERS"

I have noticed one thing more, and that is, that those who are in after life to be greatly useful are often thus digged, and tilled, in order that much fruit may be brought forth by them in after years. I have had to deal with as many troubled souls as any living man, and God has greatly used me for their deliverance; but this never could have happened, so far as I can judge, unless I had myself been the subject of a terrible law-work, convincing me not only of my actual sin, but of the source of that sin, namely, a deep and bottomless fountain of depravity in my own nature. When I have met with persons driven to despair, and almost ready to destroy themselves, I have said, "Yes, I understand all that; I have been in those sepulchral chambers, and can sympathize with those who are chilled by their damps. I know the heart of a stranger, for I also was a captive in Egypt, and worked at the brick-kilns." In such a case this bondage of spirit becomes a profitable preparation for after-work. The sword that has to cut through coats of mail must be annealed in many fires; it must endure processes which a common blade escapes. Do not, therefore, all of you expect that the spirit of bondage will be seen in you to the same degree; for, after all, it is not the spirit of bondage which is to be desired for its own sake, but that which comes after it—the Spirit of liberty in Christ Jesus.

Our text reminds us that the result of this spirit of bondage in the soul is fear: "The spirit of bondage to fear." There are and it is well always to distinguish between them. There is the natural fear which the creature has of its Creator, because of its own insignificance and its Maker's greatness. From that we shall never be altogether delivered; for with holy awe we shall bow before the divine majesty, even when we come to be perfect in glory. Secondly, there is a carnal fear; that is, the fear of man. May God deliver us from it! May we never cease from duty because we dread the eye of man! Who art thou that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die? From this cowardice God's Spirit delivers believers. The next fear is a servile fear—the fear of a slave toward his master lest he should be beaten when he has offended. That is a fear which should rightly dwell in every unregenerate heart. Until the slave is turned into a child he ought to feel that fear which is suitable to his position. By means of this fear the awakened soul is driven and drawn to Christ, and learns the perfect love which casts it out. If servile fear be not cast out it leads to a fourth fear, namely, a diabolical fear; for we read of devils, that they "believe and tremble." This is the fear of a malefactor toward the executioner, such a fear as possesses souls that are shut out forever from the light of God's countenance. But, fifthly, there is a filial fear which is never cast out of the mind. This is to be cultivated. This is "the fear of the Lord" which is "the beginning of wisdom." This is a precious gift of grace: "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord." This makes the saints fearful of offending, lest they should grieve infinite love; it causes them to walk before the Lord with the fear of a loving child who would not in anything displease his parent.

When the spirit of bondage is at work upon the heart, there is much of the fourth form of fear, namely, servile fear; and I tell you that it is the Spirit of truth which brings this to us, because we are in a condition which demands it; we are slaves until Christ sets us free, and, being still under the law, servile fear is our most natural and proper feeling. Would you have the bondsman rejoice in a liberty which he does not possess? Is he not the more likely to be free if he loathes his slavery? I wish that every man here, who is not a child of God, would become possessed with servile fear, and tremble before the Most High.

Now, mark that while this fear lasts it is intended to work us toward God. I have already touched upon that. This bondage, which causes fear, breaks us off from self-righteousness; it makes us value the righteousness of Christ, and it also puts an end to certain sins. Many a man, because he is afraid of the consequences, leaves off this and that which would have ruined him; and, so far, the fear is useful to him; and, in after life, the sense of the terror which fear wrought in his soul, will keep him nearer to his Lord. How can he return to that evil thing which aforetime filled his soul with bitterness and grief?

But now I want to notice that in due time and never receive it again, for "We have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear." There comes a time when the Spirit of truth no longer causes bondage. Why not? Because we are not slaves any longer, and therefore there is no bondage for us. Because we are no longer guilty, having been cleared in the court of God, and therefore no sin should press upon our spirit. Because we are made to be the children of God; and God forbid that God's children should tremble like slaves. No, we have not received the spirit of bondage again, for the Spirit of God has not brought it to us again; and though the devil tries to bring it we do not "receive" his goods; and though sometimes the world thinks that we ought to feel it, we are not of the world, and we will not "receive" the world's spirit. We are new creatures in Christ Jesus; we are not under the law, but under grace; and therefore we are free from our former bondage. "We have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear."

WE OUTGROW THIS BONDAGE,

II. This brings us to our second head, which is,

THE SPIRIT OF ADOPTION.

I should require a week to preach properly upon that blessed theme. Instead of preaching upon it, I will give you hints.

Will you kindly notice that the apostle said, "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage?" If he had kept strictly to language he would have added, "But ye have received the Spirit of" — what? Why, of "liberty." That is the opposite of bondage. Ay, but our apostle is not to be hampered by the rigid rules of composition. He has inserted a far greater word: "Ye have received the Spirit of adoption." This leads me to observe that, from this mode of putting it, it is clear that the Spirit of adoption is in the highest sense the spirit of liberty. The believer feels the love of God shed abroad within him, and therefore he exercises a liberty to draw nigh to God, such as he never had before. He has access with boldness; he learns to speak with God as a child speaks to a father. See what a blessed thing is this Spirit of liberty, this Spirit of adoption.

Now, the apostle said, "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear." What is the opposite of that? He should have added—should he not?—"but ye have received the Spirit of liberty by which ye have confidence." He has not in so many words expressed himself thus, but he has said all that and a great deal more by saying, "Whereby we cry, Abba, Father." This is a joyous confidence indeed! Oh, that God may give it to you, dearly beloved, to the very full! Thus it is clear that the Spirit of adoption is and a spirit of confidence. As a child is sure that its father will love him, feed him, clothe him, teach him, and do all that is good for him, so are we sure that "No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly;" but He will make all things to "work together for good to them that love God." The spirit of bondage made us fear, but the Spirit of adoption gives us full assurance. That fear which distrusts God—that fear which doubts whether He will remain a loving and merciful God—that fear which makes us think that all His love will come to an end—that is gone, for we cry, "Abba, Father," and that cry is the death of doubting and fearing.

The Spirit of adoption is a spirit of child-likeness. It is pretty, though sometimes sad, to see how children imitate their parents. How much the little man is like his father! Have you not noticed it? Do you not like to see it, too? You know you do. Ay, and when God gives the Spirit of adoption, there begins in us, poor fallen creatures as we are, some little likeness to Himself; and that will grow to His perfect image. We cannot become God; but we have the privilege and the power to become the sons of God. "Even to as many as believe on His name" does Jesus give this privilege; and therefore we grow up into Him in all things, who is our Head, and at the same time the pattern and mirror of what all the children of God are to be.

Thus, dear friends, let us see with great joy that we have not received again the spirit of bondage. We shall not receive it any more. The Spirit of God will never come to us in that form again, for now we have been washed in the blood, we have been taken away from being heirs of wrath even as others, we have been placed in the family of the Most High, and we feel the Spirit of adoption within us, whereby we cry, "Abba, Father."

III. Just two or three words only upon the next spirit, which is,

THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER.

Whenever the Spirit of adoption enters into a man it sets him praying He cannot help it. He does not wish to help it.

"Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air;
His watchword at the gates of death:
He enters heaven with prayer."

And this praying of the true believer who has the Spirit of adoption is very earnest praying, for it takes the form of crying. But it is also very natural praying; for a child to say, "Father," is according to the fitness of things. It is not necessary to send your boys to a Board School to teach them to do that. They cry "Father," soon and often. So, when we are born again, "Our Father, which art in heaven," is a prayer that is never forced upon us; it rises up naturally within the new-born nature; and because we are born again we cry, "Abba, Father." When we have lost our Father for awhile, we cry after Him in the dark. When He takes the rod to us we cry; but we cry no otherwise than this—"Abba, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me."

It seems to me to be not only an earnest cry and a natural cry, but a very appealing cry. It touches your heart when your child says, "Don't hurt me, father. Dear father, by your love to me, forgive me." True prayer pleads the fatherhood of God—"My father, my father, I am no stranger; I am no foe, I am Thy own dear and well-beloved child. Therefore, like as a father pitieth his children, have Thou pity upon me." The Lord never turns a dear ear to such pleadings. He says, "I do earnestly remember him still," and in love He checks His hand.

And what a familiar word it is—"Abba, Father!" They say that slaves were never allowed to call their masters "abba." That was a word for free-born children only; no man can speak with God as God's children may. I have heard critics say sometimes of our prayers, "How familiar that man is with God;" and one adds, "I do not like such boldness." No, you slaves; of course, you cannot speak with God as a child can; and it would not be right that you should! It befits you to fear, and crouch, and, like miserable sinners, to keep yourselves a long way off from God. Distance is the slave's place; only the child may draw near.

I do not know any more delightful expression toward God than to say to Him, "Abba, Father." It is as much as to say—"My heart knows that Thou art my Father. I am as sure of it as that I am that I am the child of my earthly father; and I am more sure that Thou wouldest deal tenderly with me than that my father would." Paul hints at this when he reminds us that our fathers, verily, chastened us after their own pleasure, but the Lord always chastens us for our profit.

IV. Now, the last thing is,

THE SPIRIT OF WITNESS:

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." There are two witnesses to the adoption of every child of God. Two is a legal number; in the mouth of two witnesses the whole shall be established. The first witness is the man's own spirit. His spirit says, "Yes, yes, yes, I am a child of God. I feel those drawings toward God; I feel that delight in Him; I feel that love to Him; I feel that wish to obey Him, which I never could have felt if I were not His child. Moreover, God's own word declares, 'To as many as received Him'—that is Christ—'to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name;' now, I have received Christ, and I do believe on His name; therefore, I have the evidence of God's written word that I am one of the sons of God. I have the right, the permission, the authority, to be one of the sons of God. That is the witness of my spirit; I believe, and therefore I am a child."

Now comes in the witness of the Holy Spirit. Nobody can question His veracity; but how does the Spirit of God witness to our sonship? First, He witnesses it, as I have already said, through the word of which He is the Author. The word contained in Scripture is quite enough for us if we have a saving faith. We accept it and believe it. The Spirit of God thus witnesses through the Word, and that is the surest medium. Next, the Spirit of God bears witness by His work in us. The first thing is that He works in us great love to God. None love God but those that are born of Him. There is no true love to God in Christ Jesus except in those that have been begotten again by God's own Spirit, so that our love to God is the witness of the Spirit that we are the children of God. Furthermore, He works in us a veneration for God. We fear before Him with a child-like reverence; everything that has to do with God becomes sacred to us when He communes with us. Shall we not be in subjection to the Father of our spirits? That subjection is the surest evidence that we are indeed the sons of God.

In addition to this, the Spirit of God works in us a holy confidence. By His grace we feel in days of trouble that we can rest in God. When we cannot see our way we go on joyfully without seeing. What is the good of seeing with our own eyes when the eyes of the Lord are running to and fro in the earth to show Himself strong in the behalf of all them that trust in Him? Our faith feels a joy in believing seeming contradictions, a delight in accepting apparent impossibilities. Wherever there is this blessed child-like trust, there is the Spirit's witness that we are the children of God. And then, again, when the Spirit of God works in us sanctification, that becomes a further witness of our sonship. When He makes us hate sin, when He makes us love everything that is pure and good, when He helps us to conquer ourselves, when He leads us to love our fellow-men, when He fashions us like to Christ, this is the witness of the Spirit with our spirit that we are the children of God. Oh, to have more and more of it!

Besides which, I believe that there is of the outward ear, which drops in silence on the spirit of man, and lets him know that he has, indeed, passed from death unto life. This also is the seal of the Spirit to the truth of our adoption.

Now let us begin at the beginning, and bless Him that ever He made us feel the bondage of sin. Let us bless Him that He made us fear and tremble, and fly to Jesus. Let us bless Him that He has brought us into the adoption of children. Let us bless Him that He helps us to cry "Abba, Father;" and, lastly, let us bless Him that to-night He bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God.

Dear friend, dost thou believe in the Lord Jesus Christ? If so, all the privileges of an heir of God are thine. If thou dost not believe in Christ, the Spirit of God will never bear witness to a lie, and tell thee that thou art saved when thou art not. If thou art not saved and not yet a believer in Jesus, I tell thee that thou art like a blank document to which the Spirit of God will never set His hand and seal, for He is never so unwise as to sign a blank. If thou hast believed, thou art a child of God, and the Spirit of God sets His seal to thy adoption. Go in peace, and rejoice in the Lord forever.

"Nor fret, nor doubt, nor suffer slavish fear:
Thy spirit is released, thy path is clear.
Let praise fill up thy day, and evermore
Live thou to love, to copy, and adore."

MISSIONARIES IN A CHINESE HOTEL.

CHRISTIAN work in Fuh-Kien was at first an occasion of much patience and anxiety. The journeys of the missionaries were not confined to Fuh-Chow alone, but they would often take protracted tours among the towns and villages of the province of Fuh-Kien. These journeys involved no small amount of physical discomfort, and of difficulties which can hardly be appreciated by those who labor at home. Often the simple and superstitious mountaineers would fly in terror from the missionaries, whom they called "foreign devils."

On one occasion two men on the road were startled by the appearance of a strange man walking toward them. As he approached they became much alarmed. To their great surprise he addressed them, and wished them peace, and told them something about a strange religion and a Saviour who died for the world. The villagers told them that the "Foreign Child" had been there also, and had "eaten rice," and "talked book." But though they tried to pay no attention to the strange message, one of their number, Ling Chung-Te, could not forget the words. Some time afterward a Christian basket-maker from Lo-Nguong, another town which had heard the Word through the itinerant missionaries, came to live in the village, and Chung-Te heard again the strange doctrine, and gladly received it. Seven years after the roadside preaching, he learned that the missionary, Mr. Wolfe, was to preach at Lo-Nguong. He walked a distance of several miles to hear him, and then, to Mr. Wolfe's amusement as well as thankfulness, related his singular experience.

Mr. Wolfe gives an amusing

DESCRIPTION OF A SUPPER

at a little "Yongtaing," or hotel, in Sang-tu-kau: "Our sudden appearance in the dining-room acted like an electric shock. Chopsticks were thrown down, and instantly the house was in a high state of excitement. The villagers crowded in, and filled up every available corner. The small table in this room looked so filthy that in order to obviate the disrelish which it was likely to impart to any food placed upon it, we covered it with a newspaper, which served admirably as a table-cloth. This amused the villagers beyond description. They looked on in surprise as we handled the knife-and-fork, making all sorts of remarks on the manner in which we ate, how clean our plates, etc., were. They discussed among themselves the probable object of our visit, and at length decided that we were tea-merchants, going to the Bohea Hills to buy tea. One asked why we closed our eyes and repeated words before and after meals. I told them I was a disciple of Jesus, and we were taught by Him to thank God, the great heavenly Father, for giving us the food we ate. I endeavored by God's help to lay before them the leading truths of Christianity, no doubt in an imperfect manner; but I am sure they understood all I said, from the attention they paid and from the questions they asked."

Yes, however dull of hearing those ignorant Chinamen might be, the blessing of the Holy Spirit on the simple, earnest words of the missionary caused them to understand with their heads, and in many cases to believe with their hearts. In one city where a preaching place had been erected, and the pulpit supplied by native catechists from other towns, a young man, who even in that heathen community had rendered himself so odious by evil living that his father felt forced to disinherit him, was brought under the power of the truth, and at once began to wrestle with God for his father's soul. The old man yielded also after a time. On a subsequent visit, Mr. Wolfe found both father and son still walking in the truth. But old Sieh, the father, had grown in grace more rapidly than his boy. "Song To," asked Mr. Wolfe of the son, "why is it that your father has gone so far ahead of you in the doctrines, when you were before him in the truth?" "Ah, Sing-tung," was the answer, "my father is continually praying." They both had discovered that continual prayer was the great means of growth in spiritual life.

It was no small comfort, too, to their spiritual father to find that so many of these Chinese converts stood the last great test. They "died well." Let our readers take up Aaron and Hur's position in the conflict, and by effectual prayer bring down blessings which shall avail much for the soldiers of the Cross in distant lands.

THE WESTERN FARMER'S STORY.

(See Illustration.)

"PLEASE to give me a nickel," said a miserable-looking man to a tall, active young fellow of about two-and twenty years of age, who was stepping briskly out of the Post-office in New York, one cold winter day.

"What for? You ought not to be in want; why don't you work as I do," said the young man.

"Oh, don't refuse me, sir, I cannot get work, and I have had nothing to eat all day. I am so cold and miserable. I came over last week from Ireland, and I have not a friend in America."

"Oh, you are from the old country, are you? Well, so am I. Here's a quarter for you. Now go and get something to eat, and then, if you really want to get work, you come to me at Sweeny's Hotel, and I'll see what I can do for you. Ask for James Marvin."

"Thank you, sir," said the man, "I'll come."

About an hour afterward young Marvin received his visitor. He looked at him suspiciously as he entered, and in a minute or two he said, "Why, you've been drinking."

"Yes, sir, but only one glass just to drink your health. One glass of old Irish whiskey; it warms me in this awful cold. I'd sooner have it than food."

"Ah!" said Marvin, "that accounts for your having to beg. I can't do anything for a man that loves whiskey like that."

"Don't say that, sir. I'll starve to death if you don't help me. No one has spoken a kind word to me since I landed until I met you. Indeed and indeed, I'll give up the whiskey if you'll help me."

"Now, see here," said young Marvin, "I'll tell you what I can do. I want a man to help me on my farm in the West. I'm going to start for there to-morrow. I would sooner employ a countryman than anybody else, and I'll give you the chance if you like. But remember, no whiskey. The first glass I know of your drinking, you leave."

The offer was gladly accepted; Mike Walters, if the truth were told, being pleased that he was to have employment in a place where he would be out of the way of a temptation he knew he could not resist. The next day, seated by the side of the young farmer, Mike was speeding away toward his new home.

"Now," said Marvin, "tell me all about yourself and your home. It's twelve years since I left Ireland, but I remember the old place very well."

Mike's story was soon told. Drinking and idle ways had taken him into bad company. He was implicated in more than one outrage on the law, and finally found it convenient to secure his liberty by crossing the Atlantic.

"Now, you are a new arrival," said Marvin, "and my experience may be useful to you; so I'll tell you about myself. Twelve years ago, when I was a lad of ten, I was about as miserable a boy as you can imagine. My father had drunk himself into the poorhouse, and my mother was out at service. The home was broken up. It was not much of a home at the best, and I hired myself out to do odd jobs on the farm where my father used to live. I had a hard time of it, and there seemed no hope for me.

"There was a school in the village, but there was no chance for me to go, for I worked hard all day; but I used to envy the boys and girls who could go. One day I mustered up enough courage to ask the schoolmaster if he could help me out of school hours. He was very kind to me, and lent me a book, and I used to go to him whenever I had a chance, and very soon I learned to read. That pleased the schoolmaster, and in a little while we got to be fast friends. He took a great interest in me, and would insist on my signing the pledge, and I did. After that we became greater friends than ever.

"One day, I shall never forget it, Mr. Wylie, that was the schoolmaster's name, came over to the farm, and called me to him. 'James,' he said, 'I can send you to America. It'll be the making of you, boy. My brother is over there, and he wants a smart Irish boy who hates whiskey, and he has sent the money for his passage. I think you are exactly the boy.' I can see him now as he said it looking down kindly at me as I leaned against the fence, while the boss stood near trying to hear what we were talking about. It was the turning-point of my life.

"Well, I came out and went to Mr. Wylie's brother and worked on his farm, and I've been there ever since. But now I've saved money, and I've got a farm of my own. I thought before I settled down I would take a run to New York and see the city I passed through when I was a boy, so I came, and when you met me yesterday I had just been getting two post-office orders—one for my poor mother, my father's dead now, and one for Mr. Wylie, and I have written to him to ask him if he can send me just such a boy as I was. Now, you know all about me, and if you like to drop the whiskey and take to work you may soon own your own land."

"Thank you, sir, I will," said Mike. And he kept his word.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

THE following narrative is from the pen of Alford H. McClellan, of Reed City, Mich., whose letter to her, Miss Carrie F. Judd publishes in her monthly magazine:

"One year ago to-day I was the victim of three diseases, consumption, spinal and heart troubles combined. My weaknesses were inherited, so for thirty years I have been more or less of an invalid. I have doctored with many physicians, but only received temporary relief, as they all told me my lungs were affected, and I could not be cured. A racking cough annoyed me constantly, and each autumn it seemed more desirable to die than to live and suffer as I did during the cold winter. Last fall a good friend in New York sent me 'The Prayer of Faith,' with the remark that as God was no respecter of persons, perhaps there was relief for me. I read the book, but it was so different from what a 'Scotch Presbyterian' training led me to think possible for me, I did not think I could receive a similar blessing, and so put myself under the care of a physician in Chicago, only to be disappointed.

"In November, my brother met Miss T., of Kalamazoo, who had been healed, and he was so impressed with what she told him that he talked about it a great deal, and I began to hope again. I wrote Miss T., who advised me to 'trust wholly in the Lord, and, if possible, attend a Faith Meeting in Buffalo, N. Y., as it would be very helpful.' The Lord made it possible, and I went, though I first wrote Miss Judd, who said prayer would be offered for me Thursday eve, December 14th. The morning of that day, after a sleepless night (my cough and pain in my lungs having kept me awake), I trusted myself wholly to the care of the 'Great Physician.' My cough did not leave me, but was not so distressing, and I felt better every day. In two weeks I started for Buffalo, and spent several peaceful days at 'Faith-Rest Cottage,' learning more and more of God's wonderful dealings with His believing children.

"On January 4th I was anointed, and claimed healing for body and soul, according to the command and promises in James 5 : 14, 15. Early in the spring I took a severe cold, which stayed with me a long time, but I waited His time, and soon I was well again. I have had one cold since, but not at all such as I used to have, and my lungs are so well and strong that the colder the weather the better they feel, so I dread the winter no longer. Three weeks ago an old spinal difficulty returned. I suffered it one day, thinking I must ignore its presence. Then I took it to my Lord, and retired; in the morning I felt perfectly well, and so continue to this day.

"I have one fellow-believer whose healing was most wonderful. She is an elderly Scotch lady, whose right hand had gradually withered to skin and bones. She often came into our store, and we would talk of the 'faith-healing,' but she 'did not believe it was for our day.' As I procured books on the subject I would lend them to her to read. Just before going to Buffalo, I loaned her 'The Great Physician.' I did not see her for three months, when she came into the store, and, grasping my hand, said, 'I see by your looks you are healed, and this proves I am,' and she nearly crushed my hand with what had been a useless, shrivelled member. Now it 'was restored whole like the other,' as strong and plump as hand could be. She said, after reading that book, she believed in her soul God could heal her, and she then asked Him to do it. Her hand was healed gradually—day by day it improved. When first healed she did not want it known, but now glories in the fact that Jesus is her great and only Physician; and in Him will I glory. He has saved my soul, healed my body; taken away a strong love for 'light reading,' filled my heart with joy and gladness, and promised me I shall dwell in His Presence 'faultless' throughout eternity. To Him be all the glory, all the praise."

"I can send you to America."

A ROYAL PROCESSION IN MADAGASCAR.

ON page 60 is an illustration depicting a scene often witnessed a few years ago in Antananarivo, the capital of Madagascar. It represents a state procession conducting the king or the native prince on his journey of business or pleasure. Royal personages everywhere feel it incumbent upon them to produce a sensation when they travel around, and barbaric kings and princes are not behind their kind in that idea. But in Madagascar and uncivilized lands the state ceremonies necessarily differ in their character from those in civilized countries. There is the same effort to impress the people with the idea that the royal personage is a being of a higher order than the common herd—a being to be held in reverence and to be greeted with servile homage; but the idea is conveyed in a manner appropriate to the character of the people. The king or prince seats himself on a litter, the poles of which are supported by eight bearers, who carry him whither he desires to proceed. He thus becomes literally, as civilized kings are metaphorically, a burden on the shoulders of his people. Preceded by a band of music, which aims to produce noise rather than harmony, and followed by a company of soldiers, the royal progress is made. It answers the purpose intended as successfully as does the imposing cortege of European sovereigns.

The Malagese had substantial reason a quarter of a century ago to dread the appearance of such a procession. The accession to the throne of the widow of King Radama was the signal for the outburst of oppression and persecution. The missionaries of the Gospel, who in 1818 commenced the preaching of Christ to the people, were in imminent danger of death. A more wicked, cruel queen never swayed a sceptre. The Christian converts among her people especially excited her animosity. They were hunted like wild beasts, tortured, and killed with inhuman barbarities. The missionaries fled from the island. The edict of expulsion issued against them left them no hope that their lives would be spared if they remained. But they had sown seed which God blessed and caused to fructify. A portion of the Bible was already in the hands of the people; many had been taught to read its pages, and a few had been born again of the Spirit.

When, on the death of the cruel queen in 1861, the missionaries returned to the island, they found that not even persecution to death had been able to crush out the Gospel from among the people. They were received with open arms by the native Christians, who longed for further instruction, and from that time until the recent invasion of the French brought odium on all foreigners, the missionaries have been honored by the people. The queen has encouraged them, and has not only listened attentively to their preaching, but has consulted them on questions of government. To their efforts is largely due the advance Madagascar has made in civilization. Unhappily, the progress has been checked by French cupidity and cruelty, but many prayers are offered that even this check may be overruled of God to the good of the country.

An incident of the time of persecution, which was related to the missionaries on their return to the island, reminds us of the time when the disciples were assembled in the upper room secretly, for fear of the Jews, and of the later time when, prompted by the Pope and his priests, kings united to suppress heresy, and Protestants held their services in constant apprehension of discovery and punishment. To reduce the risks of discovery the Malagese Christians held their services at the midnight hour. When the inhabitants generallywere asleep, Christians would gather together in secret, and in subdued tones whisper their devotions. On one occasion, when a few of them were bowed in prayer, an officer entered. He held a high rank in the army, an honorable and friendly man, but not hitherto known as a Christian. Filled with surprise, not unmixed with apprehension, the brethren suspended their service and waited in silence for an explanation. This was frankly given. The officer declared himself to be one of their number, and added that he had been constrained to join them in this their hour of weakness and peril because he abhorred the injustice with which they had been treated by the queen. That was a memorable night in the history of the persecuted flock, as it encouraged them more firmly to endure "as seeing Him who is invisible," and who was by His providence thus raising them up friends in the hour of trial. He who thus, when others shrank away, came bravely forward to share their perils, proved subsequently one of their wisest counsellors and best protectors.

POVERTY'S PREY.

Trial and Sentence.

EUCLID'S senses came back to him very slowly; and it was two or three days before he recovered the full possession of his memory, so as to be able to make a deposition before a magistrate. Blackett and David were committed to take their trial at the Central Criminal Court. Victoria had come back to help to nurse her father; and for a short time their life fell back into its old course, excepting that Euclid no longer started off for the market every morning.

Yet how changed the life was from that old life of wretchedness in the garret. Through Mr. Dudley's care and kindness the lives of three people—four really, for Mrs. Linnett had benefited too—had been revolutionized. The old water-cress seller, poor as he was, was comparatively a happy man. Victoria was happily married, and Bess was growing up a strong and healthy woman. The coarse and dirty surroundings of their previous experience they remembered with a shudder, but they would have been there still but for the help Mr. Dudley had been able to afford them. So much had been the fruit of an expenditure so small that many a man wastes more in a single hour in luxury. How they wished that they had known their kind friend a few months earlier. Then David might have been saved. Poverty had taken him for its prey, and had handed him over to vice. It distressed them all to think of David and more than all that they must soon give evidence that would convict him of the burglary.

That dreaded day came at last, when Euclid and Mrs. Linnett, and poor Bess herself, were compelled to appear at the sessions and give their evidence against David and Blackett. Mr. Dudley had engaged counsel to defend David, that every fact in his favor might be made public, and his sentence, in consequence, be mitigated. There was not the shadow of a hope of an acquittal.

When Bess stood up in the witness-box, she saw only two faces clearly. There was David, pale, abject, frightened, with bent head, and dim, mournful eyes fastened upon her; and there was the judge opposite to her, calm and grave, with a searching keenness in his gaze. As she told her name, David's lips moved a little, as though he was repeating it to himself.

Unconsciously, merely answering the questions put to her, Bess told the story of David's two first convictions, and the sorrow they had wrought.

"He was always a good boy to mother and me," she said, sobbing; "and he's good to me still. He'd never be told where I lived for fear he'd spoil my life. O Davy! Davy!"

She burst into tears, and stretched out her arms to him, as if she would throw them about his bowed-down head, and cling to him in face of them all, in spite of his deep disgrace. David laid his head on the bar at which he stood, and shook with the sobs he forced himself to control.

He did not look up again till Euclid was taking the oath. The old man appeared many years older than he had done before the murderous attack made upon him His gray hair was quite white, and his cheeks and temples had fallen in like those of a very aged man; but he smiled at David, and nodded affectionately. So far as the cruel assault upon himself went, he completely cleared him: it was Blackett alone that had maltreated him.

"David Fell never lifted up his hand agen me, my lord and judge," said Euclid warmly and energetically. "He fought for me, and I'd ha' been a murdered man this minute but for him. Why, I've known David ever since he was this high, and he'd ha' made a good man, if he'd had a chance. He hadn't a chance after he'd been sent to jail, and his mother was as good a woman as ever you see."

At the mention of his mother, David's face grew as pale as death, and his lips quivered. He fancied he could hear her voice calling his name. For years past he had tried to deaden the memory of her; but now it seemed as if he could see her plainly, sitting by the dim, red light of a handful of embers, talking to him and Bess about their father. To work hard and honestly as his father had done had been his mother's religion—the simple code of duty she had tried to teach him. Thank God, his mother was in her grave, and knew nothing of his guilt and shame!

His brain grew weary, and he ceased to take notice of what was going on after Euclid disappeared. Different men stood up and spoke—some for a minute or two, others for longer; but he did not understand them; their speech was as a foreign tongue to him. His previous convictions had been very summary, and the proceedings now appeared complicated and perplexing. Why were they so long over this trial? Everybody knew he had broken into the house for the purpose of robbery. His first two trials, when he was a young lad, had not occupied five minutes each. Why were they so much more careful of him now when it was too late?

At last his wandering attention was caught by the utterance of his mother's name. He turned his eyes to the speaker, and never withdrew them from his face until he ceased to speak. It was the counsel whom Mr. Dudley had engaged for him. The counsel said:

"Elizabeth Fell was left a widow at the age of twenty-four with a boy and girl to provide for. What aid did we offer her? We told her she might take refuge in our poor-house among the outcasts and profligates of her sex, where we would take from her her children, who were as dear to her as our children are to their mothers, and bring them up apart from her. If she refused such an offer, we would leave her to fight her battle alone. She chose drudgery and hunger—a terrible disease, and death itself—rather than take our aid on our terms.

"When she lay dying, gnawed by famine, with a mere pittance of out-door relief, her son, a lad under fourteen years of age, ventured to go out and beg for his mother. He was ashamed to beg, willing, on the other hand, to work, having an ambition to tread in the steps of his father, the honest and skilful artisan. What did we do for Elizabeth Fell's child? We arrested him, dragged him before a hurried and over-worked magistrate, omitted to investigate his statements, and, after a brief trial of four or five minutes, sent him to jail for three months. This was in England!

"David Fell hastened home, when his first imprisonment was ended, to find his mother still alive, but on her death-bed. In her dire extremity she had parted with the most sacred treasure she possessed—her wedding-ring; and she and her young daughter had literally starved themselves to redeem this sacred symbol. It was redeemed the day after David Fell's release from jail; but the ring given back by the pawnbroker was not the familiar, precious relic, so perfectly known to them all. It had either been sweated by the dishonest pawnbroker, or exchanged for another and a thinner ring.

"The lad, in a passion of mingled grief and resentment, rushes away to secure his mother's own wedding-ring. The man assailed his dying mother's good fame; and, utterly reckless of all consequences, David Fell sprang upon him in a frenzy of hot resentment, and felled him to the ground. The pawnbroker was a householder and a rate-payer. Once again there was no investigation made. No credence was given to the boy's angry and bewildered statements. We committed him a second time to jail for three months.

"These were the two first steps—two long stages—on the road to ruin—the road which has led him to this bar to-day. Who is to blame?—the lad, willing to work, but untaught and awkward, with no training but that of the street, whom no man would hire for his want of skill and dexterity? or the magistrate, over-worked with a pressure of serious business? or the police, with their legion of juvenile criminals, whose statements are mostly falsehoods? The magistrate cannot give the time, the police cannot give the trouble, to investigate cases like David Fell's.

"The boy was like other boys, our sons, with high spirits and heedless heads. Have we never known our sons beg—ay, and beg importunately—for what they want? Do they not fight at times on a tenth part of the provocation this boy had? I will go further. Have none of them ever been guilty of some small theft? Would you send those thoughtless, passionate lads of yours, who are to come after you in life as citizens standing in the places you win for them—would you send them, for such crimes as David Fell committed—begging for his dying mother, and defending her good name—to the black shadow of a jail, and the deep brand of imprisonment? Would you bind your boys, hand and foot, and cast them into a gulf, and, if they crawled out of it, crush them down again, because they brought with them the mire and clay of the pit? Yet this is what we do with our juvenile criminals.

"The prisoner is guilty of burglary. He is not yet nineteen years of age, and he has been already four times in jail. I ask again, Whose fault is it?

"He must be punished? True. But let the penalty—too well deserved this time—be tempered with mercy. We have tried severity. We have confounded his sense of right and wrong; it is we who have extinguished the feeble glimmer of light his poor mother had kindled in his conscience. I ask you to remember the prisoner's sad career, his devotion to his mother, his love for his young sister, his defence of the old man from the murderous attack made upon him. I ask you to remember, that, while he was yet a child, in this Christian land of ours, we sent him once and again to jail as the fitting penalty for childish faults."

David heard no more, nor had he fully understood the words he had listened to. His throat was parched, and his sight was dim. The court seemed filled with mist, which blurred all the faces around him. He stood at the bar for a very long time yet before the policeman next to him nudged him roughly, and bade him attend to his lordship.

"Have you any thing to say for yourself?" asked the judge.

"Nothing; only I'd ha' drownded myself before I'd ha' hurt little Bess or old Euclid," he stammered.

In a few minutes after, he was led down a staircase into a room on the floor below the court, and a policeman was fitting him with handcuffs.

"What are they goin' to do with Blackett and me?" he asked.

"Didn't you hear the sentence?" rejoined the policeman.

"No," he answered. "I can't see nor hear nothin' plain."

"Ten years for Blackett," was the reply, "and two for you. You're let off pretty easy."

David returned to jail broken-hearted and weary of life. Circumstances had thrust him into a career to which he had not been born; he could not drift with the tide that was rapidly sweeping him down to utter rascaldom. His early training, and his faithful love for his mother and sister, set him at odds with the mass of young thieves born and bred amid the lowest dregs of the London populace. There had always been a vital difference between him and them.

He had never ceased to be conscious of an aching sense of degradation and loss lurking beneath the artificial pleasure Blackett had taught him to feel in the vicious habits of men like himself. He had learned to associate with them; but he had never been in heart one of them. And now that he had been blindly led into crime against the home that had sheltered Bess, and against her friend old Euclid, who had barely escaped with his life, he felt as if he had sunk to the last depth of infamy and wickedness.

It was little Bess herself who had hindered him from making his escape. Poor little Bess! how desperately she had clung to the thief, lest he should get clear off! Dreams of it visited him in his prison-cell. When he fell asleep he seemed to be about to make some hairbreadth escape into freedom and a better life; but at the last moment, when success appeared sure, Bess would snatch him back, and plunge him again into his gulf of dark despair.

It was always Bess who held him fast till his enemies—sometimes human, sometimes devilish—were upon him. And then, when he was recaptured, and she saw his face, who it was, and called him by his name, she would fall down at his feet, and die; and it was his wickedness that had killed her! Such dreams as these terrified and scared him.

David became a loathing to himself. A thief! It was the name he had been taught to abhor and dread from his infancy. His mother's simple creed had been, to be honest and industrious, and to take all that happened to her as being the will of God. But now he was himself the being his mother had most feared and hated. It was as if some tender-hearted man had found himself guilty of an act of savage cruelty, or an innocent, guileless girl had plunged unawares into an abyss of infamy.

David had become the thing which he abhorred; he was an abomination to himself. Two years would soon pass away. But what after that? He would still be a thief, when he was released from jail, and the ranks of honest men would be more firmly closed against him than ever. If he could have his choice, he would stay within the shadow of the prison-walls, and not creep forth again to find no comradeship except with thieves. His heart failed him to think of having no fellowship but with such men as Blackett. He knew that there was not a chance of anything better. The jail-brand could never be got rid of in this life.

He was no longer classed among the juvenile criminals. He worked at his trade among the adult prisoners; but he held no manner of intercourse with any of them. The work he did was little—not enough to keep him from frequent punishment; but neither encouragement nor punishment aroused him to any interest in it. He was never heard to speak in answer to praise or blame. His eyes were often fixed on the floor, as if he was lost in a kind of dream. He was silent, apathetic, and sullen. Whatever was going on around him, he appeared deaf and blind and dumb. Often he looked almost imbecile.

Now and then a darker shadow brooded over his face. It was when the thought crossed his brain of how easily he could put an end to his misery, if he were but standing once more on the brink of the river. He could fancy he saw its rapid current hurrying away to the sea. Why had he never escaped from the wretchedness that hemmed him in by this swift and easy road? Here, in jail, it would be difficult to make an end of himself. It had been done; but he shrank from the way to do it. If he could only fling himself into the cool, rapid river, and sink in it!

There was chapel for him, and daily prayers, and the chaplain's visits; but none of them brought comfort to his despair. They were part of the machinery of the criminal court and the jail. The religion was that of the State, which had first neglected him, and then driven him into the gulf which had swallowed him up body and soul. If that religion was for any upon earth, it was for the rich and powerful, not for the poor and feeble like his mother, and the erring and sinful like himself! The poor were pinned down to suffering and crime; while the rich were fenced in from temptation to outward sins, and set in high places to make laws and enforce them. Such Christianity was no Gospel to David Fell.

MISSIONARY PROGRESS.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 3, Acts 15 : 36–41 ; 16 : 1–10. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 3 : 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul Proposes a Pastoral Journey—A Sad Dispute —Satan's Separating Tactics—The Evil Effects of the Quarrel—Made a Precedent in these Days —Always a Basis for Unity—A New Helper—Timothy a God-Prepared Instrument—A Daily Increase Normal—A Prohibition from God—A Definite Direction.

PAUL and Barnabas continued for some time at Antioch "teaching and preaching the Word of the Lord." These were not the only teachers in Antioch, there were "many others also." It was probably a kind of school of the prophets drawn together by the Holy Ghost, an advanced guard of the Church. But new ground must be broken up, and done. Accordingly "after some days, Paul said unto Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do." Nothing is told us as to whether this purpose proceeded from Paul or from the Lord. When they had first gone forth into missionary labor it was at the decided call of the Holy Ghost to just that work at that time (Acts 13 : 2); now Paul says, "Let us go." Perhaps in the one instance we are permitted to see behind the scenes and in the other it is not given to us.

Then follows one of the saddest things in the history of the early Church, the contention of these two honored men of God. "Barnabas determined to take with them John, whose surname was Mark." This was in accordance with the spirit of a man who bore the name "son of consolation." Barnabas would see the grace of God equal to restore Mark. Paul saw how grievously he had wronged the cause by leaving it as he did, and felt that it was good discipline for him to be left at home and not put immediately again into a position of trust. Satan is always busy in seeking to SEPARATE CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

One may understand God's leadings, and another, naturally far more gifted, may judge of them from a human standpoint, and look upon them as delusion. Satan will make everything appear in a wrong light on either side in order to bring about contention. Again, one worker may have something of idolatry for another, may want to occupy himself with the other whether he desires it or not, may feel almost jealous that even God should have intercourse with the other which he has not. Sometimes, as in the present instance, something arises in which God alone can rightly decide. For either to give way would appear to be wronging conscience. But how easy for both to be willingly fools, willingly withdrawing all opinion, all prejudice to let the Lord Himself show His mind. This is the only way to unity.

God, however, overruled this painful and most unchristlike contention. It was so sharp that these two men, called of the Holy Ghost to work together, separated. But by this means four missionaries were at work instead of two: Barnabas and Mark in Cyprus, and Paul, who chose Silas in the place of Barnabas, departed, being recommended by the brethren to the grace of God. "And he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches." But God's overruling of this thing did not make it right, and did not lessen the injury it has done through many ages to such as justify their own contentions from the example of these men of old.

There is always room for unity if everything is referred to Jesus, and the will of all the parties concerned is indeed renounced. God's way is always perfect; and if we yield to His way He will make our way perfect. Self is always at the bottom of contention. While we are completely yielded up to God we can trust Him to bring us right, if we are in the wrong, or others whom we work with, if they happen to be in the wrong. Contention comes from taking the matter into our own hands. Satan says: "But if so and so does not yield, such and such things will happen." And so it seems. But God is equal to undertake all the consequences of our fully trusting Him; we have nothing to fear. Thank God, we have nothing to do with past experience when we are dealing with God; He knows how to do "a new thing in the earth." "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21 : 5).

Paul's journey was from Antioch northward, and then through the south of Asia Minor, "confirming the churches." His purpose had been to confirm those churches which he had founded. Among them was, doubtless, that of Tarsus, his birthplace, where he would have messages for his own family. We are not told with what results this visit was. On coming for the third time to Derbe and Lystra, Paul made acquaintance with whom he afterward calls "my own son in the faith" (1 Tim. 1 : 2), and of whom he wrote to the Philippians, "I have no man likeminded, who will naturally care for your state" (Phil. 2 : 20); Timothy was an exception to those who "all seek their own; not the things which are Jesus Christ's." Timothy was already a disciple, but was probably very young at this time. It was only about eight years since the Gospel had been preached in Lystra, and the young Timothy had had the greatest advantages in having a godly mother and grandmother who from his childhood instructed him in the Holy Scriptures, in addition to which he was possessed of "unfeigned faith," and he was "well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium." He was a God-prepared instrument, and as such Paul recognized him. Whether it was the leading of God or human policy which led Paul to circumcise him, we know not; the only reason given is "because of the Jews which were in those quarters: for they all knew that his father was a Greek;" it looks rather as though Paul were afraid of "the strife of tongues," and himself undertook the management of this matter.

As they went through the cities, they delivered there the decrees which were ordained in that first council of the Church at Jerusalem, blessedly confirming Christian liberty: "and so were the churches established in the faith, and

INCREASED IN NUMBER DAILY."

It is the normal and not the extraordinary state of things in a church for conversions to take place daily, for souls to be sanctified daily, for bodies to be healed daily. There are lost ones enough all around us to work among, there are Christians enough living under the power of inbred sin, there are sick ones enough who need healing. "But we find after a time of revival, when a certain number are gathered, others get hard and the work seems to cease." This is just the moment for God's children to get down low before the Lord, and ask, and claim His light upon the situation. He is faithful, and will not fail to show where the hitch is, and how to proceed further.

After the little increased company had gone through Phrygia and Galatia, an unexpected stop was put to their labors. It was not, as in their former journey, from the persecution of the Jews, nor yet from the fury of the heathen.

THE HOLY GHOST HIMSELF

forbade them to preach the Word in Asia. Some Christian workers kick against any hinderance to their work, and set every energy to work to get back into the old groove—God has blest them there, and they cannot conceive of His wanting them in any other work. God wanted Paul in Europe, but he did a great deal of trying to work in Asia before he was still enough to understand the mind of the Lord. Sometimes God takes away the voice of a worker, and instead of going to the Lord and saying, "Lord, is this a hint that I am to leave off talking and take to praying?" he will go to doctor after doctor, try remedy after remedy, seek climate after climate, that he may get cured and return to his beloved work. But it may be that work is now meant for others—God has a needs be to employ him in quite another kind of work. Or, again, circumstances, and not want of health, may hinder a worker from the service which he has loved, and he frets against them and chafes as though both he and Christ were wronged, while all the time God is behind those circumstances, and is seeking to teach His child precious lessons, which in all the bustle of active service are not so easily learned. Oh, how much time, how much sorrow, how much suffering should we save ourselves, if we took up the position of Habakkuk, "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what He will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved."

Paul had been directed what he should not do, but was still not clear as to what he was to do. But the Holy Ghost restrained him when attempting to go into Bithynia, and so kept them straight in their course toward the west coast, until they came to Troas, the old city of Troy, and a seaport. Then was given Paul in a vision. "There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us." This was enough; he had got his clue, and could go straight forward. "I wish I got clearer direction from God," one often hears said. The Lord keeps us humble in this thing as in all others, and specially dependent upon Him. Many are left unguided, because they are not sure God is willing to guide them; they have not taken it as an established fact that He has undertaken to guide them, and so they still are in unrest, seeking to help Him by adding bits of human wisdom—not absolutely depending upon Him. His promise is, "I will guide thee with Mine eye;" but this implies close attention on our part. One look away, and the guiding glance may be missed. But nothing is so restful as God's guidance; all sense of responsibility about the thing in which God is guiding us passes from us to Him. His will is lovely, perfect, good, acceptable, and oh, how possible! Here was our God providing for the evangelization of the continent of Europe, and most surely He made provision for the young churches in Asia, too.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Change of Cabinet has Taken Place in Spain. The Sagasta Cabinet proposed in the Cortes an address to the king in which its policy was outlined. The deputies, however, opposed the adoption of the address, and succeeded in defeating the Cabinet. The ministers resigned on January 18th. The king having to choose a new Cabinet from the victorious party, which was composed of Conservatives and Republicans, called the former to his councils, and their leader, Señor Canovas del Castillo, has become prime-minister. There are indications of uneasiness among the Spanish people, and dissatisfaction with the government. The hopes of the Republicans and the fears of the Monarchists are excited.

An Agitation among the Workingmen of Paris has assumed a menacing aspect. On January 13th a meeting of 4000 unemployed persons, including several women, was held in Paris. Violent speeches were delivered, favoring an armed revolution as the only means of ending the stagnation in trade. The delegates present from workingmen's associations, however, adopted a more moderate tone, expressing the belief that an appeal to the Chambers would mitigate the crisis. Two days later delegates from the workingmen had a conference with members of the Chamber of Deputies. The delegates pointed out that 150,000 hands were out of employment, and they demanded that the Chamber of Deputies make arrangements to provide work for them. M. Clemenceau advised the delegates to return and obtain a mandate from the workingmen. The delegates refused to withdraw. Other deputies urged the delegates to remain calm, saying that it was necessary before taking action to have an explicit statement of the workingmen's wishes. A proposal is now being discussed for an advance of money from the National Treasury to enable the workingmen to get their tools out of pawn. That, however, will not end the agitation, as the men when they have their tools, cannot do anything with them. The attitude of the men is menacing. They declare that they and their families are starving.

Important Measures are to be Submitted to the British Parliament at its approaching session. Mr. Gladstone has issued a circular to his supporters in the House of Commons requesting their attendance at the opening of Parliament on the 5th of February. He says it is the desire of the government to submit to the House of Commons at the earliest day possible after its opening, proposals of much public interest and importance. The character of these measures is inferred from a speech delivered at Newcastle on January 15th, by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, President of the Board of Trade, and the most influential member of the Cabinet. He said that the government would not consider its task complete until Irishmen possess the same rights and privileges as Englishmen and Scotchmen.

General Gordon, better Known as "Chinese" Gordon, will not be permitted to resign his office in the British Army to go on the Belgian mission to the Congo. His resignation has been rejected, and he has been intrusted with a command in Egypt. A cable despatch states that he started on January 18th for Egypt. General Gordon, before departing, had a long conference with the Duke of Cambridge, the Commander-in-Chief of the English forces, and Lord Wolseley, the Adjutant-General. It is stated that he will go to Khartoum with full power to make the best arrangement possible to settle the affairs of the Soudan. General Gordon is to be in nowise answerable to the Khédive. He was given to understand that the government would strictly adhere to its intention to evacuate the Soudan Prior to his departure General Gordon informed the King of the Belgians that he hoped to fulfil his engagement for service on the Congo River after his return from the Soudan. The London Times states that General Gordon is instructed to provide in the best manner possible for the safety of the European population at Khartoum and the various Egyptian garrisons; also to conduct the evacuation of the Soudan, except on the seaboard. General Gordon probably knows more of the Soudan and the tribes there than any other European, a fact which doubtless decided the British Government to retain his services in this crisis.

A Massacre at Khartoum is Apprehended as inevitable. The latest despatches announce that the van of El Mahdi's column is marching down the White Nile River and has halted but a few miles from the city. Colonel Coetlogon, who is in command at Khartoum, contrived to communicate with Baker Pacha and said he intended to try to effect a march to Kassola, as all the other roads out of Khartoum were held by the enemy. Colonel Coetlogon asked Baker Pacha to send him assistance by the way of Massowah. The Egyptian Government, however, refused to sanction the plan. Meanwhile the sole remaining road of escape has been cut off by El Mahdi, and Colonel Coetlogon and his forces are shut up in Khartoum. Hundreds of fugitives have fled from Khartoum, and have reached Kassola in safety; but a body of troops would be cut off and massacred as were those of Hicks Pacha. Reinforcements of troops are leaving Cairo for Suakim, and Baker Pacha's force will be raised to ten thousand men, with some field guns and gatlings. He is also endeavoring by bribes and cajoleries to enlist the aid of natives.

A New King of Tonquin has been Crowned at the capital. The French Minister there thus describes the affair and the policy of the new government, which appears to be favorable to France rather than to China: "The ceremony of coronation was without precedent, and was conducted with Oriental pomp. After salutations had been exchanged the king requested me to approach. He desired me to convey to the French Government the assurance of his respect and devotion, and expressed a hope that the severity of the treaty stipulations between the two countries would be mitigated. I assured the king of our sympathy and good-will. The king was crowned under the name of Kien-Phua, which signifies the 'Height of Felicity.' The power is held by one of the regents, who was formerly a leader of the revolution. He is disposed to follow our counsels."

Mohammedan Professions of Loyalty to the Sultan of Turkey have been made by the chief officers of the faith. The Constantinople correspondent of the New York Herald telegraphs that on December 23d he had a long conversation with an Arab sheik who is an intimate friend and relative of the Grand Shereef of Mecca, and has just returned from the Hedjaz bearing a message from the Grand Shereef and the Ulemas of Mecca to the Sultan, assuring his Majesty of their loyalty to Abdul Hamid, as Caliph, and that he need have no fear of the self-styled Mahdi spreading contamination or disaffection on the eastern shores of the Red Sea. The sheik explained to him that the ruling caste in the holy cities, though they have no great love for the Turks, have no wish to see them replaced as guardians of the shrines of Islam by hordes of savage negroes from the Soudan. The sheik concluded the conversation by saying: "Islam has seen fall too many false prophets to fear the rise of this one. He is a long way from Stamboul, and a wide sea is between us."

An Extensive Revival of Religion in the Island of Jersey is described in the European press. Miss Laurie McLatchie, the eminent Scottish Gospel Temperance Evangelist, has been for some time conducting a Blue Ribbon Army mission there, and has been wonderfully blessed. The Jersey Observer says: "It has been our privilege to listen to the greatest lights in every department in science, both in the old world and in the new. We have been entranced as it were at the brilliant oratory of women of note, both on this side as well as on the other side of the Atlantic; but never have we listened to any one with such rapt attention as we have done to the oratory of the lady evangelist and lecturer, Miss Laurie McLatchie. It seems to us that even now the music of her eloquence, the richness and purity of her diction, her beautifully rounded periods, still vibrate in our ears. No wonder, then, that this lady, whose reputation preceded her, should have drawn nightly crowded audiences to listen with rivetted attention to the message of her Divine Master. There was not even standing-room. Both the social status and the numbers present testified to the interest taken in her proclamation of Divine Truth."

Mrs. Amanda Smith is Still Laboring in Grand Bassa, Liberia. In a letter just received from her by Miss Mason, Kilburn, she says: "You will see that I have not yet gone to Cape Town. I do not know when the Lord will bid me go from here, where there is so much to do."

A REMARKABLE work has just been issued by Mr. R. Worthington of New York. It is remarkable not only on account of the extraordinary history related in it, but because it has been written at all. During the last twenty years the world has wanted to know something more than the newspapers have told, of the hero who combined in his character religious principles, which caused people to call him an apostle, and military skill which was characterized as Napoleonic. But until now the story of his life has never been fully told. The Christian hero shrank from public notice with more than feminine modesty. He would not be lionized even when the world was ringing with his name. He would relate incidents, strange and thrilling, at his mother's fireside to a group of spellbound relatives, but in public he was dumb. "The newspapers have said too much already," was his reply to all efforts to induce him to speak. He would not even take the chair at public meetings, and to those who got up banquets and dinners in his honor he wrote declining to attend. "I have enough," he said; "call in the poor and the sick." A relative who had been with him in some of the scenes of his life, and who had heard from him descriptions of other scenes, wrote his history. Before publishing it he submitted it to Gordon to revise, and Gordon tore out the pages and burned them. But the demand for a life of the brave, modest hero grew imperative, and at last his cousin, Mr. A. Egmont Hake, who derived his information from Gordon himself verbally and from his letters home, has written this work unknown to its subject, and, doubtless, much to his chagrin. But it is well that it is written, for a life so strange, so romantic, and so noble, the public has never read.

Gordon is a major-general in the British service, a Mandarin of the highest order in the service of China, and a Pasha in the service of the Turkish Government. He was Governor of the Soudan in 1877, over which the so-called "False Prophet of the Soudan" is now spreading his rebellion.

Charles George Gordon was born at Blackheath, near London, about the year 1830, we believe, and is now somewhat more than fifty years of age. His father was an officer of the Royal Engineers, and a man of sterling uprightness and consistent piety. Charles was the youngest of a family of five sons and six daughters. He was educated at Taunton, and at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich.

ENTERS THE ARMY.

In June, 1852, he entered the Royal Engineers as a second lieutenant, and was ordered on service to Pembroke. There he was engaged in making plans for forts at the entrance of the Haven. In February, 1854, he was promoted to be first lieutenant, and in November in the same year, he got orders for Corfu, but early in December his route was changed, and he was commissioned to go to the Crimea instead, to take part in the war England, France, and Turkey were waging against Russia.

IN THE TRENCHES BEFORE SEBASTOPOL.

From February 28th to April 9th, Gordon's task was to make new batteries in the advance trenches, and during this time he met with a narrow escape from a bullet fired at him from one of the Russian rifle-pits, about one hundred and eighty yards distant. The missile passed within an inch of his head; but in referring to the incident in one of his letters, the only comment is, "They (the Russians) are very good marksmen; their bullet is large and pointed."

A few days after this one of his captains, named Craigie, was killed by a splinter from the Russians' shells, and in noting the event, Gordon observes, "I am glad to say that he was a serious man. The shell burst above him, and by what is called chance struck him in the back, killing him at once."

Mr. Hake gives the following stirring description of one of the incidents of the campaign: "On June 6th, 1855, the English opened fire from all the batteries, and there ensued in which a thousand guns were engaged. Gordon, who was in the trenches during the whole time was returned as among the wounded, but his injury was such that he was able to continue his duty. A stone, thrown up by a round shot, stunned him for a second, but did him no further hurt." The following day the French attacked the Mamelon, and the crash and carnage were tremendous. "Only a few lines," writes his brother from the scene of action, "to say Charley is all right, and has escaped amid a terrific shower of grape and shells of every description. You may imagine the suspense I was in until assured of his safety." With the fall and capture of Sebastopol in September, 1856, the Russian war was ended, and Gordon's duties in the Crimea shortly after came to an end.

In May, 1856, Gordon was appointed Assistant Commissioner in Bessarabia, to help in the work of laying down the new frontiers of Russia, Turkey, and Roumania, and subsequently arranging the Asiatic frontiers of Armenia, a work of considerable danger and difficulty owing to the wild character of the tribes of Armenia. In 1859, he was engaged at Chatham as Field-work Instructor and Adjutant.

THE CHINESE REBELLION.

A rebellion broke out at Tai-Ping, Pekin, China, in July, 1860, and Lieutenant Gordon started for Hong-Kong, proceeding thence to Shanghai, whence, after only one day's stay, he continued his journey for Tientsin, having travelled in all sixty-eight days. Being informed that his colleague De Norman, with other Englishmen, had been taken prisoners by the Chinese, and that in consequence of this outrage, the allies (French and English) marched on Pekin in October, and were about to invest the city, Gordon took part in the operations, and was present at the sacking and burning of the Emperor's Summer Palace on October 12th.

For a month after these events, Gordon remained in camp before Pekin, paying occasional visits to the capital, and making his observations on the Chinese and their modes of living. On November 8th, the two armies left for Tientsin, there to take up their winter quarters; and Gordon, with his regiment, went as commanding Royal Engineers. There he remained till the spring of 1862. During this time he surveyed the neighboring country in parts where no European had ever been seen. He also made an expedition on horseback to the Outer Wall, visiting in the course of his journey regions before unknown to Europeans. In May, 1862, the Tai-ping rebels becoming troublesome in the neighborhood of Shanghai, it was considered necessary to undertake some operations against them. It was now that the most romantic incidents of Gordon's career took place—the incidents which won him

THE NAME OF "CHINESE GORDON."

The Tai-ping rebellion was the outcome of the exorbitant pretensions of a schoolmaster, named Hung-tsue-schuen, who took advantage of the general discontent, and gathered to him thousands of adherents, and, deluding them into the belief that they were the soldiers of a divine cause, spread ruin, fire, and famine over the length and breadth of the Flowery Land. Some, of course, thought him mad; but as his clansmen numbered 20,000, and the means he employed to convert them were masterly, he soon collected about him a band of followers not unlike an army.

THE ASSUMPTIONS OF THE CHIEF REBEL.

Among his preposterous and arrogant allegations were the following: he was inspired to usurp the Dragon throne, he saw visions, was a prophet of vengeance and freedom, an agent of the divine wrath, and a champion of the poor and the oppressed. He said also, that he had seen God, and the Almighty had Himself appealed to him as the Second Celestial Brother.

With his little army of converts Hung traversed his province on a proselytizing tour, breaking the idols and effacing the Confucian texts from the walls of schools and temples. A collision soon occurred between these rebels and the Mandarins, or ruling class, and many disturbances arose, in which sometimes the authorities and sometimes the Tai-pings gained the day. Hung's tactics the while were worthy of so great and able a trickster. Once finding himself and his followers hard pressed and obliged to shift their ground for want of provisions, he left his quarters secretly, while a squadron of boys and women went on drumming within the walls, his enemy believing him still on the ground, when he and his men were miles away.

THE "HEAVENLY KING."

Defeat and victory alike drew new recruits to his following; and, in 1851, having got together an army some hundreds of thousands strong, he proclaimed himself the Heavenly King, the Emperor of the Great Peace. Then, with five Wangs, or warrior kings, chosen from among his kinsmen, he marched through China, devastating the country and augmenting his legions as he went. He brought over not only the piratical bands which infested the seaboard of Kwang-tung, but two desperate women brought more than four thousand warriors, all of whom bowed to his authority, and adopted his creed. These predatory hordes passed from province to province, armed with cutlasses and knives, and the quiet, docile Chinese were terror-stricken, and allowed themselves to be robbed of their rice harvests and the products of their farms. A march of nearly seven hundred miles brought this huge army to Nanking, which fell and became the capital of the self-styled Heavenly King.

APPEAL TO THE EUROPEANS.

Up to the year 1860 this monstrous civil war was waged solely between the followers of the rebel king and the Imperial Government. The tactics of the Imperialist leaders had all along been to drive the rebels toward the sea. The consequence was that Shanghai and other consular ports were menaced by the insurgents. Before long, however, the Chinese Government, in terrible straits, applied to the French and English allies for help. It was decided that they would first of all effectually protect Shanghai from attack, and assist the authorities in preserving tranquillity within its walls.

One of the Tai-ping leaders, named the Faithful King, advancing upon Shanghai, the allied French and British troops joined the Imperialists, and drove back the rebels with heavy loss. This was in August, 1860. But in October four great armies were sent forth under four mighty Wangs to drive the Imperialists from the cities immediately north and south of the Yangtze River, over a district extending from Nanking, a distance of about four hundred miles. The British naval Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Sir James Hope, sailed up the Yangtze, and in February, 1861, entered into communication with the Heavenly King, and arranged that the Yangtze trade was not to be interfered with, nor was Shanghai to be in any way molested by the rebel armies for the space of one year.

THREATENED ATTACK ON SHANGHAI.

At the end of the year the Heavenly King informed the British Admiral that he intended to attack Shanghai. Sir James warned him against any such proceeding, but the warning was disregarded, and the march commenced in January, 1862. This led to the allied forces co-operating with an American named Ward, who had been given the command of a powerful foreign force, which the wealthy traders of Shanghai had subscribed for, in order to keep the rebels at bay. From February to June the allied forces assisted Ward and the Imperialists. In September Ward was killed, and Burgevine, a fellow-countryman of Ward, succeeded him in the command of

as the troops were called; but in January, 1863, the new commander was cashiered for corrupt practices, and the British Government was formally applied to, and requested to provide the army with a captain in his stead.

General Staveley, to whom the request was made, at once appointed Gordon, who just after the Tai-pings had achieved a great triumph over the Ever-Victorious Army, took command of it at Sung-kiang, on March 25th, and his reasons for doing so may be seen from the following extract from a letter home. "I have taken the command and am now

A MANDARIN.

I have taken the step on consideration. I think that any one who contributes to putting down this rebellion fulfils a humane task, and I also think tends a great deal to open China to civilization. I think I am doing good service."

Without going into unnecessary detail, the result of Gordon's operations may be briefly told. He found the richest and most fertile districts of China in the hands of savage brigands. The silk districts were the scenes of their cruelty and riot, and the great historical cities of Hungchow and Soochow were rapidly following the fate of Nanking, and were becoming desolate ruins in their possession. Gordon cut the rebellion in half, recovered the great cities, isolated and utterly discouraged the fragments of the brigand power, and left the marauders nothing but a few tracts of devastated country, and their stronghold at Nanking. All this he effected, first, by the power of his arms, and afterward still more rapidly by the terror of his name. On the 11th of May, 1864, he had completely crushed the rebellion, and on December 9th of the same year, he was gazetted a C.B. (Companion of the Bath), in recognition of his distinguished services, having been previously made captain in 1859, major in 1862, and lieutenant-colonel on February 16th, 1864.

RISK AND PERIL.

His risks were many, and his peril great. One evening he was seated alone on the parapet of the bridge at Patachow, when two shots in succession struck the stone on which he sat. These shots, which were purely accidental, had come from his own camp, it not being known that he was there. On the second striking the seat, he thought it time to descend, and rowed across the creek to make inquiries as to what was going on. He had not been long on the water when that part of the bridge on which he had been seated gave way, and fell into the creek, nearly smashing his boat. The incident is illustrated in the second picture of the frontispiece.

In almost all engagements, Gordon found it necessary to be constantly in front, and often to lead in person. The officers of his force were brave men, but were not always ready to face their desperate antagonists. Gordon, in a quiet way, would take one or other of these by the arm, and lead him into the thick of the fire. He always went unarmed himself, even when foremost in the breach. He never recognized danger; to him a shower of bullets was no more than a hail-storm. He carried one weapon to direct his troops—a little cane, and this soon won for itself the name of "Gordon's magic wand of victory." His Chinese followers, seeing him always victorious, always foremost in the fight, concluded it was his wand that insured him protection.

SHOT IN THE LEG.

In March, 1864, Gordon was engaged in attacking Kintang, but the crews of his gunboats were so intimidated by the swarming masses of Taipings on the ramparts, that they were driven back. The artillery cleared the breach at once, and Gordon himself leading another storming party, was shot through the leg. One of his body-guard cried out that the commander was wounded; but Gordon silenced him, and stood calmly giving orders till he nearly fainted from loss of blood. Still he would not retire, and Andrew Moffit, Principal Medical Officer, came out and carried him by main strength into his boat. Even then Gordon struggled to get away. (See frontispiece.)

The Christmas of 1864, Gordon spent quietly with his family. He shrank from eulogium and congratulation, and only by his mother's fireside at Southampton would he refer to the thrilling incidents of the war, the singular encounters, disastrous chances, and moving accidents by flood and field, with which he had been familiar for more than fifteen months. He was content to rejoin his corps, and to resume his duty as a Royal Engineer.

PHILANTHROPIC WORK.

In 1865, he received the appointment of Commanding Royal Engineer at Gravesend, where he remained until 1871. Here he lived wholly for others. His house was school, and hospital, and almshouse in turn. The troubles of all interested him alike. The poor, the sick, the unfortunate were ever welcome, and never did suppliant knock vainly at his door. Many a gutter-boy was rescued by him. The workhouse and infirmary were his constant haunts, and many of the dying sent for him in preference to the clergy, and he was ever ready to visit them, to talk to them of Christ the Saviour, the Resurrection and the Life; but he would not be in any way prominent, though he was always willing to conduct Gospel services for the poor.

He remained for six years in seclusion, superintending the construction of the Thames defences and combining with his official duties labors of love and mercy among the poor. In workhouse, hospital, and slum he interested himself in the sorrows of his fellow-creatures, like a lion-hearted missionary. His house was a refuge for the unfortunate and a home and training-school for boys rescued from the gutter. Many of these urchins he clothed, fed and lodged, teaching them to read and write in the evenings and finding good berths for them on vessels. He corresponded with them when they were at sea, and followed their adventures by sticking pins into a large map of the world which hung over his mantelpiece; and on whatever sea they were sailing, he prayed for them every night. He taught classes in the ragged schools, and his scholars attested their love and admiration by chalking on the fences,

'GOD BLESS THE KERNEL."

He allowed poor families to add to their scanty means by raising vegetables in his garden. He dined on salt beef and made his supper of a pot of tea and a stale loaf; and what he could save from his income he gave to the poor. When flowers and fruits were left at his door he sent them to the nearest hospital.

In 1871 Gordon was appointed Commissioner to the European Commission of the Danube, and he proceeded to Galatz, in Turkey, and early in 1874 he took service with the Khedive, and succeeded Sir Samuel Baker as Governor of the Tribes in Upper Egypt, where he employed himself in settling stations along the Nile, and in the Soudan, penetrating as far as the Victoria Nyanza Lake in Central Africa. He was created and in February, 1877, the Khedive appointed him Governor of the whole of the Soudan. He was furthermore deputed to look into Abyssinian affairs, and empowered to enter into negotiations with King John with a view to the settlement of matters in dispute between Abyssinia and Egypt.

SINGULAR JOURNEY TO ABYSSINIA.

He pushed across the desert in an aureole of faith. His confidence in God was superb. The Cross's true soldier, he fights and conquers much as Columbus voyaged and Cromwell ruled. "Praying for the people ahead of me whom I am about to visit," he wrote, "gives me much strength; and it is wonderful how something seems already to have passed between us when I meet a chief (for whom I have prayed) for the first time. I have really no troops with me, but I have the Shekinah, and I do like trusting to Him and not to men. Remember, unless He gave me the confidence and encouraged me to trust Him, I could not have it; and so I consider that I have the earnest of success in this confidence."

In December, 1878, Gordon was taken prisoner by the Abyssinians. King John received his captive sitting on his throne, or whatever piece of furniture did duty for that exalted seat, a chair being placed for the prisoner considerably lower than the seat on which the king sat. The first thing Gordon did was to seize this chair, place it alongside that of his Majesty, and sit down on it; the next to inform him that he met him as an equal and would only treat with him as such. This somewhat disconcerted his sable Majesty, but on recovering himself he said, "Do you know, Gordon Pasha, that if I liked?" "I am perfectly well aware of it, your Majesty," said the Pasha. "Do so at once, if it is your royal pleasure. I am ready." This disconcerted the king still more, and he exclaimed, "What! ready to be killed!" "Certainly," replied the Pasha; "I am always ready to die, and so far from fearing your putting me to death, you would confer a favor on me by so doing, for you would be doing for me that which I am precluded by my religious scruples from doing for myself—you would relieve me from all the troubles and misfortunes which the future may have in store for me." This completely staggered King John, who gasped out in despair, "Then my power has no terrors for you?" "None whatever," was the Pasha's laconic reply. His Majesty instantly collapsed. (See frontispiece.)

Gordon returned to Egypt at the end of the year, and sent in his resignation to the Khedive. He longed for rest. He had had three years of desperate labor and almost unexampled difficulties. He sailed for England, bearing with him the memory of an enthusiastic crowd of friends who bade him farewell at Cairo. His name sends a thrill of love and admiration through the Soudan even yet. A hand so strong and beneficent had never before been laid on the people of that unhappy land.

IN PALESTINE.

He has since revisited China, and made an official tour in South Africa and Basutoland. Last year, 1883, he set out on a new pilgrimage to the East, and lived for some months just outside Jerusalem. Most of his time was devoted to research; and it was with an eagerness, that is almost a passion, that he pursued, Bible in hand, the survey of the Holy Sepulchre, the site of the Temple, and the walls of Jerusalem.

A few weeks ago the King of Belgium invited him to render assistance to Mr. H. M. Stanley on the Congo, and Gordon learning that his chief duty would be to intercept the gangs of slaves on their way to the sea, at once consented to undertake it. The British Government, however, represented to him that in the present condition of the Soudan he alone could have any hope of delivering it from the horrors of the False Prophet's sway. Gordon is a name loved and honored there, and he might gather about him a faithful and powerful force. Gordon, always ready in a cause in which the poor and helpless are to be defended, has therefore gone to the Soudan, promising that when his services there are no longer required, he will go to the Congo to suppress the slave trade.

The book from which the materials have been obtained for this brief sketch contains many other thrilling details of Gordon's life, and depicts a character singularly noble and unselfish. It contains a portrait of Gordon in the costume of a Mandarin and in the dress of a Pasha, also two maps of the scenes of his operations. It may be had elegantly bound from Mr. R. Worthington, 770 Broadway, N. Y. Price $4.50.

THE COLD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 27, 1884.

"Who can stand before his cold?"—PSA. 147 : 17.

The Severe Winter—The Challenge—Napoleon's Answer in the Moscow Retreat—Washington at Valley Forge—Admission of Arctic Explorers—Famous Winters—God's Healing Influences—The Best Picture of Martha Washington—Christ's Plan—Two Woodcuts—A Cold World—The Best Way of Warming it—A Great Heater—A Divine Patent—Christian Sympathy—Human Icebergs—A Noble English General—The Good Samaritan—An Engineer's Heroism—A Sailor's Self-Denial—Sisters of Charity in the War—Christ's Sympathy—The only Warming Institution—The World's Fireplace.

THIS whole land has recently been afflicted with depressed temperature. In Dakota, the thermometer forty degrees below zero. Window glass in Chicago cracked under the cold. A sea captain coming last night into port tells me that in Charleston, South Carolina, it has been colder than in one hundred and thirty years with one exception. Flocks of sheep, herds of cattle have perished on the mountains. One of the severest winters this land has ever experienced, these severities finding their echo in the text: "Who can stand before his cold?"

The psalmist lived in a more genial climate than this, and yet he must sometimes have been cut of the sharp weather. In this chapter he speaks of the snow like wool, the frost like ashes, the hailstones like morsels, and describes the congealment of lowest temperature. We have all studied the power of the heat. How few of us have studied the power of the frost. "Who can stand before his cold?"

THIS CHALLENGE

of the text has many times been accepted. October 19th, 1812, Napoleon's great army began its retreat from Moscow. One hundred and fifty thousand men, fifty thousand horses, six hundred pieces of cannon, forty thousand stragglers. It was bright weather when they started from Moscow, but soon something wrathier than the Cossacks swooped upon their flanks. An army of Arctic blast, with and hailstones for shot, and commanded by voice of tempest, marched after them. The flying artillery of the heavens in pursuit. The troops at nightfall would gather into circles and huddle themselves together for warmth; but when the day broke they rose not, for they were dead, and the ravens came for their morning meal of corpses. The way was strewn with the rich stuffs of the East brought as booty from the Russian capital. An invisible power seized one hundred thousand men and hurled them dead into the snowdrifts, and on the hard surfaces of the chill rivers, and into the maws of the dogs that had followed them from Moscow. That freezing horror which has appalled history was proof to all ages that it is a vain thing for any earthly power to accept the challenge of my text: "Who can stand before his cold?"

In the middle of December, 1777, at eleven thousand troops were with frosted ears and frosted hands and frosted feet, without shoes, without blankets, lying on the white pillow of the snow-bank. As during our late war, the cry was: "On to Richmond!" when the troops were not ready to march, so in the Revolutionary War there was a demand for wintry campaign until Washington lost his equilibrium, and wrote impatiently: "I assure these gentlemen it is easy enough seated by a good fireside and in comfortable home to draw out campaigns for the American army; but I tell them it is not so easy to lie on a bleak hill-side without blankets and without shoes." Oh, the frigid horrors that gathered around the American army in the winter of 1777! Valley Forge was one of the tragedies of the century. Benumbed, senseless, dead!

"Who can stand before his cold?" "Not we," say the frozen lips of Sir John Franklin and his men dying in Arctic exploration. "Not we," answer Schwatka and his crew falling back from the fortresses of ice which they had tried in vain to capture. "Not we," say the abandoned and crushed decks of the Intrepid, the Resistance and the Jeannette. "Not we," say the procession of Arctic martyrs this moment on their way home for American sepulchre, De Long and his men.

The highest pillars of the earth are pillars of ice. Mont Blanc, Yungfrau, the Matterhorn. The largest galleries of the world are galleries of ice. Some of the mighty rivers are at this moment lying in captivity of ice. The greatest sculptors of the ages are the glaciers, with arm and hand and chisel and hammer of ice. The and has a crown of glittering crystal, and is seated on a throne of ice, with footstool of ice and sceptre of ice. Who can tell the sufferings of the winter of 1433, when all the birds in Germany perished? or the winter of 1658 in England, when the stages rolled on the Thames, and temporary houses of merchandise were built on the ice? or the winter of 1821 in America, when New York Harbor was frozen over and heavy teams crossed on the ice to Staten Island? Then come down to our own winter, when there have been so many wrapping themselves in furs, or gathering themselves around fires, or threshing their arms about them to revive circulation—the millions of the temperate and the Arctic zones who are compelled to confess, "None of us can stand before his cold." One half of the industries of our day are employed in battling inclemency of the weather. The furs of the North, the cotton of the South, the flax of our own fields, the wool of our own flocks, the coal from our own mines, the wood from our own forests—all employed in battling these inclemencies, and still every January with blue lips and chattering teeth answers, "None of us can stand before his cold."

Now, this being such a cold world, God sends out influences to warm it. I am glad that is the God of the heat, that the God of the snow is the God of the white blossoms, that the God of January is the God of June. The question as to how we shall warm this world up is a question of immediate and all-encompassing practicability. In this zone and weather there are so many fireless hearths, so many broken window-panes, so many defective roofs that sift the snow. Coal and wood and flannels and thick coats are better for warming up such a place than tracts and Bibles and creeds. Kindle that fire where it has gone out. Wrap something around those shivering limbs. Shoe those bare feet. Hat that bare head. Coat that bare back. Sleeve that bare arm.

Nearly all the pictures of

represent her in courtly dress as bowed to by foreign ambassadors; but Mrs. Kirkland, in her interesting book, gives a more inspiring portrait of Martha Washington. She comes forth from her husband's hut in the encampment, the hut sixteen feet long by fourteen feet wide—she comes forth from that hut to nurse the sick, to sew the patched garments, to console the soldiers dying of the cold. That is a better picture of Martha Washington.

Hundreds of garments, hundreds of tons of coal, hundreds of glaziers at broken window sashes, hundreds of whole-souled men and women are necessary to warm this January weather.

WHAT ARE WE DOING

to alleviate the condition of those not so fortunate as we? Know ye not, my friends, there are hundreds and thousands of people who cannot stand before His cold? It is useless to preach to bare feet and to empty stomachs and to gaunt visage. Christ gave the world a lesson in common-sense when, before preaching the Gospel to the multitude in the wilderness, He gave them a good dinner. When I was a lad I remember seeing but they made more impression upon me than any pictures I have ever seen. They were on opposite pages. The one woodcut represented the coming on of the snow of winter, and a lad looked out the door of a great mansion, and he was all wrapped in furs, and his cheeks were ruddy, and with glowing countenance he shouted: "It snows, it snows!" On the next page there was a miserable tenement, and the door was open, and a child wan and sick and ragged and wretched was looking out, and he said: "O my God, it snows!" The winter of gladness or of grief according to our circumstances.

But, my friends, there is more than one way of warming up this cold world, for it is a cold world in more respects than one, and I am here this morning to consult with you as to

up the world. I want to have a great heater introduced into all your churches and all your homes and throughout the world. It is a heater of divine patent. It has many pipes with which to conduct heat, and it has a door into which to throw the fuel. Once get this heater introduced, and it will turn the Arctic zone into the temperate and the temperate into the tropics. It is the powerful heater, it is the glorious furnace of

CHRISTIAN SYMPATHY.

The question ought to be instead of, How much heat can we absorb? How much heat can we throw out? There are men that go through the world floating icebergs. They freeze everything with their forbidding look. The hand with which they shake yours is as cold as the paw of a polar bear. If they float into a religious meeting the temperature drops from eighty above to ten degrees below zero. There are icicles hanging from their eyebrows. They float into a religious meeting, and they chill everything with their jeremiads. Cold prayers, cold songs, cold greetings, cold sermons. Christianity on ice! The Church a great refrigerator! Christians gone into winter quarters! Hibernation! On the other hand, there are people who go through the world like the breath of a spring morning. Warm greetings, warm prayers, warm smiles, warm Christian influence. There are such persons. We bless God for them. We rejoice in their companionship.

AN ENGLISH GENERAL.

A general in the English army, the army having halted for the night, having lost his baggage, lay down tired and sick without any blanket. An officer came up and said: "Why, you have no blanket; I'll go and get you a blanket." He departed for a few moments, and then came back and covered the general up with a very warm blanket. The general said: "Whose blanket is this?" The officer replied: "I got that from a private soldier in the Scotch regiment, Ralph McDonald." "Now," said the general, "you take this blanket right back to that soldier. He can no more do without it than I can do without it. Never bring to me the blanket of a private soldier." How many men like that general would it take to warm the world up? The vast majority of us are anxious to get more blankets whether anybody else is blanketed or not.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

Look at the fellow-feeling displayed in the rocky defile between Jerusalem and Jericho in Scripture times. Here is a man who has been set upon by the bandits, and in the struggle to keep his property he has got wounded and mauled and stabbed, and he lies there half dead. A priest rides along. He sees him, and says: "Why, what's the matter with that man? why, he must be hurt, lying on the flat of his back. Isn't it strange that he should lie there? But I can't stop. I am on my way to temple services. Go along, you beast. Carry me up to my temple duties." After a while a Levite comes up. He looks over and says: "Why, that man must be very much hurt. Gashed on the forehead. What a pity! Stabbed under his arm. What a pity! Tut! tut! what a pity!

Why, they have taken his clothes nearly all away from him. But I haven't time to stop. I lead the choir up in the temple service. Go along, you beast. Carry me up to my temple duties."

After a while a Samaritan comes along, one who you might suppose through a national grudge might have rejected this poor wounded Jew. Coming along he sees this man and he says: "Why, that man must be terribly hurt. I see by his features he is a Jew, but he is a man and he is a brother. Whoa!" says the Samaritan, and he gets down off the beast and comes up by this wounded Jew, gets down on one knee, listens to see whether the unfortunate heart is still beating, makes up his mind there is some chance for resuscitation, goes to work at him, takes out of his sack a bottle of oil and a bottle of wine, cleanses the wound with some of the wine, then pours some of the restorative into the wounded man's lips, then takes some of the oil, and with it soothes the wound. After a while he takes off a part of his own garments for bandage, for the bandits have nearly stripped the man. Now, the sick and wounded man sits up pale and exhausted, but very thankfully. Now, the good Samaritan says: "You must get on my saddle, and I will walk." The Samaritan helps, and tenderly steadies this wounded Jew until he gets him on the beast.

They pass on toward the tavern, the wounded man holding on with the little strength he has left, ever and anon looking down at the good Samaritan and saying: "You are very kind; I had no right to expect this thing of a Samaritan, when I am a Jew; you are very kind to walk and let me ride." Now they have come up to the tavern. The Samaritan, with the help of the landlord, assists the sick and wounded man to dismount, and puts him to bed. The Bible says the Samaritan stayed all night. In the morning, I suppose, the Samaritan went in to look how his patient was and ask him how he had passed the night. Then he comes out—the Samaritan comes out and says to the landlord: "Here is money to pay that man's board, and if his convalescence is not as rapid as I hope for, charge the whole thing to me. Good-morning, all." He gets on the beast and says: "Go along, you beast, but go slowly, for those bandits sweeping through the land may have left somebody else wounded and half dead." Sympathy! Christian sympathy! How many such men as that would it take to warm the cold world up?

FAMINE IN ZAREPHATH.

Everything dried up. There is a widow with a son and no food except a handful of meal. She is gathering sticks to kindle a fire to cook the handful of meal. Then she is going to wrap her arms around her boy and die. Here comes Elijah. His two black servants, the ravens, have got tired of waiting on him. He asks that woman for food. Now, that handful of meal is to be divided into three parts. Before, it was to be divided into two parts. Now she says to Elijah: "Come in and sit down at this solemn table and take a third of the last morsel." How many women like that would it take to warm the cold world up?

Recently

AN ENGINEER IN THE SOUTH-WEST,

on a locomotive, saw a train coming with which he must collide. He resolved to stand at his post and slow up the train until the last minute, for there were passengers behind. The engineer said to the fireman: "Jump! one man is enough on this engine. Jump!" The fireman jumped and was saved. The crash came. The engineer died at his post. How many men like that engineer would it take to warm this cold world up?

A vessel struck on a rocky island. The passengers and the crew were without food, and a sailor had a shellfish under his coat. He was saving it for his last morsel. He heard a little child cry to her mother: "O mother, I am so hungry; give me something to eat, mother, I am so hungry." The sailor took the shellfish from under his coat and said: "Here, take that." How many men like that sailor would it take to warm the cold world up?

Xerxes fleeing from his enemy got on board a boat. A great many Persians leaped into the same boat, and the boat was sinking. Some one said: "Are you not willing to make a sacrifice for your king?" and the majority of those who were in the boat leaped overboard and drowned to save their king. How many men like that would it take to warm up this cold world?

Elizabeth Fry went into the horrors of Newgate Prison, and she turned the imprecation and the obscenity and the filth into prayer and repentance and a reformed life. The in 1863, on Northern and Southern battlefields, came to the boys in blue and gray while they were bleeding to death. The black bonnet with the sides pinned back and the white bandage on the brow may not have answered all the demands of elegant taste; but you could not persuade that soldier dying a thousand miles from home that it was anything but an angel that looked him in the face. Oh, with cheery look, with helpful word, with kind action try to make the world warm.

"Count that day lost whose low descending sun Views from thy hand no generous action done."

DIVINE SYMPATHY.

It was His strong sympathy that brought Christ from a warm heaven to a cold world. The land where He dwelt had serene sky, balsamic atmosphere, tropical luxuriance. No storm blasts in heaven. No chill fountains. On a cold December night Christ stepped out of that warm heaven into the world's frigidity. The thermometer in Palestine never drops below zero, but December is a cheerless month, and the pasturage is very poor on the hill-tops. Christ stepped out of a warm heaven into this cold world that cold December night. The world's reception was cold. The surf of bestormed Galilee was cold. Joseph's sepulchre was cold. Christ came, the great Warmer, to warm the earth, and all Christendom to-day feels the glow. He will keep on warming the earth until the tropic will drive away the Arctic and the Antarctic.

He gave an intimation of what He was going to do when He broke up the funeral at the gate of Nain and turned it into a reunion festival, and when with His warm lips He melted the Galilean hurricane and stood on the deck and stamped His foot, crying: "Silence!" and the waves crouched and the tempests folded their wings. Oh, it was this Christ who warmed the chilled disciples when they had no food by giving them plenty to eat, and who in the tomb of Lazarus shattered the shackles until the broken links of the chain of death rattled into the darkest crypt of the mausoleum. In His genial presence the girl who had fallen into the fire and the water is healed of the catalepsy, and the withered arm takes muscular, healthy action, and the ear that could not hear an avalanche catches a leaf's rustle, and the tongue that could not articulate trills a quatrain, and the blind eye was relumed, and Christ instead of staying three days and three nights in the sepulchre, as was supposed, as soon as the worldly curtain of observation was dropped began the exploration of all the underground passages of earth and sea wherever a Christian's grave may after a while be, and started a light of Christian hope, resurrection hope, which shall not go out until the last cerement is taken off and the last mausoleum breaks open.

Ah! I am so glad that the Sun of Righteousness has dawned on the polar night of the nations. And if Christ is the great warmer, then the Church is with its plants and trees and fruits of righteousness. Do you know, my friends, that the Church is the only institution that proposes warmth? I have been for twenty-seven years studying how to make the Church warmer. Warmer architecture, warmer hymnology, warmer Christian salutation. All outside Siberian winter, we must have it a prince's hothouse. The only institution on earth to-day that proposes to make the world warmer. Universities and observatories, they all have their work. They propose to make the world light, but they do not propose to make the world warm. Geology informs us, but it is as cold as the rock it hammers. The telescope shows where the other worlds are, but an astronomer is chilled while looking through it. Chemistry tells us of strange combinations and how inferior affinity may be overcome by superior affinity; but it cannot tell how all things work together for good. Worldly philosophy has a great splendor, but it is the splendor of moonlight on an iceberg. The Church of God proposes warmth and hope—warmth for the expectations, warmth for the sympathies.

Oh, I am so glad these great altar fires have been kindled. Come in out of the cold. Come in and have your wounds salved. Come in and have your sorrows solaced. Come in and have your sins pardoned. Come in by

THE GREAT GOSPEL FIREPLACE.

Notwithstanding all the modern inventions for heating, I tell you there is nothing so full of geniality and sociality as the old-fashioned country fireplace. The neighbors were to come in for a winter evening of sociality. In the middle of the afternoon, in the best room of the house, some one brought in a great back-log with great strain, and put it down on the back of the hearth. Then the lighter wood was put on armful after armful. Then a shovel of coals was taken from another room and put under the dry pile, and the kindling began, and the crackling, and it rose until it became a roaring flame which filled all the room with geniality and was reflected from the family pictures on the wall. Then the neighbors came in two by two. They sat down, their faces to the fire, which ever and anon was stirred with tongs and readjusted on the andirons, and there were such times of rustic repartee and story telling and mirth as the black stove and the blind register never dreamed of. And then the best luxury of orchard and farmyard was roasted and prepared for the table to meet the appetites sharpened by the cold ride. O my friends, the Church of Jesus Christ is the world's fireplace, and the woods are from the cedars of Lebanon, and the fires are fires of love, and with the silver tongs of the altar we stir the flame and the light is reflected from all the family pictures on the wall—pictures of those who were once here and are gone now.

OH, COME UP CLOSE to the fireplace. Have your worn faces transfigured in the light. Put your cold feet, weary of the journey, close up to the blessed conflagration. Chilled through with trouble and disappointment, come close up until you can get warm clear through. Exchange experiences, talk over the harvests gathered, tell all the Gospel news. Meanwhile the table is being spread. On it bread of life. On it grapes of Eshcol. On it new wine from the kingdom. On it a thousand luxuries celestial. Hark! as a wounded hand raps on the table and a tender voice comes through saying: "Come, for all things are now ready. Eat, O friends, drink, yea drink abundantly, O beloved."

My friends, that is the way the cold world is going to be warmed up by the great Gospel fireplace. All nations will come in and sit down at that banquet. While I was musing the fire burned: "Come in out of the cold, come in out of the cold!"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Rapid Change.—The Rev. Dr. Macdonald said at a recent meeting: "A man called at my house in the very deepest distress of mind; indeed, I have seldom seen one more cast down. He was in the deepest sorrow. I had so little time to spare that I didn't know whether I could stay with him then. I went in, however, with him, and having listened to his statement, I presented the Gospel to him in as simple a way as I could, and urged his immediate acceptance. I never saw anything more rapid. He seemed at once to lay hold of the truth. Then I prayed, and I asked him to pray, and anything more touching than his prayer I have never listened to, with such a full understanding of the truth. He repeated, 'Just as I am,' over and over again; 'without one plea, O Lord,' and he then said, 'I have full confidence in Thee, O Saviour.'"

A Saved Infidel's Testimony.—A Member of the Cowcaddens choir testified: "Twelve years ago, in the foolish pride of what was thought to be intellectual power, I said, not only in my heart, but with my mouth, 'There is no God.' For ten years I continued revelling in iniquity, and showed open contempt for those who feared God. I actually believed them to be either fools or hypocrites. Two years ago I was led to think over again and again of the lessons I learned in my young days, and became much troubled about my sins. Though I had gone so far astray, the Lord had pity upon me—oh, what a wonderfully loving and forgiving God He is!—and He led me from darkness into light, saving me from atheism, drunkenness and all other sins. From the day that my heart was changed till the present moment, the desire for drink has never returned. I now rejoice in Christ as my Saviour, Healer, and Friend, and delight to tell to others how precious He has become to my soul. 'Is not this a brand plucked from the burning?'"

A Colored Man's Prayer.—Mr. Garland, the sailors' missionary, relates the following: "A colored seaman came to my class one Sunday in great distress of mind, and said, 'Me been to dis place on de Lord's Day four times, and de minister made me feel bad all ober. My fader and moder did love Massa Jesus, till He take um up to glory; and my moder made me say, when she was sick, Me will be good ebery day. But me no good at all; never so sick as now. One day de minister's sermon came into my soul, and me felt, Lost! lost! poor Joseph go to hell. Next day no better; all de week was bad. Me come now to sign temperance book.' When he had signed the pledge, the poor fellow knelt down and said, 'O Massa Jesus, you see me make dat mark (+) in the book. Dear Massa Jesus, help poor Joseph to keep upright; make me no more drink. When me drink, me swear, tell lies, do oder sins, and make me like de debil. My skin all black, but, O Massa Jesus, my soul more black. De minister say all sinners go to hell; Joseph no want to go into de fire. Help me, Massa Jesus, from dis day to find mercy, dat when me die, me go up to glory. De old serpent wants me, but me no want him. Blessed Spirit, wash and fill poor Joseph's soul wid de great light, for Jesus's sake. Amen.'"

Soldiers Won from Satan's Camp.—Mr. Mathers, a soldiers' missionary, reported: "Recently a soldier told me, 'It is impossible to be a soldier and a Christian,' yet in the ten days he was in the kingdom, he learned that it was quite possible to be a soldier for Christ and the Queen. Another soldier said to me, 'I used to think that I was good for nothing but playing cards, but I have found that God has nobler work for me to do. Praise the Lord!' One day, I overtook a soldier on the road. Putting my arm in his, I inquired, 'Anderson, have you any Christian friends?' 'Yes, in the east end of Glasgow.' 'Ask them to pray for you, and I will pray for you as well, and we will soon have you in the kingdom.' 'Thank you, I'll ask them.' Every time I met him, I asked, 'Are your friends praying for you?' 'Yes.' 'So am I.' The result is that he is now a soldier of the cross; his last words to me, before he left me, were, 'I will be out and out for Christ.' On Saturday last we had an open-air meeting. A man under the influence of drink tried to disturb us, but a worker took him in hand and got him calmed down, and persuaded him to enter the hall. In the course of the meeting, which was only for praise and prayer, the man stood up and publicly confessed that he was a backslider, and asked our prayers on his behalf. Last night he returned to the hall, perfectly sober, and gave himself anew to Christ. This one soul rescued from the toils of Satan is a good reward for a whole winter's open-air work."

A Scotchwoman's Portrait.—The Rev. A. D. Robertson related: "Some time ago I visited an old woman in Leith Walk who was dying of cancer, and when I met with her she was very impatient and querulous with pain, and everybody about her was getting wearied of her. I said, 'My good woman, if you were to die to-night, do you think you would go to heaven?' She said, 'I hope so.' I said 'What makes you hope so?' She replied, 'Ye ken I've been a member of the kirk for these fifty years.' She was seventy-three. I said, 'Is that your only hope?' and she said 'Yes.' I said, 'That is not my hope,' and then I quoted to her the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the ground of our assurance of being saved with Him in glory. She said, 'I dinna see that.' I said, 'Did you ever see your portrait in the Bible?' She said, 'No; the Bible could not be written about me.' I said, 'Yes, turn with me, you will find your portrait there.' I got her old Bible and turned it over and put her finger upon it, and said, 'Do you see it? "All we like sheep have gone astray;" that's you and me; "we have turned every one to our own way;" that's you and me; that's our picture, is it not?' She said, 'Ah, that's really God's truth.' 'Look,' I went on, 'it isn't finished yet. "And the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquities of us all." Why are you afraid of not getting to heaven? Is it your sins? They were laid on the Lord Jesus.' She said, 'Just wait a moment;' she rested, and then she said, 'I see it, I see it!' She lived for a week, and then died rejoicing in Christ."

A Beer-Seller as a Church Member.—The Rev. Mr. Pirrett said: "Some years ago I preached a temperance sermon in Scotland. Shortly afterward a rum-seller brought me his certificate of church membership from another minister, and wished to join my church. I remarked to him, 'Well, I will tell you my views of your trade, so that you may not be pained by anything I may say afterward from the pulpit.' 'Oh, I know your views; I heard that sermon of yours; I do not like the trade, but I am driven into it.' I had no other course open to me but to admit the man into the church. Though he professed to dislike the trade at first, by and by he made it pay, and he openly confessed his preference for it over any other business, and opened other shops in different districts. His family of a wife and nine children filled an entire pew in the front gallery, and he looked a prosperous, well-doing man. I preached another sermon on 'Temptation,' and noticed that the publican was very uneasy, and I was told that he had his hat in hand to leave the church during the sermon. Next day he sent word that he wished to see me. When I called, he said, 'I intend to leave your church, but before going I wish to give my reasons, and they are: You can't believe me to be a Christian, you can't pray for my family and myself; the money I give to the church must defile the treasury.' I answered, 'You are certainly in a business in which a Christian should not be.' 'Am I not placed by God in my present position?' he inquired. 'No, no, you have gone into it yourself. You bought the business and you told me that you could sell it, therefore it is your own act which places you in it, not the act of God. It is needless to say that he left my church. So long as Christian opinion is in its present state we cannot refuse to admit grog-sellers to church membership, because the buyers and drinkers of strong drink are as bad as the seller; but when real Christians refuse to buy or drink alcoholic beverages, then we can reject the dealer in them; therefore, the responsibility lies not upon ministers alone, but upon the members of churches. Ministers, can, however, speak out plainly on the subject."

THE SECOND ADVENT.

By the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Cavan.

Its Near Approach—Simeon's Example—Three Duties Incumbent on the Waiting Christian—The Typical Representation Peter Witnessed—Three Leading Events to Characterize the Last Days—I. The Restored Nationality of the Jews—II. The Appearance of Antichrist—A Man not a System—His Certain Destruction—The Speaking Image—Heir of Satan—III. The Appearance of Christ—Two Stages of It—Three Vivid Contrasts—Two Women—Two Suppers—Two Armies.

THE subject of our Lord's Second Advent is one that has been too much overlooked, but now in these latter days, those who have closely studied the Word of Christ, and are looking forward to His glorious appearing, cannot but rejoice to give the more earnest heed to it, because it is evidently indicated to be

FAST APPROACHING.

Just as on the occasion of the First Coming of our Lord, there were some, of whom mention is made in Holy Scripture, who were looking for and expecting that First Coming, so in like manner, how much more essential and important is it for us who are living in the Last Days, to be anxiously looking for and expecting a speedy return of our Blessed Lord when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and admired in all them that believe on Him. We read in the second chapter of Luke about Simeon, who, it is said, was "just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel, and the Holy Ghost was upon him." We find still further in that chapter that "Anna, coming in that instant, gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spoke of Him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem."

Now I believe that the Lord's people at the present day ought to be in a similar expectant and looking for the speedy pre-millennial Advent of our Blessed Lord. And I hold it to be clearly shown in Scripture that the personal return of Christ, as foretold in Acts 1 : 11, will take place before the millennium of a thousand years, and that He will reign during that period with the saints of the First Resurrection over the converted nations of the earth.

Our Lord Himself opened up the subject of the prophetic events which will accompany His Second Advent, in the thirteenth chapter of Mark, when His disciples asked Him, "What shall be the Sign when all these things shall be fulfilled," or, as St. Matthew expresses it, "What shall be the Sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the age." That prophetic discourse concludes with most admonitory words, "Take ye heed: watch and pray; for the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work; and commanded the porter to watch: watch ye therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh; at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning; lest, coming suddenly, He find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch."

Here are mentioned

THREE DUTIES INCUMBENT

upon every Christian—to be watching, to be praying, and to be working: each individual has his appointed work. Our Master has given to each of us one or more talents, and He has said, "Occupy till I come." We are to be diligently occupying until He returns. We cannot but fear that, at the present day, there is a tendency to spiritual torpor. Even the very activity and bustle of the world around us tend to lead us away from a close walk with God, and from steady, prayerful working in His service. It is needful for us to keep in mind the apostle's exhortation in Ephesians, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." While our Lord has gone away to receive for Himself a kingdom and to return, let us, who are children of the light, and children of the day, be stirred up to greater diligence in His service, and "not sleep as do others, but watch and be sober."

The Apostle Peter, as well as St. Paul, refers fully to this subject. In his Second Epistle he speaks of the scene of the transfiguration, which he had witnessed, as of the future Coming of Christ in His kingdom of glory; and he adds, "We have also a more sure word of Prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye may take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts."

Most animating is this prospect which lies before us, "of the power and Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ" to raise from their graves the bodies of the deceased saints, and to transfigure and translate His waiting people, who shall then be living on the earth, to meet Him in the heavens and to gather them all together into His presence in one united and glorified company. As to whether all, or only some of the saints who shall be found living on the earth at that time, namely, the unwatchful ones, will have to pass through the great tribulation of three and a half years, is a point regarding which we must exercise our judgment upon those passages of Scripture which relate to it. But the speedy Personal and Pre-millennial Advent of Christ, is in itself a grand leading fact, upon which we are all agreed. We do well in the present day not to be turned aside from searching into and giving heed to the sure word of prophecy by any opposition, from whatever quarter it may arise.

We must bear in mind how great contradiction of sinners Christ endured against Himself. Not the railing or deriding of the highest ecclesiastics or chief priests, or of those who tauntingly exclaimed, "Have any of the rulers believed on him?"—not the mocking of the soldiers, nor the gibes of the mob, could divert Him from the purpose upon which His heart was set, namely, the accomplishing of the redemption of His people by His death upon the Cross; and if we have our eyes fixed upon Him as our Great Exemplar and our Glorified Head, we shall be upheld and strengthened in running with patience the race that is set before us, and enabled "to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Titus 2 : 12–14).

Let us endeavor to keep prominently in our mind which are to characterize the Last Days of this Dispensation: first, the Restoration of the Jews; secondly, the manifestation of a Personal Antichrist; and thirdly, the Lord's Personal Advent in glory.

THREE LEADING EVENTS

I. First, as regards the national Restoration of the Jews, we have this fully predicted in the last chapter of Zechariah, as well as in the four previous chapters, and also in the 38th and 39th chapters of Ezekiel, and in the 11th of Romans. It appears that a restoration of some of the Jews to Palestine in an unconverted state will take place about seven years before the end of this Dispensation, as foretold in the concluding verse of the 9th chapter of Daniel—"He shall confirm a covenant with many for one week or hebdomad [a week of seven years], and in the midst of the week, he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until that determined shall be poured upon the desolator" (Daniel 9 : 27).

It thus seems that a "Prince that shall come," spoken of in the previous verse, will promote their return to Palestine, by making a seven years' covenant with many of them, but in the midst of the seven years will put a stop to their renewed sacrifices, and temple-worship, and will cause his image, the abomination of desolation, to be set up in their rebuilt temple during the remaining three and a half years. This is referred to by our Lord in Matthew 24 : 15.

II. And this brings before us, in the second place, the manifestation and career of this who, after appearing as the friend of the Jews, and promoting their restoration, will, during the latter half of the week of years, mentioned by Daniel, become the great persecutor both of them and of Christians. This final period of three and a half years, during which the great tribulation and persecution by the Personal Antichrist is to prevail with such unequalled violence and severity, is clearly predicted in Daniel and Revelation as 1260 days, or 42 months, or a time, times, and half-time. I understand these expressions beyond all doubt to signify literally three years and a half. And although the Pope and Popery have been a dreadful Antichrist, yet there will still arise this Last Personal Antichrist, as distinctly foretold in St. John's first epistle, "He is an Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son" (2 : 22). Instead of being a professing Christian like the Pope, he will be an avowed infidel, utterly denying all the doctrines of the Christian religion.

AN INDIVIDUAL MAN,

He is further described, in the second chapter of II Thessalonians, as the Man of Sin who shall sit, as God, in the Temple of God at Jerusalem, showing himself that he is God, and whom the Lord shall at last destroy with the brightness of His personal Coming. His career is particularly set forth in the 13th and 17th chapters of Revelation, where it is stated that he is to be Head over the ten kingdoms of the Roman Empire, which are to give their power and strength to him, and is to have "authority given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations;" and is to make war with the saints for forty-two months, or three and a half years, and is to overcome them, and all that dwell upon the earth, except the elect, are to worship him; and all the world is to wonder after him, and exclaim, "Who is like unto him? who is able to make war with him?"

THE SPEAKING IMAGE.

I fully believe that nothing has ever yet happened at all approaching to the fulfilment of this description; the power of the Pope and Popery has by no means ever yet approximated to the degree of power here depicted. In fact, the Pope has never claimed or received divine worship as God from any one at all, and far less from all that dwell upon the earth except the elect (Rev. 13 : 8). Moreover, the nature of this persecution for three and a half years is further particularized. The Man of Sin is to have an image of himself fabricated by human hands; and by Satanic power this naturally lifeless image is to have life given to it so that it shall speak; and as many as refuse to worship it, or to receive the mark of this Man of Sin in their foreheads or right hands, are to be killed (Rev. 13 : 15–18).

Let us carefully bear in mind that it is by the energy and power of that great and mysterious Being, Satan, that the Antichrist will be enabled to accomplish his miraculous and unparalleled career of evil. The tremendous power of Satan which is incessantly at work, has been too much overlooked by Christian people, but events are approaching which will demand for it much deeper attention. The apostle warns us that we wrestle not merely against foes of flesh and blood, but against wicked spirits in the regions of the air. (See Ephesians 6 : 12.) Satan is the Prince of the power of the air as well as the God of this world.

SATAN INCARNATE.

We find, however, in the 12th chapter of Revelation, that he is to be dislodged and cast down, with all his evil angels, from the air upon this earth previously to the great tribulation of three and a half years; and is then to enter into and energize the Personal Antichrist, and is to give to him "his power and his throne, and great authority," and thus to raise him up as the prime agent by whom to conduct the final struggle against Christ and His people (Rev. 13 : 2). Most solemn is the voice from heaven uttered in reference to that period, "Woe to the inhabiters of the earth and of the sea, for the Devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Rev. 12 : 12).

TWO STAGES OF THE ADVENT.

III. In reference to the third leading event which we should keep in view, namely, the personal Second Advent of Christ in glory, it is generally agreed that it will take place in two stages or acts. The earlier stage is when He descends into the air, and when the bodies of the dead in Christ shall be raised to life and be caught up, together with those living Christians who love His appearing, and look for His coming, and are ready for it, to meet Him in the air; this occurrence precedes the final three and a half years which is the term of Antichrist's career (I Thess. 4 : 16, 17; Matt. 25 : 10).

The later and concluding stage of our Lord's Advent will consist in His descent from the air upon the very surface of the Mount of Olives, as predicted in Zechariah 14 : 1, 2, when Antichrist and his hosts will be totally overthrown at the final conflict. This is also set forth in the 19th chapter of Revelation, where we have the two women, the Bride, the Lamb's wife glorified, and the Scarlet Woman, harlot Babylon, at the same time consumed with fire; the two suppers, the joyous Marriage Supper of the Lamb (which may God grant every one of us may be admitted to sit down at), and the dismal Supper of vengeance, to which the birds of prey are invited to feast upon the flesh of Antichrist's hosts; and the

the army of the Lamb, composed of His Saints clothed in fine linen and mounted upon white horses, and the army of Antichrist, consisting of the kings of the earth and their armies under his leadership, gathered together to Armageddon to war against the Lamb and against His army; but the imperial Antichrist and his ecclesiastical minister, the false prophet, will be cast alive into the lake of fire, and their vast military hosts slain with the sword of the King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Then Satan will be bound in the bottomless pit for a thousand years, and the surviving inhabitants of the earth that are spared, will become converted to true Christianity, and, together with their posterity, will constitute the subjects of the millennial kingdom of Christ and His glorified Saints of the First Resurrection, who will reign over them from heaven during the thousand years. At the close of this period Satan, being loosed from the bottomless pit, will produce a general apostasy of mankind, but is once more captured and consigned to the lake of fire. Then is to follow the creation of a new heaven and a new earth, and the entire disappearance of the sea, in conjunction with the general judgment of the wicked at the Tribunal of the great White Throne. (See Revelation 20 and 21 : 1.) Well may we exclaim, in looking forward to these impressive and solemn scenes, "Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are His judgments and His ways past finding out!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Presidential Succession was again under the consideration of Congress last week. Senator Hoar reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary his bill to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of both President and Vice-President, and it was read three times in the Senate and passed. The bill provides that in such case the office shall devolve upon that member of the Cabinet highest in rank, beginning with the Secretary of State, provided that such official is eligible to the office under the Constitution, and that the person thus selected shall hold the office until the disability of the President or Vice-President shall be removed or a President shall be elected. It provides also for the convening of Congress within twenty days after such office has devolved on such person.

A Significant Resolution, Intended to Check a rapidly growing abuse, was introduced in the House on January 21st. Mr. Anderson, of Kansas, was the mover, and his resolution requires ex-members of Congress, before being entitled to the privileges of the floor, to obtain an order from the Speaker, which order shall only be issued upon the ex-member declaring upon his honor that he is not interested, directly or indirectly, in any corporation or person having a pecuniary interest in the defeat or passage of a measure before Congress or the committees, and pledging that, while the House is in session he will not communicate with any member respecting any claim which may affect the welfare of any company, corporation, or person having an interest in legislation. In case of the violation of this pledge the Committee on Rules shall declare the ex-member forever deprived of privileges of the floor. While no correspondents are admitted to the floor of the House, the chamber at times swarms with ex-members, some of whom have not been in Congress for many years. This may do something toward checking the influence of the Lobby, but more radical measures are needed.

The Repeal of the Law Requiring "the Administration of the iron-clad oath" was agreed to in the House on January 21st by a vote of 385 to 11. It was proposed by Mr. S. S. Cox of New York. The person taking this oath solemnly swore that he had never voluntarily borne arms against the United States Government, nor given aid or encouragement to those who had done so; that he had held no office under a government hostile to the United States, and that he never would. The oath was a relic of the agitation aroused just after the war, and its repeal was felt to be a necessity of the happier relations now existing. It was practically worthless to effect the purpose contemplated, as any man who was not rendered ineligible to office under the fourteenth amendment, and yet who, on account of service in the Coufederate Army or government, could not take this oath, was permitted to take a much milder one.

The Greely Expedition Appropriation has passed the House. During its consideration in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Randall stated that the Appropriations Committee had thought it best to leave the details of the expedition to the President, and to place no limitation on the amount appropriated. The Senate passed the joint resolution with an amendment, offered by Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, that those who take part in it shall be volunteers. He was opposed to men going on such a dreadful voyage on compulsion, and opposed to giving the President the power to compel any man to go. Several amendments to limit the amount of the appropriation were rejected. The House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Ex-Speaker Keifer's Stenographic Scandal, now being investigated by a committee of the House, loses none of its disgraceful features by the inquiry. It proves that at the close of the session, and when there was little or no work to be done, Mr. Keifer demanded the resignation of one of the stenographers who had worked during the session and was, consequently, entitled to his pay during the recess, and appointed his own nephew to the position. This nephew, Mr. Gaines, when before the committee, testified that he was a confidential clerk to the ex-Speaker at the beginning of the Forty-seventh Congress. About the middle of the first session he remarked to Mr. Keifer that the positions occupied by Messrs. Dawson and Tyson, the stenographers, were very desirable places, and if "things could be brought about" he would like to have one of them. Mr. Gaines said there was a tacit understanding between himself and his uncle that he should have one of the positions. "At about the close of the last session," he continued, "Dawson and Tyson made a proposition that they would each give me $100 a month if I would allow them to retain their positions. I refused, and a few days later told my uncle of the offer." Mr. Keifer advised him to have nothing to do with the proposition.

A Fire-Damp Catastrophe Occurred in Colorado at Crested Butte, near Gunnison, on January 24th. The day force of sixty-seven men had just descended to their work in the pit, and some of the night force was still there, when a terrific explosion was heard. Eleven of the men were hurled back badly shaken, but otherwise not much injured. Five others were thrown upward by the force of the explosion and were brought to the surface, but they are believed to be fatally hurt. The others, fifty-nine in number, were buried under tons of coal earth, and timber. The pit was known as a dangerous pit, owing to the quantity of gases generated there, but the company states that it was well ventilated. Fifty-seven bodies have already been exhumed. Many have arms and legs broken, skulls crushed in and clothing so burned in many cases that it drops off in rags when the body is moved. The hair, too, is burned from their heads. The skin is burned off the faces and other exposed portions of the bodies, leaving an unrecognizable mass of raw and bleeding flesh. The appearance of these bodies is horrible beyond description, and it is not likely any of them can be recognized. Many of the faces have coal dust ground into them until they are as black as coal itself. Twenty-one were married men, most of whom leave orphan children. The cause of the disaster is believed to have been a disobedience of orders by one of the miners. The mine carpenter had discovered that there was gas in the chamber when the explosion occurred and just before the day shift went to work, and ordered the men not to go into it. Then he left the mine. He had barely reached the opening when the explosion occurred. It is believed that one or more of the men must have ventured into the mine with lights.

The Acquittal of Young Nutt, Charged with the murder of his father's murderer, was, as we said at the time the murder was committed, an issue every one expected. Last week he was tried at Pittsburg, Pa., and acquitted. The general chorus of approval that has followed the verdict is a grave matter. For the murdered man there is no public sympathy; he probably deserved to die, and his own crimes rendered his death by violence a fitting retribution. But the influence of young Nutt's acquittal on society will be wholly evil. It will encourage the belief, already far too prevalent, that there are circumstances beside self-defence which justify murder. It will encourage irresponsible persons who may be dissatisfied with judicial decisions to rectify them with the pistol. It will also incite men who are foully wronged to redress their own grievances, instead of appealing to the law. Apart from the religious aspect of the affair, the moral and patriotic aspect is alarming. In all the States East, West, and South, there is today a far lower view of the sanctity of human life and far greater indulgence for men who use the pistol than there was a quarter of a century ago. Is the country progressing in the direction of lawlessness?

The Prohibitionists of Ohio are Organizing a movement to keep intact the large vote polled for the amendment last fall. It is called "the Voters' Union," and will have State, county, and township branches. The purpose is to organize and make effective the recent vote and to hold that vote in such shape that it can have force and direction without the raising of political lines, or the creation of a third party. It has been decided to hold a State Convention in June, but in order that the movement might be kept going and all arrangements made, provisional officers were chosen. The declaration of principles is as follows: "We, the undersigned, voters of all political parties, unite our efforts for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage." The union also declares that it is "in fellowship with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Sons of Temperance, Good Templars, and other temperance organizations, and welcomes their co-operation." It is proposed to organize subordinate branches where possible. The union will endeavor to secure a re-submission of the prohibitory amendment in 1885.

The Packages from England Containing copies of Thy Healer, The Prophetic News, etc., about which subscribers are writing to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have not arrived. There is reason to believe that they were in the mails which left Queenstown on January 3d by the Germanic. That vessel broke her shaft during the voyage to New York, and returned to Liverpool under sail. She arrived there on January 26th. It is expected that her mails would be sent by the Gallia, which left Liverpool on that day. In that case they may be expected on February 4th. The magazines will be despatched to subscribers as soon as they arrive.

The Rev. E. W. Oakes, whose Pastoral Work at Puebla, Col., was recently mentioned in these columns, is seeking assistance for the completion of his church. It is centrally located, and has a large sphere of operations among a class of people whom it is specially desirable to reach. The building is large and substantial, and is well filled with a congregation among which there is a large proportion of those who are regarded as non-churchgoers. The church members have raised $8000 by considerable effort and self-sacrifice. There is still needed to complete the work the sum of $4000, and Mr. Oakes has returned to the East in the hope that his friends here will assist him in his effort to obtain that amount. He expects to remain about three weeks at the house of his father-in-law, Dr. Burns, 424 West Forty-third Street, New York City, where subscriptions will be gratefully received. A portrait of Mr. Oakes and a sketch of his eventful life will appear in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Hon. David Sankey, the Father of Mr. Ira D. Sankey, is dead. He died at his home at Newcastle, Pa., on January 5th. He was in his seventy-fifth year. He was the youngest son of Major Ezekiel Sankey, one of the earliest pioneers of Western Pennsylvania, and was born in what is now Lawrence County, January 10th, 1809. On September 2d, 1830, Mr. Sankey married Miss Mary Leeper, and the union was blessed with the birth of seven sons and four daughters. He filled various offices of trust, and was elected to the State Senate. In 1867 Mr. Sankey purchased the Lawrence Journal, which he conducted as an independent newspaper until 1874. Mr. Sankey was for more than half a century an earnest, active Christian, and a strong advocate of temperance. Though he never had a collegiate education, he filled the many places of trust to which he was chosen with ability and credit to himself and justice to his constituents.

Frederick Douglass, the Colored Leader, was married in Washington on January 24th to Miss Helen M. Pitts, a white woman, formerly of Avon, N. Y. Mr. Douglass has been a widower about two years, his first wife having been a colored woman. Miss Pitts is forty-six years of age, and was employed as a copyist in Mr. Douglass's office. She is well known as a writer on woman suffrage and moral reform, being for a time the assistant editor of the Alpha, a paper published in those interests. His marriage is quite a surprise, as he is sixty-seven years of age, and he has, it is said, openly denounced miscegenation as detrimental to the welfare of the colored race.

The Testimony of a Politician to the Value of character is reported. It is related that on his death-bed the late Congressman Haskell, of Kansas, who died on December 16th, 1883, said to the clerk of his committee, his personal friend: "Ed, it pays to be clean. Next to my God, my wife, and my children, I value my good name. Personally I do not care to live; but I would like to live for my family. I have nothing to leave them but my good name. I'm proud of that name. My record is clean, and my children can look back upon it with pride. Ed, I'd rather have the good name than all the world." This is striking testimony to the truth of the scriptural maxim (Prov. 22 : 1).

The Garfield Memorial Church in Washington was dedicated on January 20th. The church is intended to be the central place of worship of the Disciples in the United States. In November, 1880, the work of raising funds was begun, and subscriptions were received from various parts of the United States, and even from Canada and England, the collection being carried on under the auspices of the General Missionary Board. In May, 1882, ground for the new building was broken, and the corner-stone was laid on the first anniversary of the shooting of President Garfield. At the opening of the church there was a very large attendance, not only of members of the congregation, but of members of the Christian Church from several States, members of Congress, who had been Mr. Garfield's colleagues, clergymen of other denominations, and prominent people of the city, including President Arthur and Secretary Frelinghuysen. The services consisted of an invocation, reading of the Scriptures, prayer of dedication, a dedicatory sermon by President Pendleton, of Bethany College, West Virginia; a historical address by the Hon. R. M. Bishop, ex-Governor of Ohio; the formal delivery of the church by the Building Committee, and its acceptance on behalf of the congregation by the Pastor, the Rev. Frederick D. Power.

Governor Sherman, of Iowa, Earnestly Recommends the Legislature to re-submit the prohibition amendment to the popular vote. In the course of his message he said: "The proposition to amend the fundamental law by a prohibition of the sale of intoxicants as a beverage, having passed the several stages of legislation prerequisite, was at last submitted to the citizens of the State and by them adopted by a decisive vote. Notwithstanding the people had so expressed their pleasure therein, and under our theories of government the court of the sovereign people is that of last and highest resort, and their decision had been evidenced through the proper constitutional department of the government, the amendment so adopted was attempted to be nullified by a co-ordinate branch. Various opinions prevail as to such attempt and its binding force and effect; but one only can obtain as to the moral obligation resting upon the representatives of the people in general assembly in such an emergency. The duty remains to the law-making power, that the principle thus adopted by the people must be voiced in proper statutory enactments; and I confidently trust that ere your session shall end, the legal remedies will be provided whereby the people may protect themselves from further devastations caused by this unlawful traffic, destructive alike to present and future generations."

A Rush through Burning Oil was taken by a train near Bradford, Pa., on January 15th. An oil tank on a hill-side near the railroad, began leaking early in the morning, and the oil flooded the track to the foot of the hill, a distance of about a hundred yards. The first train that came along dashed into it, and as the brakes when covered with oil would not hold, the train went down the hill at a terrific speed. The vapor of the oil caught fire at the engine firebox, and almost in an instant the train was enveloped in flame. The engineer kept to his post in spite of the intense heat, until the train jumped the track, when it was consumed. Three passengers were burned to death, and others severely injured. The brakes, unhappily, became powerless at the moment when they were most needed. This has been the experience of many on the down-grade of a sinful life. They have encouraged themselves with the vain hope that they could stop whenever they resolved to do so (Jer. 18 : 11, 12).

A Convict Appeared as Plaintiff in a Suit for damages against a railroad in Georgia recently. He was formerly in the employ of the Western and Atlanta Railway as watchman in Atlanta. One dark night he went up on top of a train while it was in motion to throw off a brake. While he was standing at the brake the projecting shed of a station knocked him senseless to the ground, fracturing his skull. Suit was brought against the railroad for damages at $25,000, and on the first trial a jury gave a verdict for $15,000 in his favor. After the accident, but before his suit against the railroad was tried, he quarrelled with a man, and shot him dead. For that crime he was arraigned and condemned to death. The jury who pronounced his claim against the railroad company valid could not deliver him from punishment for his crime. Divine mercy is not so limited. To the penitent, believing sinner it gives pardon for his sins as well as grace to enable him to lead a new life (Rev. 1 : 5, 6).

"HE SHALL BE GREAT."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.*

"He shall be great."—LUKE 1 : 32.

Christ Great in His Manhood—Stooped very Low—I. Great from many Points of View—In the Perfection of His Nature—In the Grandeur of His Offices—In the Splendor of His Achievements—In the Prevalence of His Merits—In the Number of the Saved—In the Estimation of His People—In the Glory of Heaven—II. He Deals with Great Things—Restored a Great Ruin—Atones for Great Sin—Offers Great Pardon—Supplies Great Wants—Makes Great Preparations—III. His Greatness will Soon Appear—His Coming Near—Great in Judgment.

STRICTLY speaking, I suppose these words refer to the human nature of our Lord Jesus Christ, for it is as to His humanity that Christ was born of Mary. As to His divinity, we must speak concerning Him in another style than this; but, as a man, He was born of the virgin, and it was said to her before His birth, "He shall be great."

The man Christ Jesus stooped very low. In His first estate He was not great; He was very little when He hung upon His mother's breast. In His after estate He was not great; but despised, rejected, and crucified. Indeed, He was so poor that He had not where to lay His head; and He was so cast out by the tongues of men that they called Him a "fellow," mentioned Him among drunken men and winebibbers, and even accused Him of having a devil, and being mad. In the esteem of the great ones of the earth He was an ignorant Galilean of whom they said, "We know not whence He is." His life binds up more fitly with the lowly annals of the poor than with the court-circular or whatever stood for that in Cæsar's day. In His own time His enemies could not find a word base enough to express their contempt of Him. He was in His trial, condemnation, and suffering. Who thought Him great when He was covered with bloody sweat, or when He was sold at the price of a slave, or when a guard came out against Him with swords, and with lanterns, and with torches, as if He had been a thief? Who thought Him great when they bound Him and led Him to the judgment-seat as a malefactor? or when the abjects smote Him, blindfolded Him, and spat in His face? or when He was scourged, led through the streets bearing His cross, and afterward hung up between two thieves to die? Truly He was brought very low, and a sword pierced through His mother's heart as she saw the sufferings of her holy Son. When she knew that He was dead, and buried in a borrowed tomb, she must have painfully pondered in her heart the words from heaven concerning Him, and thought within herself, "The angel said He should be great, but who is made so vile as He? He said that He should be called the 'Son of the Highest,' but, lo! He is brought into the dust of death; and men seal His sepulchre, and cast out His name as evil."

Still, while I think that our text most fitly applies to the manhood of Christ in the first place, I rejoice to think that—

> "He who on earth as man was known,
> And bore our sins and pains,
> Now, seated on th' eternal throne,
> The God of glory reigns."

The very man who was despised and spat upon sits glorious on His Father's throne. As man He is anointed "King of kings, and Lord of lords." As man He has been lifted up from the lowest depths, and set in the greatest heights to reign forever and ever. Peter and the apostles testified, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses, He being by the right hand of God exalted." Stephen also said, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God." While we believe that, and rejoice in it, we shall be wise never to dissociate the deity of Christ from His humanity, for they make up one person. We shall not labor, therefore, to preserve the niceties of theology, but we shall at this time freely speak of our Lord as He is in His Godhead and in His manhood, and apply our text to the whole Christ, declaring the divine promise that "He shall be great."

As yet, even of Jesus, the face of His full glory cannot be seen, or if seen, it cannot be described. Were we caught up to the third heaven we should have little to say on coming back, for we should have seen things which it were not lawful for us to utter. I shall not therefore fail with loss of honor if I tell you that my utmost success at this time will but touch the fringe of the splendor of the Son of man. This is not the time of His clearest revealing. The day is coming for the manifestation of the Lord; as yet He shineth not forth among men in His noontide. His second advent shall more fully reveal Him. Then shall His people "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father," because He also shall rise in the clear face of heaven as the Sun of Righteousness, greatly blessing the sons of men.

I. Let me touch my theme as best I can by, first of all, saying of our adorable Lord Jesus that He is great from many points of view. I might have said from every point of view; but that is too large a truth to be surveyed at one sitting. Mind would fail us, life would fail us, time would fail us; eternity and perfection will alone suffice for that boundless meditation. But from the points of view to which I would conduct you for a moment, the Lord Jesus Christ is emphatically great. First, in

THE PERFECTION OF HIS NATURE.

Think, my brethren. There was never such a being as our Well-Beloved. He is peerless and incomparable. He is divine, and therefore unique. He is "Light of light, very God of very God." Jesus is truly equal with God, one with the Father. But our Lord Jesus is also man, and this makes the singularity of His person, that He should be perfectly and purely God, and as truly and really man. He is not humanity deified; He is not Godhead humanized. I have admitted latitude of expression: but there is, in fact, no confusion of the substance. He is God. He is man. He is all that God is, and all that man is as God created him. He is as truly God as if He were not man, and yet as completely and perfectly man as if He were not God. Think of this wondrous combination! a perfect manhood without spot or stain of original or actual sin, and then the glorious Godhead combined with it!

He is great also in

THE GRANDEUR OF HIS OFFICES.

Remember that He has for our sakes undertaken to be our Redeemer. You see your bondage, brethren. You know it, for some of you have worn the fetters till they have entered into your soul; from such slavery He came to redeem us. Behold His Zion in ruins, heaps on heaps, smoking, consumed! He comes to rebuild and to restore. This is His office—to build up the old wastes, and to restore the temple of the living God, which had been cast down by the foe. To accomplish this He came to be our Priest, our Prophet, and our King; in each office glorious beyond compare. He came to be our Saviour, our Sacrifice, our Substitute, our Surety, our Head, our Friend, our Lord, our Life, our All.

Have you ever stood in Westminster Abbey when some great warrior was being buried, and when the herald pronounced his various titles? He has been greatly honored of his queen, and of the nation, for which he has fought so valiantly, and he is prince of this, and duke of that, and count of the other, and earl of something else; and the titles are many and brilliant. What a parade it is! "Vanity of vanities! All is vanity!" What boots it to the senseless clay that it is buried with pomp of heraldry? But I stand at the tomb of Christ, and I say of His offices that they are superlatively grand; and, moreover, that they are not buried, neither is He among the dead. He lives and bears His honors still in the fulness of their splendor. He is all to His people still; every office He still carries on, and will carry on till He shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, and God shall be all in all.

His nature and His offices would alone furnish us with a lengthened theme; but oh, my brethren, the Lord Jesus is great in

THE SPLENDOR OF HIS ACHIEVEMENTS.

He does not wear an office whose duty is neglected; but His name is faithful and true. He is no holder of a sinecure; He claims to have finished the work which His Father gave Him to do. He has undertaken great things, and, glory be to His name, He has achieved them. His people's sins were laid upon Him, and He bore them up to the cross, and on the cross He made an end of them, so that they will never be mentioned against them any more forever. Then He went down into the grave, and slept there for a little season; but He tore away the bars of the sepulchre and left death dead at His feet, bringing life and immortality to light by His resurrection. This was His high calling, and He has fulfilled it. His victory is complete, the defeat of the foe is perfect. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Springing upward from the tomb when the appointed days were come, He opened heaven's gates to all believers, according to the Word—"The breaker is come up before them, and their king shall pass before them, and the Lord on the head of them." As He opened the golden gates, He led captivity captive; and, receiving gifts for men, He cast down a royal largess among the poorest of His people that they might be enriched thereby. This was His object, and the design has been carried out without flaw or failure. Within the veil He went, our Representative, to take possession of our crowns and thrones, which He holds for us to this day by the tenure of His own cross. Having purchased the inheritance, and paid off the heavy mortgage that lay upon it, He has taken possession of the Canaan wherein our souls shall dwell at the end of the days when we shall stand in our lot. Is it not proven that He is great?

He shall be great, again, in the prevalence of His merits. Never being had such merit as Christ. His life and death cover all believers from head to foot with a perfect obedience to the law. With royal vesture are they clad; Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. His blood has washed believers white as the driven snow, and His righteousness has made them to be "accepted in the Beloved." In infinite power to remove sin, to perfume with acceptance, to clothe with righteousness, to win blessings, to preserve saints, and to save to the uttermost, the Lord Jesus is great beyond all greatness.

My theme will never be exhausted, though I may be. Let me not delay to add that our Lord Jesus Christ is great in ones. I do not believe in a little Christ, or a little heaven, or a little company before the throne, or a few that shall be saved. Hear you this, for I would fain reply to a lie that is often stated, and is the last resort of those who assail the doctrines of grace. They say that we believe that God has left the great mass of His creatures to perish, and has arbitrarily chosen an elect few. We have never thought such a thing. "Oh," they say, "you think that the few who go to your little Bethel or Salem are the elect of God." That, sirs, is what you invent for your own purposes, but we have never said anything of the sort. We rejoice to believe that as many as the stars of heaven shall the redeemed of Christ be—that as many as the sands that are upon the seashore, even an innumerable company, are those for whom Christ has shed His precious blood that He might effectually redeem them. In all things our Lord will have the pre-eminence, and this shall be the case in the number of His followers; He shall therein vanquish His great enemy. Multitudes upon earth are now pursuing their road to heaven, and greater hosts are yet to follow them. A day shall be when the people of God shall be increased exceedingly, above anything that we see at this present. The seed of the Lord Jesus Christ shall multiply till arithmetic shall be utterly baffled, and numeration shall fail.

Brethren and sisters, the Lord Jesus Christ shall be great in the estimation of His people. I am sure that none of His people would give way to others in a humble sense of supreme indebtedness; but each one would say, "There is something which He has done for me which He never did for you. There is some point of view in which He is greater to me than He is to you." Brothers, I admit that there are many points in which He is greater to you than He is to me; but yet I would make winds and waves my orators, and cause the whole universe to become one open mouth with which to tell out the praises of Emmanuel. If all eternity would speak, as though it, too, were but one tongue, yet it could not tell out all the charms of His love and the sureness of His faithfulness and His truth. We must leave off somewhere, but, truly, if it be the point of our estimation of Him we never can express our overwhelming sense of His honor, His excellence, His sweetness. Can you conceive the unutterable joys of the glorified? Every felicity of eternity is a song to His honor. Heaven and earth shall yet be full of the out-shinings of His glory. Truly, He is great, and shall be great eternally.

GREAT IN HEAVEN.

But, O brethren, how great must Christ be in the glory of heaven! We have never seen that. Some of us shall see it full soon.

> "For we are in the border-land,
> The heavenly country's near at hand:
> A step is all 'twixt us and rest,
> E'en now we converse with the blest."

But the greatness of Christ in heaven—surely this is the grand sight for which we long to go to heaven—that we may behold His glory, "the glory which He had with the Father before the world was," and the glory which He has gained by His service of the Father here below. Has He not said, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory?" What honor and majesty surround our Prince in the metropolis of His empire!

But I must not—dare not—try to touch upon the glory of Christ upon the throne of the Father. Certain great divines have written upon the glory of Christ, but I will warrant you that, when they died and went to heaven, they half wished that they could come back again to amend their most glowing pages. Ah me! what can ignorance say of the All-wise? The heavens are now telling the glory of our Lord, but the half of it will never be told throughout ages of ages. Assuredly, concerning our adorable Lord Jesus it is true—"He shall be great."

II. Now, by your leave, I want to turn the subject a little round, and look at it in another light. "He shall be great," and He is so, for He

DEALS WITH GREAT THINGS.

He is a Saviour, and a great one. As I have already said, it was a great ruin which He came to restore. The wind came from the abyss and smote the four corners of the house of manhood, and it fell and lay along. Devils laughed and triumphed as they saw God's handiwork despoiled. Human nature sank in shame, Paradise was blasted, sin was triumphant, and the fiery sword was set at Eden's gate to exclude us. It was a hideous ruin. But, oh, when Christ came, He brought a great salvation. He came to prepare a better Paradise, and to plant in it a better tree of life, and to give us possession of it upon a better tenure than before. Oh, He is a great Saviour; He wrought amid the chaos of the fall, and restored what Adam had destroyed!

And, beloved, we were covered with great sin

—some of us especially so. But "He shall be great," and therefore He makes short work of great sin. Great sinners, what a joy it ought to be to you to think that He is great, and, therefore, has come to rescue such as you are, and deal with such difficulties as beset and surround you; for what if sin be great? His arrangement for its removal is great, too. Look there at Calvary, and, if you can see it through your blinding tears, behold the sacrifice He offered once for all to put away sin. We have none of us a due conception of the grandeur of that vicarious offering, which at once and forever made an end of sin. Think of it carefully and in detail. Count it no light thing that He who was the Father's equal, that He who was pure and perfect in both natures, became a curse for us, and was made sin for us, and presented Himself as a victim to justice on our behalf. This is a wonder among wonders, as much exceeding miracle as miracle exceeds the most commonplace fact. It overtops the highest Alps of thought, that He who was offended should expiate the offence, He who was perfect should suffer punishment, He who was all goodness should be made sin, and He who was all love should be forsaken of the God of love. What merit and majesty are found in His glorious oblation! Great is the sin, but greater is the sacrifice. The atonement has covered the guilt, and left a margin of abounding righteousness.

Beloved, what a mercy it is for us that we have such a High-Priest, for if you and I are burdened to-night with great transgression, there is to be had—pardon so great that it actually annihilates the sin—pardon so great that the sin is cast behind Jehovah's back, while the pardon rings out perpetual notes of joy and peace in the soul.

"His the pardon, ours the sin,
Great the sin, the pardon great;
Great His good which healed our ill,
Great His love which killed our hate."

He shall be great indeed who has wrought us so great salvation.

And now, dear friends, you and I, being greatly pardoned through the great sacrifice, are journeying through the wilderness toward Canaan, and we have great wants and many, pressing upon us every day. We are poverty itself, and only All-sufficiency can supply us; but that is found in Jesus. We need great abundance of food; the heavenly bread lies around about the camp, and each may fill his omer. We require rivers of living water; the smitten rock yields us a ceaseless flood; the outflow never ceases. We have great demands, but Christ has great supplies. Between here and heaven we shall have, perhaps, greater wants than we have yet known; but, all along, every halting-place is ready, provender is laid up, good cheer is stored, nothing has been overlooked. The commissariat of the Eternal is absolutely perfect. Be great in your experience of His all-sufficiency, and great in your praises of His bounty, and then in heaven you shall pour at His feet great treasures of gratitude forever and ever.

Yes, and He is a Christ of GREAT PREPARATIONS.

He is engaged before the throne to-day in preparing a great heaven for His people; it will be made up of great deliverance, great peace, great rest, great joy, great victory, great discovery, great fellowship, great rapture, great glory. He is preparing for His redeemed no little heaven, no starveling banquet, no narrow delight. He is a great Creator, and He is creating a great Paradise wherein a great multitude shall be greatly happy forever and ever. If we live it shall be our business to sing like the Virgin, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour."

III. I have come to a close when I have said a few words upon the last point, which is this:

HIS GREATNESS WILL SOON APPEAR.

It now lies under a cloud to men's blear eyes. They still belittle Him with their vague and vain thoughts; but it shall not always be so. It is midnight with His honor here just now; or if it be not midnight, it is much the same, for men are stone blind. But it will not be darkness long, nor shall human minds be blinded forever. My eyes foresee the dawning. Did you hear the clarion just now. I dream not that ears of flesh can catch the sound as yet; but the ears of faith can hear it. The trumpet rings out exceeding loud and long, and after the trumpet there is heard this voice: "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh! Go ye forth to meet Him." Hear ye not the shouts of armies—"Lo, He cometh! Lo, He cometh! Lo, He cometh!" Right gladly I hear the cry. Let the world ring with the joy-note. He comes. That trumpet proclaims Him.

I shall propound no order now as to how predicted events shall happen; but I know this, that the Lord shall reign forever and ever, King of kings, and Lord of lords. Hallelujah! "He shall be great." The nations shall bow at His feet. Rebellious enemies shall own Him as their King. The whole universe shall be filled with the glory of God. There shall be left no space where His light shall not shine. "He shall be great." To Him "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Fret not yourselves, brethren, because of the false doctrine which roams through the world to-day. Worry not your hearts as though the Christ were defeated. He is clad in shining armor, through which no dart of error can ever pierce. He lingers for a little while upon the hills, surveying the battlefield with eagle eye. He leaves His poor servants to prove how weak they are, as they almost turn their backs in the day of battle. He lets heaven and earth see the weakness of an arm of flesh. But courage, brethren! The Prince Emmanuel hastens! You may hear His horse hoofs on the road.

HE IS NEAR TO COME.

On white horses shall His chosen follow Him, going forth "conquering and to conquer," for the battle is the Lord's, and He will deliver the enemy into our hands. The Lord shall reign forever and ever; King of kings! Hallelujah! "He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet."

The day is coming when the mighty progress of the Gospel shall make Christ to be great among men; and then you need not listen long to hear that other trumpet which shall wake the sleeping dead. The Risen One descends. Resurrection is at hand! Oh, what greatness will be upon Christ in that hour when all shall leave their graves, even the whole multitude of the slain of death! He shall be glorious among them, the Firstfruits of the resurrection, illustrious in those who rise by virtue of His rising. Oh, what honor will He have that day! Jesus, Thou art He whom thy brethren shall praise as they see Thee victorious over death in all those quickened myriads.

GREAT IN JUDGMENT.

Then shall come the judgment; and oh, how great will Christ be in men's eyes in that day when He sits upon the throne and holds the scales of justice, and judges men for the deeds done in the body! I warrant you that none will deny His Godhead in that day. None will proclaim themselves His adversaries in that dread hour. The earth is reeling! The sky is crumbling! The stars are falling! The sun is quenched! The moon is black as sackcloth of hair! and Jesus is sitting on the throne! A cry is heard from all His enemies, "Hide us, mountains. Rocks, fall upon us. Hide us from His face." That face of His—calm, quiet, and triumphant—shall be terrible to them. They will cry in horror, "Hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb."

He shall be great, finally, when He shall gather all His elect about Him—when all the souls redeemed by blood shall assemble within His palace-gate to worship Him. Oh, what a sight it will be when He is seen as the centre, while, far away from north, south, east, and west, a blazing host of shining ones, all glorious in His glory, shall in ever-widening circles surround His person and His throne, all bowing down before the Son of God, and crying, "Hallelujah!" as they adore Him! Truly, He shall be great.

Oh,

MAKE HIM GREAT

now, poor sinner, by trusting Him! Make Him great to-night, dear child of God, by longing for Him. Make Him great as you come to the table by hungering after Him. Count it a great privilege to eat and drink with Him with overflowing delight. Come with a great hunger and a great thirst after Him, and take Him into your very self, and say, "He is my bread; He is my drink; He is my life; He is my all." All the while let your spirit live by adoring, and let every pulse of your body beat to His honor. Tune your hand, your heart, your tongue to this one song, "Hallelujah, hallelujah, hallelujah! Unto Him that loved us and died for us, and rose again, be glory forever and ever!"

"To the Lamb that was slain all honor be paid,
Let crowns without number encircle His head:
Let blessing, and glory, and riches, and might,
Be ascribed evermore by angels of light."

A CHINESE OFFICIAL'S PALANQUIN.

THE narratives sent home by missionaries in China show how wide a contrast exists between the manners and customs of that country and those of Christian lands. They vary in almost every detail of life. At the table, in dress, and in the streets, they have customs which appear to the American and European observer as ridiculous. They do not eat with knives and forks, but with two short pieces of bamboo, called chopsticks, which they handle with a dexterity surprising to the uninitiated.

On the streets Chinese ladies never appear with a male escort; even married ladies do not walk with their husbands. Neither cars, hacks, nor private carriages are used. The poor and the middle classes use the wheelbarrow; for the rich there are palanquins. Our picture on page 76 shows the travelling palanquin or sedan chair of a Mandarin official. Sometimes they have eight bearers, but people of subordinate rank have only four, and ordinary people two. The State palanquin of a functionary is covered with rich green cloth, and the fringe on the roof and window-curtains, in order to denote the rank of the owner, is green, too.

Rank is sharply marked in China. In this very matter of palanquin locomotion, for the first three recognized and accredited ranks of noblemen and officials, the tips of the bearing-poles may be of brass, in the form of a dragon's head; the fourth and fifth ranks would have a lion's head. On the top of these travelling chairs is a ball of tin. Private gentlemen have blue cloth upholstery and trimmings, and the ends of their chair-poles are tipped with plain brass.

But the most interesting feature is the travelling wheelbarrow. It is the cheapest of all cheap conveyances. For a marvellously small sum the coolie will trundle his fare for several miles along the busy streets; and many a journey into the country for ten to twenty miles at a stretch is often so performed by the agents of the China Inland Mission. Wheelbarrow travelling, however, cannot boast of its comfort as it can of its cheapness. The wheelbarrows have no springs, and as the seats are immediately over the wheel, the passenger cannot fail to know of any inequality in the road or on the wheel. As the wheelbarrow narrows toward the front, there is only room for one foot up; the other is accommodated with a stirrup of simple construction, which helps the rider to maintain his seat when the vehicle gives a jolt, which is not infrequent, and which might have been designed to test whether the passenger were a true celestial or a barbarian foreigner! The regulation pace is about two miles an hour.

A picture on page 76 illustrates the Chinese ladies' favorite style of hair-dressing, which the ladies of the upper classes almost universally adopt. It is intended to represent a large shell. Many young ladies, however, wear their hair hanging down their backs in plaited queues. Both shells and queues are secured by large ornaments, and those worn by the aristocratic ladies cost large sums of money. The eccentricity of head-gear is, however, surpassed by the operation of fashion at the other extremitv of the body. Chinese ladies suffer torture of their feet in order to be in the fashion. When very young, a little girl's foot is tightly bandaged round, the end of the bandage being first laid on the inside of the foot, then carried round the toes, under the foot, and round the heel till the toes are drawn under the sole, in which an indentation becomes made and the instep swells out. Every time the bandage is taken away another is put on, and tied more tightly. The effect is to produce a shape of foot which we should consider ugly—in fact a club-foot. Of late years, through Christian influence, anti-foot-binding societies have been formed in Canton and Amoy.

The custom seems to us strange and unnatural as well as cruel. Ladies, however, in our own land who wear high-heeled boots, of which the heel is not under the heel of the foot, but under the instep, may be able to understand the Chinese practice.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

"Tired of Life" was the Cause Assigned in the diary of a man who has committed suicide in New York. He was under thirty years of age, in good circumstances, having a considerable balance to his credit at his banker's, and was not of dissipated habits. Yet in the prime of his life he wrote as his final entry in his diary the words, "Tired of life," and then went out and shot himself. It is remarkable that this weariness of life is frequently endured by men who have the means of enjoying life according to the world's idea of enjoyment. It shows that mere earthly pleasures can never give the peace and happiness which the Christian, however poor, is privileged to enjoy (Isaiah 26 : 3).

A Thrilling Scene in a Circus was Witnessed in Chicago on January 14th. The lion tamer entered the apartment of the lions, in company with two other men and the wife of the proprietor of the show. Entering the cage of Prince, the large African lion, he told the men to close the door after him. This, however, was forgotten ; and the ferocious beast sprang through the opening with a deafening roar, which created a panic among the audience. The people escaped by climbing upon the hyena cages and thence to the loft. The lion sprang upon a Shetland pony, and soon drank its blood. Outside people, learning of the desperate situation, thrust long poles through the partitions, bearing sponges saturated with chloroform ; and when the huge beast was rendered partially insensible, he was lassoed and placed back in his cage. Not until the beast was safely behind the bars did any one venture near him. Unhappily, people do not display the same caution as to the great enemy of souls, who is typified in Scripture as a lion. Like the lion in this incident he is treacherous, and those who think it is safe to go where he is are sometimes alarmed by a tragedy which shows his true nature and ferocity. Happy they who by the mercy of God escape destruction at his hands (1 Peter 5 : 8).

A Number on a Bride's Boots was Relied upon by her to reconcile her conscience to an assertion required by the law. She had set her affections on a young man whom her parents were not willing to receive as a son-in-law. They refused their sanction to the marriage, but the undutiful daughter decided to dispense with it, and going with her lover to a town in which she was not known, they were married a few weeks ago. It was necessary in order to obtain the license that she should either state that she was over eighteen years of age or that she should produce evidence that she had the consent of her parents to the marriage. When asked how the difficulty was surmounted she explained that although under the prescribed age, she conscientiously swore that she was "over eighteen," that number having been placed on the soles of her boots for the special purpose. If that device really reconciled her conscience to her statement, it would appear that the conscience sadly needs enlightening. A statement so made as to intentionally deceive, is a lie (Jer. 9 : 5, 9).

The Cunning of a Hare Caused the Death of three useful dogs recently. The Ione (Cal.) Echo thus describes the incident : "Three valuable dogs—a bird dog, greyhound and shepherd dog—belonging at the ranch of James Martin, met death in a singular manner last week. The dogs had accompanied Will Martin out on the ranch, and, starting up a hare, all gave chase. They were close together and in hot pursuit when the hare suddenly jumped to one side, and the dogs, unable to check their speed, ran a few feet further on and disappeared, one after the other. When Mr. Martin came to where the dogs had all gone out of sight, he found that they had fallen into an old well that was hidden by brush and weeds, the water in which was at least twenty feet from the surface. It being impossible to secure ropes, boards, or anything with which to rescue them, all the dogs were drowned." How many immortal souls have been lost by the use of similar tactics! They have been incited by Satan to the pursuit of riches or fame or power, and have been lured along a road on which there are many pitfalls (1 Tim. 6 : 9).

NETTIE'S AERIAL VOYAGE.

"WILLIE, do come and see this great big thing," said Nettie Harvey, an eight-year-old child, to her little brother, four years her junior.

"What is it, Nettie?" asked the boy, as he and his sister stood gazing up at a large balloon tied to a tree in their father's field.

"I don't know," said Nettie, "but father knows ; let us go and find him." Away ran the two children, eager for information about this strange, gayly-painted silk monster, which was tugging at the rope that held it, as if it would tear the big tree up by the roots. Father was not easily found, for he had walked down town with his friend, Mr. Brooks, the aeronaut, to whom the balloon belonged. The children at last saw him coming, and ran off to meet him. They soon had him by the hand, dragging him to the spot where the balloon was tethered.

Then Mr. Harvey had to explain to his little ones all about the big air-ship in which Mr. Brooks was to ascend that afternoon.

"Will it go right up into the sky, father?" asked Nettie.

"Yes, my dear, up, and up, until it gets so high that it looks quite a tiny little dot no larger than Willie's top."

"Does it go to heaven, father?" said Willie. "Nurse says heaven is up in the sky."

"O Willie, what a silly question," said Nettie. "You know mamma told us only dead people go to heaven. It is a long way off, isn't it, papa?"

Mr. Harvey found the question a difficult one to answer. It seemed to him that heaven must be very near to some people. It was only since his marriage that he had attained a definite hope of ever entering that abode of the blessed. Happily for him the lady he married was an earnest, devoted Christian. Her prayers and pleadings and, more than all, the calm, deep peace which, like a river, flowed through her life, had won him to seek for himself the joys of peace in Christ. "Ah! Nettie," he said, "heaven is a long way off only to those who do not seek it with all their heart. Ask your mamma ; she will tell you it is possible to enjoy something of heaven here."

"But, papa," Nettie persisted, "people cannot go to heaven in balloons, can they?"

"Oh no, my child, heaven is not to be reached that way. God takes care of those who love Him while they are here, and when they die we bury their bodies in the cemetery, but their souls are in God's keeping, and He takes them to heaven. We are sure of that, but we do not know how. He will take Nettie and Willie both some day, if they love Him and try to do as He wishes them, and listen to mamma, and be good like she is. She will tell you about Jesus, and how He loves children. Some He takes to heaven while they are quite children, and others grow up and try to make the world better and to help the poor and the sick and the suffering all they can, and they become old, and when they die they go to heaven too, as the children did who died young. The way to get near to God and heaven is not by going up in a balloon, but by living and working for Him in the world."

At that moment the father saw Mr. Brooks approaching, and left his children to go and meet him. They had business to transact together, and went indoors, leaving the two children still gazing at the balloon. Half an hour later a loud shout from the field startled the two gentlemen, who, running to the window, saw the balloon rapidly soaring upward. To their horror they could see, too, that in the car attached to it were two children. There could be no doubt who those children were. Nettie and Willie were both missing, and Nettie's voice, though only faintly heard, could be distinctly recognized by her agonized father.

The utter helplessness of the two men was realized at that moment. Not a thing could be done to rescue the children. Mr. Harvey went to seek his wife, who was absent on a visit to a sick villager. The good lady's distress was severe, as she stood gazing on the balloon in which her children were travelling none knew whither. "Let us go home and pray," she said to her husband. All through that summer day the prayers of father and mother and one or two Christian neighbors were offered to God for the safety of the balloon and its precious freight.

Meanwhile, what of the children? After their father left them they had remained curiously speculating about the voyage of the balloon. They wondered how Mr. Brooks would go up, what he would do, and where he would go. Finally they climbed up the tree to peep into the basket car, and at length, after many attempts, they succeeded in getting into it. Whether they inadvertently loosened the ropes that held the balloon, or whether their slight weight gave just what added force was needed to drag the ropes from their grip on the tree could not be learned; but suddenly, with a strange, exhilarating sensation, they found themselves rising above the trees. A momentary joy filled their childish hearts at their novel situation, but it was turned to distress in a short time. All around them was the empty air, and Nettie, who could only just look over the top of the basket-car, saw with dismay that they were far above the roof of their home. Then she shrieked, and, very faintly, she heard the shout which had alarmed her father and Mr. Brooks. Then the balloon went up, up, and she heard no more.

At first the two children were overcome with fear, but soon, as no harm came to them, and they were happily unable to see how far they were above the surface of the earth, they grew calm. Willie complained of the cold, and Nettie put her arms about him and tried to keep him warm.

"May I go to sleep, Nettie?" he asked presently, and Nettie, whose own eyes had been drooping, agreed. "But first," she said, "we will say our prayers as we do when we go to bed."

Surely a stranger sight could not have been witnessed, had there been any one there to see, than those two children kneeling in that car, now being carried swiftly through the upper air, putting their hands together and saying, "Our Father which art in heaven." That prayer blended with the prayer being offered by the anxious friends below. The two children, their little prayer said, clasped each other in a close embrace, and before long were fast asleep.

How that balloon travelled, how it was guided, no one can say. A farmer in northern Illinois, some hours later, saw it drifting low across his field, and seizing the trailing rope, secured it around a tree and found in its car the two little adventurers safe and unhurt.

Nettie is now a staid and matronly lady, who sometimes tells the incident to little people, whose wide-open, astonished eyes are very much like her own. Happily she is conscious that she is now no farther from heaven than she was when, six and twenty years ago, she sailed with her little brother a thousand feet nearer the sky. Much discipline, some sorrow, and an unwavering faith in God have united in preparing her for the land in which rest and safety succeed labor and peril.

The Prisoner Liberated.

DAY after day, night after night, through long weeks and months, David Fell's heart died within him. Very slowly, almost imperceptibly, his physical powers failed him also. His hand lost its cunning, and his sight grew dim. Wrapped up in his wretchedness, he made no complaint, and asked for no favor. His body filled up its appointed place, sat at his bench, crawled to and fro along the corridors, crouched in his cell; but he hardly felt or knew what he was doing, or where he was. He was the mere shadow of a man. The life and spirit and heart of being was dying out of him.

There was only one thing that stirred the flickering life within him. This was the letters that Bess wrote to him, always loving and cheerful, promising that all should yet be well for him when he was once more free. She would go with him to some far-off land, she wrote, and they would begin life afresh together. But David would shake his head mournfully over these dear promises. Would it not indeed spoil her life if he let her leave old Euclid and Mrs. Linnett, and the home in which she was so happy? That could never be.

He was changed, but he was conscious that still he was no fit protector for Bess. In spite of himself, fierce passions and blasphemous words, the result of companionship with criminals, often made him ashamed of himself. He despaired of ever being a good man. He knew that he could not reform himself, and he did not know of that almighty power which could give him a new heart and change his whole being as of one new-born. Therefore, though he longed for his beloved sister's companionship, he distrusted himself, and he loved her too well to drag her down to his level.

One Sunday morning, after chapel, he found a letter in his cell. He had been twelve months in jail, and Bess had written three times. It was time for a fourth to come, and he seized it as eagerly as a man dying of thirst clutches at a draught of cold water. But this letter was not from Bess.

"DEAR DAVID: I'm a seaman now, earning good wages, and I've saved twenty pounds; and Mr. Dudley says, if I get on well in learning navigation, I shall be a mate soon. So I've asked Bess if she'll be my wife. O David! nobody knows how I love Bess. I'm thinking of her night and day when I'm aboard, and when I'm ashore I can't bear to be out of her sight. She's prettier and dearer every time I see her. But she says, 'No; I belong to Davy. He's got nobody and nothing, save me.' She never says that she can't love me, or I'd never have wrote to you.

"Now, I want you to write to her, and tell her you'd like her to marry me; and you'll have a brother as well as a sister. It would be better for you if I married Bess, instead of another man, because I couldn't never be ashamed of you, as father's a thief, and my own two brothers. If she married any one else, he might taunt her some day, and I couldn't. Don't stand in my way, dear old Davy. I'll be a good husband to Bess, and a good brother to you; and I'm earning good wages; and perhaps I may rise to be a captain, and then Bess shall be a lady. Only write to her, and say you'd like to have me for a brother, and you'll never repent it. From your loving friend,

"ROGER BLACKETT."

David sat motionless for a long time, crushing the letter tightly in his feverish hand. There was no work to be done, and he had leisure to ponder over it bitterly. Roger Blackett! How well he could remember the timid, browbeaten, half-starved lad, who lived in terror of his savage father!—a poor, idling, weak, despised boy held cheap by all the other boys in the street; the son of a notorious scoundrel, whose elder sons were London thieves. And now, after being trained on board ship, he was a seaman, earning good wages, and looking forward to be a mate, and thinking of marrying —ay, of marrying Bess! Some day he might rise to be the master of a vessel, and be called Captain Blackett; while he—David Fell—what was he?

A castaway, a housebreaker, and a convict!

Roger would marry little Bess. David seemed to see it in a dream—Bess in a house of her own, pretty and loving and good, with little children growing up about her; and Roger coming home from his voyage, bringing gifts from foreign places, to show how he had thought of each one of them while he was far away. A life of honest, cheerful toil lay before Roger, with gladsome home delights, such as make this earth a pleasant world to live in. He seemed to see the children's faces, and hear their voices ringing in his ears. All that for Roger; but what for him?

Death on a jail-bed!

He felt it for a certainty as he crushed Roger's letter in his fingers. The passage through jail to the grave had not been a long one; and he was glad of it, if his dreary sense of making his escape out of an evil world could be called gladness. Death was very near at hand, and could not come too soon.

The next day his warder recommended him to go into the hospital; and he went. The medical officer could not say what ailed him, or under what name to catalogue his disease. There was no column in his report for hopelessness and heart-sickness.

Roger never received an answer to his letter to David. But a few days after it had been despatched, and after Roger was gone again to sea, there came an official permission to old Euclid and Bess to visit the prisoner. David Fell was dying, and requested to see them at once. There was no time to be lost, if they wished to see him alive; and they hastened to obey the summons, scarcely realizing the grief that had come upon them.

David had begged to be taken back into his own cell, where there was quiet and loneliness, rather than to lie dying in the midst of the rascality of a prison-hospital. A softer mattress and pillow had been laid under him; but, in every other respect, the bare, whitewashed cell remained as it was when he had entered it more than a year ago. Through the closely barred window, high up against the ceiling, could be seen only a patch of wintry sky, gray and cold with clouds. The heavy door, with its small round eyelet, through which the jailer could at any time watch the prisoner unseen, closed quietly upon Euclid and Bess as they entered David's cell, and stood just within it as if afraid of stepping forward to the prison-bed.

He was lying with his eyelids fast closed, and his white and sunken face resting so still upon his pillow, that as they stood there hand in hand, hardly daring to stir, they believed that he was already dead. But, when Bess tremblingly approached him, and laid her warm hand on the thin skeleton fingers lying on the dark rug which covered him, he looked up at once into her face, with no light or smile in his eyes, but with a gaze of speechless love and sorrow.

"Davy!" she cried, sinking down on her knees, and laying her cheek close against his upon the pillow, "Davy! speak to me."

"Little Bess," he said, "and Euclid!"

"Ay, David!" answered Euclid, looking down upon him in unutterable pity. The old man's face wore an air of peace and of quiet gladness, which had smoothed away its former gloom and roughness; and his voice fell more softly on David's ear than he had ever heard any voice, except his mother's and little Bess's. He turned his dim eyes to the old man's face.

"I'm dyin'," he said, "in jail!"

Euclid only nodded silently, while Bess drew his chilly hand to her lips, and kissed it tenderly.

"It's been a cursed life for me," he groaned; "but it's almost over."

"O Davy!" sobbed Bess, "if you get well, and only live to come out o' jail, you and me'll go away to some country a long way off, where you can live honest and happy."

"It's best as it is," he said, stroking her rosy face fondly with his thin hand: "I should ha' spoiled your life, little Bess. Roger'll make you a good husband, and care more for you when I'm gone; and you'll think of me sometimes. No, no! Hell can't be worse for me than this world's been."

"Davy! Davy!" she cried, "you don't think you're goin' there!"

"There's no other place for me," he answered. "Folks don't go from jail to heaven. I've broke God's laws; and they say He'll punish us worse there than they've punished us here. God couldn't set me free to go to heaven."

"But you're sorry," said Bess, weeping.

"Ah! I'm sorry I hadn't a better chance, like Roger," he muttered. "I might ha' made a good man; but it's too late now."

"God knows all about it," sobbed Bess.

"Ah! and God can forgive you yet," said Euclid. "Didn't Jesus forgive the thief that was dyin' side by side with Him when He was bein' crucified? A thief, David! Bess, my dear, you read it out to us, for I fear I might make some mistake about it."

Still kneeling by the bedside, with David's cold hand clasped in her own, Bess read, in a faltering, sorrowful voice, these words:

"And there were also two others, malefactors, led with Him to be put to death.

"And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified Him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left.

"Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.

"And one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on Him, saying, If Thou be Christ, save Thyself and us.

"But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation?

"And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss.

"And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom.

"And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."

"That's it!" exclaimed Euclid; "the malefactors only received the due reward of their deeds; but He had done nothing amiss. They'd broke the laws, and were bein' crucified for it; but Jesus was bein' crucified with them! It seemed as if there wasn't any other place for them to fall into, save hell. But there was a road to Paradise, even from the three crosses on Calvary; and Jesus was goin' up that shinin' road Himself. They might both have gone with Him to Paradise; and you can go to Him there from jail, David. The poor thief was dyin'; but it wasn't too late to ask Jesus to remember him. I don't say as you're fit to go to heaven, David; I can't say anything about that. But that poor fellow went into Paradise with our Lord Jesus Himself. That must be a place worth goin' to. He says, 'In My Father's house there are many places;' and he'll know where you are fit for."

Euclid's face quivered and glowed with earnest entreaty, and his husky voice seemed to gain a softer and more appealing tone as he spoke. David fastened his dreary, hopeless eyes upon him, listening as one listens to the distant sound, which foretells that help is coming.

"Jesus Himself was bein' crucified as if He'd broke the laws as well as them," said Bess, a light shining through her eyes. "He hadn't ever done any sin; but it's like as if He said to Himself, 'There's poor wicked folks as will be put to death for their wickedness; and maybe they'll think I didn't come to seek for them and save them, as well as the rest, if I don't die like them.' He must have meant to save the worst folks, or He might have died different, not as if he'd been breaking the laws Himself. I never thought that of Him before. He came to save thieves and murderers, and so He died as if He'd been one of them. Davy, you're no further away from Paradise than the poor thief was!"

The faint dawn of hope in David's sunken eyes was growing brighter, as if the sound of help was coming nearer to him; and he grasped the hand of little Bess more firmly in his trembling fingers.

"Ay! there must be room for you there," said old Euclid. "He'll know where it's best for you to be; and, O David! He loves you. Only think of that! Why, Bess and me, we'd have found a place for you, out o' love and pity, if you'd only lived to come out o' jail; and His love's a hundred times more than ours. It stands to reason as His love is a hundred times more than what we poor creatures have. Only you think about Him, and call to Him. If you can't say nothing else, just say, 'Lord, remember me,' like that poor fellow on the cross beside Him. I wish I knew his name; but that don't matter. You'll not hear Jesus speakin', like he did; but all the same He'll say, 'To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise.' Bess, my dear, when we hear as David's gone, you and me'll say, 'To-day he is with Jesus in Paradise.' It seems to me as if it 'ud be better than comin' out o' jail into the streets o' London."

The tears were rolling down old Euclid's withered cheeks as David gazed up at him. The boy made a great effort to speak; but the words faltered on his tongue.

"A thousand times better if it's true," he gasped.

"If it isn't true, there's nothing else for you or me of any good," answered Euclid. "We're worse off than dogs. If there isn't any God as loves us, nor any Saviour as died for us, this world's a cruel, cursed place."

"Oh, it's true!" cried Bess, clasping his hands fondly in her own. "I love you, Davy! and God loves you; and Jesus died on the cross with a thief beside Him. He wouldn't ever have done it if He didn't love us all."

But the time allotted to them had expired, and the warder warned them that they must go in a few minutes. Bess laid her bonny face against David's dying head on the prison-pillow, and put her hand upon his clammy cheek. The last moments were flying fast. Yet what more could they say to one another? Would they ever see one another again? Was all the sorrowful past brought to this end at last? Must they leave each other here, and break forever the bonds of love and memory which had linked their lives together?

One more minute only. Euclid laid his hand on David's chilly forehead.

"Good-by! God bless you!" sobbed the old man.

"Good-by!" breathed David faintly. "I didn't mean to be a thief. Good-by, little Bess!"

She pressed her lips to his once more in a long last kiss. Then they were compelled to leave him. The night was falling, and the light faded away slowly in the solitary cell. The warder came in to light the gas; but David asked to be left yet a little longer in the gathering dusk. The gray of the wintry sky glimmered palely amid the surrounding blackness as the jail-walls vanished from his dim eyes, and it looked the only way of escape from the thick darkness of the bare cell. He was alone. Love had been forced to quit him before life did. There was no hand to hold his as long as the icy fingers could feel its loving grasp; no voice to whisper words of hope into the ear growing deaf to earthly sounds; no touch on the cold damp forehead, telling of faithful companionship down to the very threshold of death.

Now and then the warder glanced through the aperture in the thick door, seeing, in the dim twilight shed through the prison-window, that the prisoner lay still, and made no signs of needing help. Who among them could help him to die? The chaplain had visited him, and his friends had been to see him; there was nothing more to be done. The spirit, in all its ignorance and sorrow, bereft of human love, was slowly preparing to wing its flight into the dark and drear unknown. Alone and in prison David Fell was casting off the last link of the heavy chain of grief and wrongs and crimes which we bound about the boy when we sent him to jail (for begging for his mother).

At last a nurse came in to see him. The heart still beat feebly, though the gray change that is the forerunner of death had passed over his face. She stooped down over him; for his lips moved, as though he were trying to speak.

"Lord, remember me!" he whispered.

So God opened the prison-door, and set our prisoner free.

THE END.

THE CONVERSION OF LYDIA.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 10, Acts 16: 11-24. Golden Text, verse 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul Prompt to Obey—The Sabbath Service by the River—The First European Convert—Lydia's Opened Heart—Her Complete Surrender—The Cost of her Avowal—Her Hospitality—The Joy of Encouragement in a New Field—Preparation for Trial—The Demoniac Following—Her Recognition of Paul's Mission—The Proclamation—The Exorcism—Resentment of her Employers—The Loss of one Devil.

PAUL, once clear as to the course which God would have him take, lost no time in directing his steps thither. He took ship, and went first to Samothracia, an island, which lay in the direct route for Macedonia, thence to another island, Neapolis, from whence to Philippi, the chief city of that part of Macedonia. At first the little missionary company of four, now including Luke, who writes the account, "abode in the city certain days." It is easy to conceive what was their occupation; they were undoubtedly asking orders from Headquarters, and receiving them, too.

AN ILLITERATE CONSECRATED MAN

in a meeting last night said: "I used to be afraid, and shrink from speaking to a drunkard or a poor lost woman, for fear that I should not know what to say; but now, since I have given myself up to be the instrument of the Holy Ghost, He is always within me, telling me what to say. I never have to think or plan about it, I just go forward, trusting the Holy Ghost, and He never lets me be at a loss." When we go hither or thither on God's account, it is never at our own charges; He is responsible, not we, for the words, the power, the results; our only need is to be quite sure about His will, to obey it, and then to go on trusting Him.

THE RIVERSIDE PRAYER-MEETING.

It was, no doubt, by the direction of God that Paul and his company went out on the Sabbath day to a riverside, "where prayer was wont to be made." There they found a little company of women gathered together. "Nothing very important in that," man would say. Important enough to change the course of a man like the Apostle Paul! so God esteemed it; as we see by the result. Prayer has come to be such an unreal thing with many of God's children, that they look upon answer to prayer as quite an uncertain thing, not to be relied upon in the same way at all as human plans and common-sense. Oh, how few take in that God makes silence in heaven to hear the prayers of His saints! (Rev. 8: 1-4) that He moves heaven and earth to answer the prayer of His children! (Ps. 18: 6, 7, 9, 16.) Jesus has given us the very authority of His own name as our guarantee for the answer to our prayers. But oh, how few there are who pray the prayer of faith, there and then believing that they receive, and so having! (Mark 11: 24.) How few ask and receive, that their joy may be full! (John 16: 24.)

Here was a little company of women, who probably had become dissatisfied with idolatry, through the influence of some godly Jews. What they had heard of the God of heaven had been used of Him to awaken an intense desire for something of experimental acquaintance with Him. He who heard the cry of the children of Israel in Egypt, heard these women, probably mothers of families, whose souls were burdened, not for themselves alone, but for their husbands and children. Among them was one avowed worshipper of God, Lydia, the leader of the meeting, most likely. This heart was already prepared, and now God, who had been at work upon her, opened it so "that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul." This was the first European convert, a woman, and one who, even before she was baptized, was used of God to bring her complete household to the Lord, although baptism in those days was administered immediately upon believing. It was a very full surrender for Lydia; she was making herself a stranger to all her relations and friends, who still worshipped false gods; she might ruin her business and with it the earthly prospects of her family.

BUT SHE COUNTED THE COST, and considered that to gain the Messiah was worth it all. There were no half measures in this woman's consecration; "when she was baptized, and her household, she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there." It was womanlike as God made woman; it was womanlike as Christ makes woman; and one cannot but be reminded of David and Abiathar, when David said, "Abide thou with me, fear not: for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life: but with me thou shalt be in safeguard" (1 Sam. 22: 23). Lydia had cast in her lot with Christ, and therefore with His servants.

Those must have been days of precious joy. Paul and his company had been feeling what every missionary feels on new ground, the oppression of all the forces which were against him—the very religious ideas of the people being full of sin; the gods whom they worshipped personifications of drink, of lust, of various vices, as well as some of virtues—so that the very idea of God might be connected in their minds with some unholy thing. And now, God Himself had purified hearts by faith, and already there were some who could take in spiritual ideas. With what joy must He have opened the Scriptures to these newly converted ones! and what a heaven it must have been to them! A God who was love, and who would impart Himself to them as well as die for them! One who would care for them like a mother! it was all so new, so wonderful! Perhaps little business went on in those days. Jesus was the one all-absorbing theme; but the time was not lost, either by Paul or this newly converted family; the home life was being permeated with Jesus, and their faith and practice was taking solid root in preparation for coming trials.

And trial soon followed, in a way which none would have divined. The little praying company had been left pretty much alone, and meanwhile they were learning what it was to have the Lord for their God, and to have real and constant answers to their prayers. "It came to pass, as we went to prayer," Luke writes, "a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination met us, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying: The same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the Most High God, which shew unto us the way of salvation."

POSSESSION BY THE DEVIL

was not confined to apostolic times. We see many instances of it. There are those so possessed with the spirit of lying that it is impossible to any but God to discover when they speak the truth. There are those who still are possessed with a spirit of an unclean devil (Luke 4: 33) driven in spite of themselves into thoughts, words, looks and actions of uncleanness. There are others who are possessed by a spirit of blasphemy, others, through strong drink or opium, put themselves under a power stronger than themselves, and thus become possessed by it. Thank God, there is deliverance. "The Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1 John 3: 8).

It must have been most painful to Paul to hear the truth of his message proclaimed by this poor possessed one; he would rather have had no herald. "Why did he not immediately cast out this evil spirit?" some would ask. "Had he not received the commission to cast out devils?" Yes, surely; but so he had the commission in common with other believers, to preach the Gospel to every creature, and yet was forbidden at this very time to preach the Word in Asia. God gives particular, as well as general, directions to all His children, who let themselves be guided by Him. After many days, "Paul being grieved, turned and said to the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out the same hour." No one could doubt the deliverance of the poor girl; it was a glorious triumph of God over Satan; and no doubt the little company of the disciples rejoiced exceedingly.

INTERESTED MOTIVES.

But there were those who were far from rejoicing. The poor girl's masters were spiritualists, who made use of her as a medium by which they might deal with familiar spirits (Deut. 18: 11). Just as the fortune-tellers of our own time make gain through the superstition of the people, so did these men of Philippi. There is no doubt that some events were really foretold by this possessed girl, and thus she got a name, and her masters made a fortune, trading upon the power which the devil had over his victim. It did not answer their purpose for the devil to be cast out, and these merchants of iniquity began the persecution against Paul and Silas. Just as now it does not answer the purpose of some of the legislators in England to make laws which will protect the virtue of some poor unprotected girls, it does not answer the purpose of the government in Switzerland to protect the Salvation Army which rescues drunkards, and lessens the audiences at the dancing saloons and cabarets. It does not answer the purpose of men who themselves live lives of sin, to let sinners be rescued to any great extent.

When these men "saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the market-place unto the rulers." There stood the arrested men of God, and the charge brought against them was simply this, "These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city." Alas! that should be counted such an injury to the city! Alas! that the introduction of Jesus should be counted a misfortune. Yet so it was. They "teach us customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans." What customs? To acknowledge their Creator, to renounce sin, to believe in Jesus to the saving of their souls! These were the customs dangerous to the course of this world, and these ever will be so. Let no man think, when he goes on a message for his Master in the power of the Holy Ghost, that all will go smoothly. Wherever the kingdom of Satan begins to fall, there the opposition will commence. Liquor-sellers, keepers of gambling dens, dancing saloons, and dens of infamy will soon find some very plausible reason why such preaching is dangerous. The multitude, always ready to repeat any popular cry, "rose up together against them; and the magistrates rent off their clothes, and commanded to beat them." This command was obeyed in no sparing manner; and finally they cast them into prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks. A grand opportunity to manifest of what spirit they were! A glorious chance to show forth the real spirit of Christ! In the prison they had an opportunity to preach the Gospel by an object lesson, and we shall see this opportunity was not lost.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Gordon Pasha has Arrived in Egypt. His instructions are to effect a complete evacuation of the Soudan, inclusive of Khartoum. It is asserted that General Gordon is opposed to the evacuation, believing that it would entail less expense of life and money to hold the Soudan than to hold Egypt with El Mahdi occupying the Soudan. The Khedive has appointed him Governor of the Soudan with full powers, and has strongly advised him to take measures to secure the safety of civilians and Europeans. General Gordon, on his arrival, visited the Khedive and held a conference with Sir Evelyn Baring, the British Minister, Nubar Pasha, the Egyptian Prime-Minister, and General Evelyn Wood, commander of the English troops in Egypt. General Wood, after parting with General "Chinese" Gordon, likened him to the Chevalier Bayard, "without fear and without reproach." Sir Evelyn Baring has given General Gordon both a military and diplomatic mission, with indefinite orders, which he is at liberty to modify as emergencies arise. General Gordon is reported to have said in an interview at Cairo that he advises retaining the control of the Soudan if England is willing to first pay for its conquest and then govern it with a firm and judicious hand. Rumors are in circulation that General Gordon will find the sheiks and the people in a different mood from that of his former experience. The tribes between Suakim and Berber, from whom General Gordon expected a warm welcome and safe escort to Khartoum, are fiercely hostile.

The Garrison at Khartoum Still Holds out in spite of the approach of El Mahdi and disaffection among the troops. Colonel Coetlogon, who is in command, reports himself well supplied with provisions. If the town is evacuated there will be beside the army 25,000 people who must quit the town. The total number of soldiers in Khartoum aggregates 6100, of whom 2000 are Chaggias, who are known to be disaffected. The black troops are also unreliable, and the whole garrison is in a state of demoralization on account of long arrears of pay. There are only two small steamers which can navigate the river to Berber, and it is evident that the evacuation of Khartoum would take months to accomplish. Meanwhile the rebel forces are daily increasing at all points south of the town. It is also reported that a number of rebels are coming in the direction of Khartoum from the west.

No Open Declaration of War between France and China has yet been made. There is considerable apprehension on the part of foreign residents, however, that it is inevitable. China is placing large forces at various posts on the Tonquin frontier. A telegram from Hong Kong, dated January 25th, says: "Serious news comes from the Island of Hainan. The arrival of Chinese troops to protect it from French seizure caused great excitement among the population, especially among the foreign settlers. Those at Hoihou, a port of the island, are daily insulted by the mob and threatened with violence. Placards are everywhere posted calling the people to massacre the foreign devils. Two residents have been stoned, but not seriously injured. A British gunboat lies in the harbor, prepared to render assistance, but as the port is over three miles broad its efforts cannot be effective. The town is quiet, though settlers expect an outbreak. No advance on Bacninh has yet been made."

Nihilism has Broken out in Austria. A telegram from Vienna, dated January 25th, says: "The discovery of a great Socialist plot to murder policemen has caused the greatest excitement here. Detective Bloech, who arrested the murderers of Commissary Klubeck, has himself been murdered. As the police were about to arrest the murderer quite a lively combat ensued. The murderer fired at his assailants four shots from a revolver and threw about handfuls of dynamite cartridges, wounding several lookers-on. The murderer declines to give his name, but declares that he was ordered by a committee to murder policemen. There is no doubt but that there exists a plot, the object of which is the murder of the much hated police officials. On account of the extent of the Socialist conspiracy against the police the government has decided to introduce in Parliament a bill called the 'Socialistengesetz,' after the model of the German act providing for a minor state of siege. The greatest excitement continues. The police believe that the plot proves the existence of an alliance between the Austrian anarchists and the Russian Nihilists."

The Ill-Health of the Aged Emperor of Germany causes concern. His indisposition was caused by a slight cold and hoarseness, which developed at one time alarming symptoms, which have now abated. It is not considered serious, yet it agitates Berlin. The agitation has been increased by the statement of a sentry on duty at the palace, who asserted that he saw "The White Lady," an appearance which superstitious people in Germany declare is always followed by a death in the Imperial family. It cannot be denied that the alleged appearance of the "White Lady" in the old palace on the evening after the festival of the Order of the Black Eagle is much in the minds of the people. The publication of the alleged appearance by the Berlin papers has been officially stigmatized as "indiscreet."

Another Steamship Collision is Reported. On January 25th the ships City of Lucknow and Simla, engaged in the Australian trade, collided in the English Channel, and the Simla was sunk. The Simla was bound for Sydney, New South Wales, and the City of Lucknow was from Adelaide. The collision took place at nine o'clock in the evening off the Isle of Wight. During the collision some of the crew of the Simla got on board the City of Lucknow. Two boats that put off from the latter were swamped by the heavy sea, but the steamer Guernsey saved their occupants. When the Simla was abandoned she had nine feet of water in her hold. The City of Lucknow was seen laying to and burning red lights. It is believed that she is safe. No lives were lost so far as is known.

The Coronation of the new Queen of Madagascar, Ranavalona III., is announced in recent letters from the island. Two thousands persons were present. At the ceremony the Queen and her chief minister made speeches in which they declared that they would not surrender an inch of their country to the French. This defiance, however, makes no impression on the foreign invaders who are pushing their conquests along the coast. The French admiral reports that he has two companies of Creole troops, from the Isle of Bourbon, in the field, who are rendering good service. One of them was stationed at Tamatave and the other at Majunga. The latter had repulsed a second attack of the Hovas upon Majunga. News has been received of the bombardment by the French of the town of Mahanor, on the east coast of Madagascar, occupied largely by English residents. Two hundred shells were thrown, but beyond the killing of a pig and the wounding of another no damage was done. When the United States steamer Brooklyn was at Tamatave the captain intended to visit the town, but, as he was prevented from landing in his own boat, he declined landing in a French boat which was tendered him.

In Madagascar the Vice of Drunkenness has attained deplorable proportions. The Rev. G. A. Shaw, the missionary arrested by the French admiral, has written to the Pall Mall Gazette a description of his preaching tours in the island. He states that more than 400,000 gallons of rum are imported in one year to the eastern coast of the island, and this is retailed at twelve cents a quart. In the hamlets along the coast if the traveller arrives late he will be distressed and horrified to find that the demon of the rum-barrel has been before him, and the people are all more or less under its influence. "Frequently," says the missionary, "have I entered a village after sundown only to find every person in it drunk, and even the little children staggering in their play round the fire or in the moonlight. In the village to which I have conducted you there were on my first visit but six houses, each one of which was supplied with a large stock of rum; and while I sat at my evening meal a young urchin of perhaps ten or eleven years came in with a small piece of silver, which he tendered for the purchase of this vile spirit, and had I not been present I have not the least doubt the man would have supplied this child at his request. But what can the missionary do against this powerful agent for evil, introduced in European vessels by professedly Christian men, to the complete destruction of all morality among these ignorant natives? Not only are the people being ruined in body and soul, but they are becoming so debauched that they cultivate barely sufficient rice to supply their most pressing wants.

Herr Lasker's Body was Received with honors at Bremerhaven on January 25th. Herr Baumbach, a member of the German Reichstag, welcomed home the body, and passed a glowing eulogy upon Herr Lasker's activity and work in the interest of freedom and right. He praised his unselfishness, which had served us as an example to all popular representatives. He also thanked the Germans in America for the honors that had been paid to the deceased. The coffin was placed on a catafalque which was decorated with flowers. Herr Lasker's brother and brother-in-law and several hundred mourners grouped around the catafalque, and the procession marched to the railway station. The vessels in the harbor and the public buildings of Bremerhaven displayed flags at half-mast. Deputations of friends and relatives escorted the body to Berlin.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Commenced their mission on January 23d in another London district—that of Stratford-le-Bow. Although a hurricane prevailed, some six thousand people were present and joined in the hymns and prayers. Mr. Moody, in his address to the multitude, said it was very encouraging to see so many people come out in the storm, and he hoped that the mission would achieve a great success in that district. They met with much success in their mission at Battersea. The people living by the Hall proved in the heartiest possible manner that they could appreciate to the full the services of the American evangelists. Neighboring ministers of all denominations were in full sympathy with the work, and together with members of their churches rendered hearty and valuable assistance. Mr. Moody was absent one day, suffering from a severe neuralgic attack, but was able to conduct the services on the following day. He says that nowhere have they had greater blessings.

THE story of the life of Francis Murphy, whose portrait appears this week on the frontispiece, is well and widely known. It has been published in many places, and has been told by himself, with much humor and pathos, on hundreds of platforms. It will, therefore, be necessary here only to briefly recount the principal facts and explain the incidents depicted on the frontispiece.

Francis Murphy was born on April 24th, 1836, in the County of Wexford, Ireland, and is now in his forty-eighth year. He is the youngest of a family of seven children. When quite a lad Francis Murphy left Ireland for America. During the voyage he had made the acquaintance of some other young Irish adventurers, and when they arrived at the port of New York they all went together to a hotel, where suitable rooms were found, and, unfortunately, an abundance of too congenial companionship. For a whole week after their arrival they indulged, without restraint, in a continued course of dissipation, and then, their money all gone, the landlord, who, as a matter of business, had been exceedingly polite, without further ceremony turned them out of doors.

Without home or friends, for three more weeks Francis Murphy, by turning the contents of his trunks into money, was able to continue in a career of inebriety. Not only was his money gone, but at the end of this time everything he had brought with him from across the ocean had also passed out of his possession. His situation was a most wretched one, and, as he began to realize the fact, he saw the urgent necessity for some way of escape. But the prospect was very gloomy, and he was exceedingly depressed. Becoming, of necessity, quite sobered, he sought the interest and influence of several persons, and started

IN SEARCH OF A SITUATION.

He was successful, but his drunken habits speedily ended that employment. In obedience to the advice of a friend, he concluded to go to Quebec, Canada, in the hope of breaking away from his ruinous companionships, and seeking anew the means of a respectable livelihood. But success did not seem to smile upon him, and at times he trembled on the very margin of despair. His scanty funds were now nearly exhausted, and he resolved to go to Montreal and seek employment. Soon after his arrival he obtained a situation at a hotel, which, at least for a time, satisfied his necessities, if not, indeed, his tastes. At the end of two years, however, he was finally obliged to relinquish it on account of his drinking habits.

He now returned to the State of New York, where he was compelled to engage in farm-work. His duties were arduous, and his remuneration scanty. Nevertheless, through unflagging industry, both at his labor and in his attempts to subdue his craving for strong drink, he realized a measure of success.

At the age of eighteen he had to some extent succeeded in overcoming his appetite for strong drink, and was living a sober and circumspect life, and, falling in love with an intelligent and attractive young lady, about a year younger than himself, he won her hand, and subsequently married her. On the outbreak of the war he enlisted in the New York Volunteers, and served all through the war.

HOTEL KEEPING.

At the conclusion of the war he joined his brother in running an hotel in Portland, Me. Before undertaking the business he thought he would like to consult his wife, yet, with the full determination that even if she did not indorse his project, he would take it up, nevertheless. Upon being informed of the proposal, Mrs. Murphy said, "I would sooner beg in the city for a living, than have you keep an hotel." In course of a short time the establishment was started, and a most strenuous effort was made to conduct it with respectability; but that Mr. Murphy, with his propensities, could not do. In the progress of time the elder brother, becoming weary of the business, withdrew in favor of Francis, who now became the sole proprietor. His friendliness and geniality were proverbial; his success was assured, and he became increasingly prosperous.

For about five years Mr. Murphy continued in the proprietorship of the Bradley Hotel. But during this time he fell under the repeated assaults of the demon of strong drink. The habit grew with frightful velocity, and he rapidly sank from a position of prosperity and comparative opulence to one of bankruptcy, both moral and financial. Habits of self-indulgence were followed by neglect of business, and he found his old patrons leaving him one after another, until at length his affairs became hopelessly involved. For a year he continued drinking desperately, became reckless, and was a heavy burden both to his family and to society.

A PATHETIC CONFESSION.

Detailing his experiences as an inebriate, Mr. Murphy has said: "I lost everything I possessed in this world in the city of Portland. On the night of September 25th, 1869, I was a bankrupt, without a dollar, and, I think I can say, without a friend. When misfortune came my friends passed away. I then kept on drinking, trying thereby to forget the sorrows that had come upon me. I did not care much whether I lived or died. Even the men who were in the same business I had followed, and who had been on the best terms with me, gave me the cold shoulder."

ARRESTED AND SENT TO JAIL.

Some persons thought that the best thing they could do for him and his family would be to have him arrested and sent to the county jail for reformation. They applied for a warrant, and he was incarcerated. While he was there he was visited by Captain Cyrus Sturtivant, who was in the habit of visiting the jail to endeavor to reclaim the prisoners. Captain Sturtivant pleaded with him and prayed with him in his cell (see frontispiece). The effort was blessed, and Mr. Murphy rose from his knees saying, "God helping me, I will make another effort to become a sober man."

Captain Sturtivant, with others, became deeply interested in the case of Mr. Murphy. He was well known, and many prayers had ascended in his behalf; many visited him and encouraged him, and his wife was often with him. One day, it was Sunday, August 15th, 1870, he was visited by his friend and by his devoted wife and children. And these, in the anxiety of their souls, accompanied him to his cell, there to sympathize with and cheer him in his desires to attain to firm and deep resolves against his former mode of life.

The worship of God now recommenced in the cell. We will give the occurrences of the brief but eventful service in Mr. Murphy's own words: "Captain Sturtivant was close by my side. He placed his arm about my neck and said, 'Mr. Murphy, give your heart to Christ, and all will be well with you!' In a little while my wife was by my side, with the children. I hardly dared to look to heaven; but a ray of hope came to my poor aching heart, and then, with my dear suffering wife and children, we all knelt down together upon the cold, dark prison floor, and supplicated God, for Christ's sake, to make manifest His saving mercy and triumphant grace. The work was then and there accomplished. I arose from my knees with an evidence in my soul that God had accepted and saved me."

BEGINS TO SPEAK ON TEMPERANCE.

Having been set free on October 31th, 1870, the Temperance Crusaders of Portland took Mr. Murphy by the hand, and frequently referred to him as an example of what could be done by prayerful efforts on behalf of lost and dissipated men. He at once commenced a Christian life by setting an example of piety at home. Family prayer was regularly conducted, and it was a convincing evidence of the power of divine grace to see the once notorious profligate sitting at his own fireside reading the Bible to his children (see frontispiece).

He was induced by some temperance friends to speak at a temperance meeting one evening. It was his maiden speech, and characterized by so much earnestness, humor, and pathos, that he was cordially congratulated upon the effort. The earnest solicitations of his friends resulted in his relinquishing a situation he had obtained as bookkeeper, in order to devote himself to the work of lecturing upon the evils and dangers of strong drink.

His faithful and devoted wife died in 1870, and during her illness he was very poor. He had no money wherewith to buy either medicines or food, yet, as he thankfully acknowledges, God provided both by the instrumentality of Christian people. When it became evident that Mrs. Murphy could not recover, she was told that nothing more could be done for her. Turning to her husband, she said in a pathetic mutter, "Never mind about me; I'm quite satisfied, for God has saved you!" Her dying message was, "Keep the children together, and meet me in heaven."

On April 3d, 1871, he delivered his first temperance lecture in Portland to a full house. From that time to the present he has been almost constantly engaged in lecturing all over the United States and in Canada with extraordinary success.

THE SMUGGLED WHISKEY.

The following dramatic incident, a picture of which appears in the left panel of the lower portion of the frontispiece, occurred at Fair Point, Lake Chautauqua, where Francis Murphy and Mr. Gough, the veteran orator, were conducting a campaign in the summer of 1877. During a council meeting one day, Dr. Vincent stepped to the front of the platform and carefully unwrapped what proved to be a bottle of ardent spirits. He said it was well-known that the sale of either liquor or tobacco was not permitted on the grounds, and that some nights previously a quantity of whiskey had been confiscated which a person was trying to smuggle in. Those present were at a loss to know what to do with it, but finally appointed Brothers Murphy and Gough a committee to dispose of the same. The services were resumed only to be shortly interrupted by the appearance of the committee in their shirtsleeves, Murphy carrying a shovel and Gough two bottles of whiskey, which he placed on the desk.

When near the close of a short, thrilling speech, Mr. Gough by an accidental gesture swept one of the bottles to the floor. Mr. Murphy at once demolished it with his heel. He then knocked the remaining bottle from the desk, and served it in a like manner. There was the most intense excitement among the audience of several thousands. "Now," said Murphy, in stentorian tones, of the rest." There was a rush to the rear of the platform, where the two had dug the grave. One after another Mr. Gough tossed about twenty bottles of the seized liquor to the ground, while on the descent of each Mr. Murphy, swinging his shovel, and with every crashing blow giving utterance to some genial expression. "Come, Johnnie," he said to Mr. Gough, "and take a hand." After they had all been disposed of in this manner, the broken glass was shovelled into the trench. The earth was replaced, the surrounding crowd sang an appropriate verse, and the interrupted services were resumed.

COME TO THE BURIAL

SUNDAY MORNING BREAKFASTS to the destitute proved to be a most valuable accessory to Mr. Murphy's work in Philadelphia. They were given in the commodious hall in the annexe of the Academy of Fine Arts, and at eight o'clock on Sunday mornings hundreds of hungry guests might be seen hastening thither. They were received and quietly seated by a competent corps of ushers, and at the appointed time the breakfast, consisting of hot coffee and sandwiches, a hymn being sung and a prayer offered, a force of volunteer waiters distributed large white mugs among the waiting visitors, which were quickly filled with fragrant coffee, fully flavored with milk and sugar, and then the guests received a sandwich, and the feast began. Our picture in the right-hand corner of the lower portion of the frontispiece represents one of these free breakfasts.

VISIT TO ENGLAND.

In the first week of August, 1881, Mr. Francis Murphy, accompanied by his son Edward, set sail for Great Britain, and arrived there on the 18th of the same month. On the 27th he received a most cordial welcome at Hoxton Hall, the headquarters of the Blue Ribbon Army in England, with which the name of Mr. William Noble is so honorably identified. The noble building was crowded in every part, and on the platform were representatives of the leading temperance societies and the Christian press, and many others.

In England Mr. Francis Murphy conducted campaigns of longer or shorter duration in the following cities and towns of the United Kingdom: Bolton, Burslem, Stockton, Sunderland, Forfar, N.B., Dundee (where Provost Moncur enthusiastically identified himself with the movement), Manchester, Dublin, Perth, Stirling, Montrose, Brechin, Aberdeen, Norwich, and Edinburgh. Mr. Murphy responded to a pressing invitation to visit Lord Kinnaird, when two of his lordship's daughters adopted the blue ribbon. He also spoke to a crowded audience in the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London. The numerical result of these visits is estimated at no less than a net gain of nearly 200,000 signers to the pledge, and the adoption of the ribbon in Scotland alone by 300,000 persons more.

A LIQUOR DEALER OUTWITTED.

At Forfar, Scotland, one half the inhabitants are said to have signed the pledge during Mr. Murphy's mission. It had a considerable effect on the business of the liquor dealers, one of whom, more enterprising than the others, endeavored to check the movement. He made it known that he would give a glass of whiskey free to every member of the Blue Ribbon Army who presented himself. The Forfar Evening Telegraph of December 28th, 1881, thus describes the result: "Some of the real 'drouths' of the place got word of the liquor dealer's offer, and with the waggishness characteristic of experienced topers they resolved to get a free dram. A milliner's shop was visited, and a quantity of blue ribbon purchased, and cutting it up in lengths the 'drouths' decorated themselves, and presented their credentials at the bar. True to his word the liquor dealer exchanged his whiskey for the blue ribbon, and soon had his window decorated with what he called 'broken pledges.' Meanwhile the 'drouths' obtained another blue ribbon and exchanged it for whiskey again. At length the liquor dealer detected the trick, and then it was admitted by the 'drouths,' who enjoyed the liquor dealer's chagrin and mortification.

DUNDEE.

In December, 1881, Mr. Murphy was in Dundee, where the first man to put on the blue ribbon was the Provost of the city; and on the first night of the meetings ten volunteer clerks were kept busy until a late hour entering the names of persons who came to sign the pledge. A daily noon prayer-meeting was established in the city, and was largely attended. A British journal, writing of the work in Dundee in February, 1882, said: "Mr. F. Murphy's work in Dundee has been marvellous. In a population of 200,000, no less than 32,000 have newly signed the pledge, and above 45,000 put on the blue ribbon. The month's campaign closed on January 30th, by a large social meeting in the Drill Hall. There were more than 3000 persons present.

MANCHESTER.

From Dundee Mr. Murphy went to Manchester, the centre of the cotton trade, where large numbers of inveterate inebriates may be found. At his first meeting 500 persons signed the pledge and 900 persons put on the blue ribbon. He remained there two weeks, during which 20,800 persons were enrolled in the blue ribbon army.

DUBLIN

was the scene of the next crusade, which opened on March 4th. The Dublin Daily Express says: "One of Mr. Murphy's first converts in Dublin is a blind gentleman whom many temperance workers had frequently tried to persuade to sign the pledge. He attended one of the meetings, and after hearing some of the addresses he was so impressed that he was immediately induced to come forward as an advocate of temperance. He signed the pledge, and before leaving the building he was instrumental in getting a lady with whom he was acquainted also to enrol her name. This woman, it appeared, is the mother of a large family, and for a length of time past she has been in the habit of drinking secretly, not only in her own house, but in the house of her son, where she was able to get the drink secreted, without the knowledge of her husband. Since she signed the pledge it has been reported that she has kept it faithfully, and her husband now enjoys peace and comfort.

"One evening the meeting was presided over by Surgeon-General Moffatt, and one of the great features of the proceedings was the appearance on the platform of two gentlemen who had been engaged up till the previous day in the liquor traffic, but who now came forward to announce that for the future they would turn to some other business, close their present establishments, and do their utmost to spread the temperance cause. Their statements were received with great enthusiasm by the crowded audience."

in Scotland, a monster meeting was held in the City Hall. A town councillor presided, who said: "In that hall during the last two months they had held regular meetings, with an average attendance each night of 1800 people. As the result of these meetings 2400 people had signed the pledge, and nearly 10,000 had donned the little badge of blue. They greatly rejoiced at the great impetus the temperance movement was receiving at the present time throughout Scotland, and they hoped it would move on until it moved the drink traffic out of their beloved Scotland."

IN ABERDEEN,

during a four weeks' crusade of seventy meetings 99,000 persons attended, 15,000 pledges were taken, and 25,000 persons put on the blue ribbon. Daily prayer-meetings were also established there, and were largely attended. In Glasgow and Paisley like success attended the meetings.

AT NORWICH

Mr. Murphy received an ovation, which the local papers describe as a royal welcome, the whole city turning out to see the monster procession which accompanied him. The Norwich Mercury, speaking of his reception, says: "Mr. Murphy was met on the platform by Mr. Councillor White, the Chairman of the Committee, and by the local clergy and gentry. Accompanying Mr. Murphy were his daughter and the Rev. J. B. Inglis, of Dundee. An open carriage had been provided, drawn by four gray horses, with postilions in blue jackets and wearing blue ribbon on their hats; and in this carriage Mr. Murphy and a few friends at once took their seats, and the procession was formed. The wearers of the blue ribbon were largely reinforced 'for this occasion only' by some well-known liquor-sellers and devotees of Sir John Barleycorn; but their attempt to ridicule the affair proved a complete failure." The St. Andrew's Hall that evening was filled to overflowing, and many went away disappointed at not getting in.

We have no space to follow Mr. Murphy's campaign in Great Britain to its close, but the files of English journals prove that the enthusiasm continued unabated, and throughout the land such a wave of total abstinence zeal was produced as had never been known before.

We may remark that there is no likelihood of the movement in Great Britain losing its strength.

THE BLUE RIBBON GOSPEL ARMY, which has been organized by the Rev. M. Baxter with vast labor and at an enormous expense, the bulk of which he has defrayed from his own private income, is doing a magnificent work at all its stations. It is eminently successful, because its vital principle is that temperance reformation in the individual, to be permanent, must be founded on conversion to Christ, and in God's strength alone is there for the drunkard any hope of fidelity to total abstinence.

In August of last year Mr. Murphy returned to America, and on September 25th was tendered him at a monster meeting in Cooper Union. It is doubtful if ever the immense hall was so thronged before. The seats were chiefly occupied by ladies, while men crowded the aisles, corridors, and every place from which a view of the platform could be obtained, or the words of the speakers heard. Chief Justice Noah Davis, of the Supreme Court, presided, and in his address of welcome gave a sketch of Mr. Murphy's life, portraying its lights and shadows with considerable feeling. When Mr. Murphy stepped forward to make his response the audience broke forth into long-continued applause. Handkerchiefs were waved, and three hearty cheers were given. In a broken voice Mr. Murphy expressed his gratitude for the generous reception given him. His absence abroad, he said, had not weakened but had strengthened his love for the land of his adoption. He expected to devote the remainder of his life to Gospel temperance work.

SPLENDORS OF ORTHODOXY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 3, 1884.

"Ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls."—JEREMIAH 6 : 16.

Ministers in a Fog—Advanced Thought—A Continent of Mud—The Bible Inspired and Protected—The Criticisms of Modern Exegetes—Events Recorded not Approved—Trivial Errors of Copyists—The Road to Atheism—The Achievements of Orthodoxy—Heterodoxy Barren—The Sure Foundation of a Church—Hell-Fire Corner—The Character of Orthodoxy—The Certitudes—The Palace and Penitentiary—The Orthodox Death-bed—Believing the Bible in Spots—Isabella Graham's Will.

A GREAT London fog has come down upon some of the ministers and some of the churches in the shape of what is called "advanced thought" in Biblical interpretation. All of them, and without any exception, deny the full inspiration of the Bible. Genesis is an allegory, and there are many myths in the Bible, and they philosophize and guess and reason and evolute until they land in a great continent of mud, from which, I fear, for all eternity they will not be able to extricate themselves.

The Bible is not only divinely inspired, but it is in its present shape. You could as easily, without detection, take from the writings of Shakespeare Hamlet, and institute in place thereof Alexander Smith's drama, as at any time during the last fifteen hundred years a man could have made any important change in the Bible without immediate detection. If there had been an element of weakness or of deception, or of disintegration the Book would long ago have fallen to pieces. If there had been one loose brick or cracked casement in this castellated truth, surely the bombardment of eight centuries would have discovered and broken through that imperfection. The fact that the Bible stands intact, notwithstanding all the furious assaults on all sides upon it, is proof to me that it is a miracle, and every miracle is of God.

"But," says some one, "while we admit the Bible is of God, it has not been understood until our time." My answer is, that if the Bible be a letter from God, our Father, to man, His child, is it not strange that that letter should have been written in such a way that it should allow seventy generations to pass away and be buried before the letter could be understood? That would be a very bright father who should write a letter for the guidance and intelligence of his children, not understandable until a thousand years after they were buried and forgotten! While as the years roll on other beauties and excellencies will unfold from the Scriptures, that the Bible is such a dead failure that all the Christian scholars for eighteen hundred years were deceived in regard to vast reaches of its meaning, is a demand upon my credulity so great that if I found myself at all disposed to yield to it I should to-morrow morning apply at Bloomingdale Insane Asylum as unfit to go alone.

Who make up this precious group of

to whom God has made especial revelation in our time of that which He tried to make known thousands of years ago and failed to make intelligible? Are they so distinguished for unworldliness, piety, and scholarship that it is to be expected that they would have been chosen to fix up the defective work of Moses and Isaiah and Paul and Christ? Is it all possible? I wonder on what mountain these were transfigured? I wonder what star pointed down to their birthplace? Was it the north-star, or the evening star, or the Dipper? As they came through and descended to our world did Mars blush or Saturn lose one of its rings? When I find these modern wiseacres attempting to improve upon the work of the Almighty and to interlard it with their wisdom and to suggest prophetic and apostolic errata, I am filled with a disgust insufferable. Advanced thought, which proposes to tell the Lord what He ought to have said thousands of years ago, and would have said if He had been as wise as His nineteenth century critics! All this comes of living away back in the eternities instead of 1884. I have two wonders in regard to these men. The first one is how the Lord got along without them before they were born. The second wonder is how the Lord will get along without them after they are dead.

"But," say some, "do you really think the Scriptures are INSPIRED THOUGHT?"

Yes, either as history or as guidance. Gibbon and Josephus and Prescott record in their histories a great many things they did not approve of. When George Bancroft puts upon his brilliant historical page the account of an Indian massacre, does he approve of that massacre? There are scores of things in the Bible which neither God nor inspired men sanctioned. Either as history or as guidance the entire Bible was inspired of God.

"But," says some one, "don't you think that the copyists might have made mistakes in transferring the divine words from one manuscript to another?" Yes, no doubt there were such mistakes; but they no more affect the meaning of the Scriptures than the misspelling of a word or the ungrammatical structure of a sentence in a last will and testament affect the validity or the meaning of that will. All the mistakes made by the copyists in the Scriptures do not amount to any more importance than the difference between your spelling in a document the word forty, forty or fourty. This book is the last will and testament of God to our lost world, and it bequeaths everything in the right way, although human hands may have damaged the grammar or made unjustifiable interpolation.

These men who pride themselves in our day on being advanced thinkers in Biblical interpreation will all of them end in atheism, if they live long enough, and I declare here to-day they are doing more in the different denominations of Christians, and throughout the world, for damaging Christianity and hindering the cause of the world's betterment than five thousand Robert Ingersolls could do. That man who stands inside a castle is far more dangerous if he be an enemy than five thousand enemies outside the castle. Robert G. Ingersoll assails the castle from the outside. These men who pretend to be advanced thinkers in all the denominations are fighting the truth from the inside, and trying to shove back the bolts and swing open the gates.

Now, I am in favor of the greatest freedom of religious thought and discussion. I would have as much as for orthodoxy. If I should change my theories of religion I should preach them out and out, but not in this building, for this was erected by people who believe in an entire Bible, and it would be dishonest for me to promulgate sentiments different from those for which this building was put up. When we enter any denomination as ministers of religion we take a solemn vow that we will preach the sentiments of that denomination. If we change our theories, as we have a right to change them, then there is a world several thousand miles in circumference, and there are hundreds of halls and hundreds of academies of music where we can ventilate our sentiments.

I remember that in these cities, in time of political agitation, there are the Republican headquarters and the Democratic headquarters. Suppose I should go into one of these headquarters pretending to be in sympathy with their work, at the same time electioneering for the opposite party. I would soon find that the centrifugal force was greater than the centripetal! Now, if a man enters a denomination of Christians, taking a solemn oath, as we all do, that we will promulgate the theories of that denomination, and then the man shall proclaim some other theory, he has broken his oath, and he is an out-and-out perjurer. Nevertheless, I declare for largest liberty in religious discussion. I would no more have the present attempt to rear a monument to Thomas Paine in New York interfered with than I would have interfered with the lifting of the splendid monument to Washington in Wall Street. Largest liberty for the body, largest liberty for the mind, largest liberty for the soul.

THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF ORTHODOXY.

Now, I want to show you, as a matter of advocacy for what I believe to be the right, the splendors of orthodoxy. Many have supposed that its disciples are people of flat skulls, and no reading, and behind the age, and the victims of gullibility. I shall show you that the word orthodoxy stands for the greatest splendors outside of heaven. Behold the splendors of its achievements. All the missionaries of the Gospel the world round are men who believe in an entire Bible. Call the roll of all the missionaries who are to-day enduring sacrifices in the ends of the earth for the cause of religion and the world's betterment, and they all believe in an entire Bible. Just as soon as a missionary begins to doubt whether there ever was a Garden of Eden, or whether there is any such thing as future punishment, he comes right home from Beyrout or Madras, and goes into the insurance business! All the missionary societies of this day are officered by orthodox men, and are supported by orthodox churches.

Orthodoxy, beginning with the Sandwich Islands, has captured vast regions of barbarism for civilization, while heterodoxy has to capture the first square inch. Blatant for many years in Great Britain and the United States, and strutting about with a peacockian braggadocio it has yet to capture the first continent, the first State, the first township, the first ward, the first space of ground as big as you could cover with the small end of a sharp pin. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the Protestant churches of America were built by people who believed in an entire Bible. The pulpit now may preach some other Gospel, but it is a heterodox gun on an orthodox carriage. The foundations of all the churches that are of very great use in this world to-day were laid by men who believed the Bible from lid to lid, and if I cannot take it in that way I will not take it at all; just as if I received a letter that pretended to come from a friend, and part of it was his and part somebody else's, and the other party somebody else's, and it was a sort of literary mongrelism, I would throw the garbled sheets into the waste basket.

THE SURE FOUNDATION.

No church of very great influence to-day but was built by those who believed in an entire Bible. Neither will a church last long built on a part of the Bible. You have noticed, I suppose, that as soon as a man begins to give up the Bible he is apt to preach in some hall, and he has an audience while he lives, and when he dies the church dies. If I thought that this church was built on a quarter of a Bible, or a half of a Bible, or three quarters of a Bible, or ninety-nine one hundredths of a Bible, I would expect it to die when I die; but when I know it is built on the entire Word of God, I know it will last two hundred years after you and I sleep the last sleep. Oh, the splendors of an orthodoxy which, with ten thousand hands and ten thousand pulpits and ten thousand Christian churches, is trying to save the world!

In Music Hall, Boston, for many years stood Theodore Parker battling orthodoxy, giving it, as some supposed at that time, its death wound. He was the most fascinating man I ever heard or ever expect to hear, and I came out from hearing him thinking, in my boyhood way, "Well, that's the death of the Church." On that same street, and not far from being opposite, stood Park Congregational Church, called by its enemies "Hell-fire Corner." Theodore Parker died, and his church died with him; or, if it is in existence, it is so small you cannot see it with the naked eye. Park Congregational Church still stands on "Hell-fire Corner," thundering away the magnificent truths of this glorious orthodoxy just as though Theodore Parker had never lived. All that Boston, or Brooklyn, or New York, or the world ever got that is worth having came through the wide aqueduct of orthodoxy from the throne of God.

Behold the

built by orthodoxy. Who had the greatest human intellect the world ever knew? Paul. In physical stature insignificant; in mind, head and shoulders above all the giants of the age. Orthodox from scalp to heel. Who was the greatest poet the ages ever saw, acknowledged to be so both by infidels and Christians? John Milton, seeing more without eyes than anybody else ever saw with eyes. Orthodox from scalp to heel. Who was the greatest reformer the world has ever seen? so acknowledged by infidels as well as by Christians. Martin Luther. Orthodox from scalp to heel.

Then look at

THE CERTITUDES.

O man, believing in an entire Bible, where did you come from? Answer: "I descended from a perfect parentage in Paradise, and Jehovah breathed into my nostrils the breath of life. I am a son of God." O man, believing in a half-and-half Bible—believing in a Bible in spots, where did you come from? Answer: "It is all uncertain; in my ancestral line away back there was an orang-outang and a tadpole and a polywog, and it took millions of years to get me evoluted." O man, believing in a Bible in spots, where are you going to when you quit this world? Answer: "Going into a great to be, so on into the great somewhere, and then I shall pass through on to the great anywhere, and I shall probably arrive in the nowhere." That is where I thought you would fetch up. O man, believing in an entire Bible, and believing with all your heart, where are you going to when you leave this world? Answer: "I am going to my Father's house; I am going into the companionship of my loved ones who have gone before; I am going to leave all my sins, and I am going to be with God and like God forever and forever." Oh, the glorious certitudes, certainties of orthodoxy!

Behold the splendors of orthodoxy in its announcement of

TWO DESTINIES.

Palace and penitentiary. Palace with gates on all sides through which all may enter and live on celestial luxuries world without end, and all for the knocking and the asking. A palace grander than if all the Alhambras and the Versailles and the Windsor castles and the Winter Gardens and the imperial abodes of all the earth were heaved up into one architectural glory. At the other end of the universe a penitentiary where men who want their sins can have them. Would it be fair that you and I should have our choice of Christ and the palace, and other men be denied their choice of sin and eternal degradation? Palace and penitentiary. The first of no use unless you have the last. Brooklyn and New York would be better places to live in with Raymond Street Jail and the Tombs and Sing Sing, and all the small-pox hospitals emptied on us than heaven would be if there were no hell. Palace and penitentiary. If I see a man with a full bowl of sin, and he thirsts for it, and his whole nature craves it, and he takes hold with both hands and presses that bowl to his lips, and then presses it hard between his teeth, and the draught begins to pour its sweetness down his throat, shall we snatch away the bowl and jerk the man up to the gate of heaven, and push him in if he does not want to go and sit down and sing psalms forever? No. God has made you and me so completely free that we need not go to heaven unless we prefer it. Not more free to soar than free to sink.

Nearly all the heterodox people I know believe all are coming out at the same destiny; without regard to faith or character we are all coming out at the shining gate. There they are, all in glory together. Thomas Paine and George Whitefield, Jezebel and Mary Lyon, Nero and Charles Wesley, Charles Guiteau and James A. Garfield, John Wilkes Booth and Abraham Lincoln—all in glory together! All the innocent men, women, and children who were massacred, side by side with their murderers. If we are all coming out at the same destiny, without regard to character, then it is true. I turn away from such a debauched heaven. Against that cauldron of piety and blasphemy, philanthropy and assassination, self-sacrifice and beastliness, I place the two destines of the Bible forever and forever and forever apart.

Behold also the splendors of the Christian

ORTHODOX DEATH-BEDS.

Those who deny the Bible, or deny any part of it, never die well. They either go out in darkness or they go out in silence portentous. You may gather up all the biographies that have come forth since the art of printing was invented, and I challenge you to show me a triumphant death of a man who rejected the Scriptures, or rejected any part of them. Here I make a great wide avenue. On the one side I put the death-beds of those who believed in an entire Bible. On the other side of that avenue I put the death-beds of those who rejected part of the Bible, or rejected all of the Bible. Now, take my arm and let us pass through this dividing avenue. Look off upon the right side. Here are the death-beds on the right side of this avenue. "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!" "Free grace!" "Glory, glory!" "I am sweeping through the gates washed in the blood of the Lamb!" "The chariots are coming!" "I mount, I fly!" "Wings, wings!" "They are coming for me!" "Peace, be still!" Alfred Cookman's death-bed, Richard Cecil's death-bed, Commodore Foote's death-bed. Your father's death-bed, your mother's death-bed, your sister's death-bed, your child's death-bed. Ten thousand radiant, songful death-beds of those who believed an entire Bible.

Now, take my arm and let us go through that avenue, and look off upon the other side. No smile of hope. No shout of triumph. No face supernaturally illumined. Those who reject any part of the Bible never die well. No beckoning for angels to come. No listening for the celestial escort. Without any exception they go out of the world because they are pushed out; while on the other hand the list of those who believed in an entire Bible and gone out of the world in triumph is a list so long it seems interminable Oh, is not that a splendid influence, this orthodoxy, which makes that which must otherwise be the most dreadful hour of life—the last hour—positively paradisaical?

Young men, old men, middle-aged men, in this contest between orthodoxy and heterodoxy. "Ask for the old paths, walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." But you follow this crusade against any part of the Bible—first of all you will give up Genesis, which is as true as Matthew; then you will give up all the historical parts of the Bible; then after a while you will give up the miracles; then you will find it convenient to give up the Ten Commandments; and then after a while you will wake up in a fountainless, rockless, treeless desert swept of everlasting sirocco. If you are laughed at you can afford to be laughed at for standing by the Bible just as God has given it to you and miraculously preserved it.

Do not jump overoard from the stanch old Great Eastern of old-fashioned orthodoxy until there is something ready to take you up stronger than the fantastic yawl which has painted on the side "Advanced Thought," and which leaks at the prow and leaks at the stern and has a steel pen for one oar and a glib tongue for the other oar, and now tips over this way and then tips over that way, until you do not know whether the passengers will land in the breakers of despair or on the sinking sand of infidelity and atheism.

I am in full sympathy with the advancements of our time, but this world will never advance a single inch beyond this old Bible. God was just as capable of dictating the truth to the prophets and apostles as He is capable of dictating the truth to these modern apostles and prophets. God has not learned anything in a thousand years. He knew just as much when He gave the first dictation as He does now, giving the last dictation, if He is giving any dictation at all. So I will stick to the old paths. Naturally a sceptic, and preferring new things to old, I never so much as this morning felt the truth of the entire Bible, especially as I see into what spectacular imbecility men rush when they try to chop up the Scriptures with the meat-axe of their own preferences, now calling upon philosophy, now calling on the Church, now calling on God, now calling on the devil. I prefer the thick, warm robe of the old religion—old as God—the robe which has kept so many warm amid the cold pilgrimage of this life and amid the chills of death. The old robe rather than the thin, uncertain gauze offered us by these wiseacres who believe the Bible in spots.

On July 27th, 1814, at seventy-two years of age, expired Isabella Graham. She was the most useful woman of her day amid the poor and sick, at the head of the orphan asylums and Magdalen asylums, and an angel of mercy in hospital and reformatory. Dr. Mason, one of the mightest men of his day, said at her funeral that she was mentally and spiritually the most wonderfully endowed person he had ever met. She was an impersonation of the most orthodox orthodoxy. Her last word was peace. As a sublime peroration to my sermon, I will give an extract from her last will and testament, showing how one who believes in an entire Bible may make a glorious exit:

AN EXTRACT FROM A WILL.

"My children and my grandchildren I leave to my covenant God, the God who hath fed me all my life with the bread that perisheth and the bread that never perisheth, who has been a Father to my fatherless children and a husband to their widowed mother thus far. And now receiving my Redeemer's testimony, I set to my seal that God is true; and believing the record of John Wesley that God hath given to me eternal life and this life is in His Son who, through the eternal Spirit, overcomes without spot unto God, and being consecrated a priest forever hath with His own blood entered into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for me. I also believe that He will perfect what concerns me, support and carry me safely through death, and present me to His Father, complete in His own righteousness, without spot or wrinkle. Into the hands of this redeeming God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost I commit my redeemed spirit.—ISABELLA GRAHAM."

Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like hers. "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen and Amen!"

THE OCCUPATIONS, ETC.

A new pamphlet of Dr. Talmage's Sermons, under the above title, is now ready. Among the twenty-six sermons it contains, are those to Lawyers, Doctors, Merchants, Clerks, Commercial Travellers, The Theatrical Profession, and Telegraph Operators. Also Sermons on Business Life, The East Wind, Silver Wings, The Pouting Son, The Ferry-boat of the Jordan, etc. It may be obtained, postage paid, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office for thirty cents.

The Objects at which Freethinkers are Aiming were disclosed at the convention held last week in Boston, Mass. On January 28th a Freethinkers' Association was formed, with by-laws demanding that churches should not be exempt from taxation; that the judicial oath should be abolished; that all laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath and Christian morality should be repealed; that the Bible should be removed from the public schools.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Dying Christian Soldier.—Mr. Jack Said at a recent meeting: "I went recently to see a dying soldier lad. For months back he has been suffering most painfully with consumption of the bones and lungs, yet he never complains. This fact alone is a powerful testimony of the grace of God. Patiently the lad endures the actual physical torture, and what is even more trying to the nerves, the mental weariness incidental to a long sickness. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is sufficient for him at all times."

Three Spanish Evangelists.—Signor Rodriguez says: "Two or three weeks before the Spanish Revolution, a few years ago, I was converted to Christ at a little meeting of earnest Christians. My parents were converted by reading the Gospel of St. John. My mother prayed that her beloved sons might be also converted, and had the great joy of seeing two of her sons working for Christ before her death. Could she rise from the dead, she would see her three sons working together in gathering in souls for our beloved Master. Our work is not connected with any society; our trust is in the Lord and those friends who help us"

Used to the Roar of Niagara.—Mr. MacFarlane related: "I was speaking with a gentleman who had just returned from a visit to Niagara, where he lived in the Clifton Hotel, which is close to the Falls. He asked a waiter, 'Are you not annoyed by the noise of the waterfall?' 'Positively I don't hear it; when I first came here I hardly heard anything for it; now it is quite quiet to me.' Why is this? Because he is accustomed to it. That is the reason Christians are content to sit with folded hands, looking calmly on while so many of their fellows are gliding down the broad road to eternal death. Rouse yourselves, ask God for Christ's sake to give you grace and strength to 'rescue the perishing.'"

A Scotch Pharisee's Folly.—The Rev. Mr. Riddell remarked: "It is saddening to think how obtuse some men and women are to the first principles of the Gospel, even though they sit and listen to a truly earnest evangelical preacher Sunday after Sunday for years. I remember one who had attended all the services during the ministry of the sainted Murray McCheyne, yet had never realized that she was a lost sinner. I was called to her death-bed, where all her children were gathered in much anxiety because, being converted themselves, they knew she was not. I pressed upon her the need of seeking the Saviour before it was too late; but she only replied, 'Well, sir, if every one in Dundee lived as I have done, there would be no need of police.' In this state she passed away, having wilfully closed her eyes to the truth, preferring to trust in her own goodness rather than to the Lord. Oh, that men would ask God to open their eyes to their sinful condition in His sight! How soon would He answer their prayer and lead them to Jesus."

Singular Conversion of a Wicked Officer.—Mr. Ross related: "I heard a military officer testify he was leading a wicked, abominable life, caring nothing but for opportunities to indulge in his evil passions, till he fell off his horse and was so seriously injured that he was confined for some time to his bed. A lady friend visited him, read the Bible, sang hymns, and urged him to give himself to Christ. For a long time no beneficial impression seemed to be made, but one day the lady was going to a prayer-meeting, and said, 'I am going to a meeting where we shall pray for you; won't you pray for yourself as well? I will leave my Bible with you.' When she had gone he took up her Bible, and prayed, 'Oh, Lord! let it open at the verse that will suit me, for Christ's sake.' He opened the Book, and his eye fell on the verse, 'Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool' (Isa. 1: 18), and the next verse, 'If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land.' He thought, 'This is my condition, am I willing?' Then he cried, 'Lord, I am willing; Lord! make me as snow; my sins are flaming like crimson, make me as wool.' His cry was heard, for the Lord opened his eyes and he saw Christ as his Saviour, and realized the power of His precious blood to cleanse from all sin. When his friend returned, he was glorifying God with heart and voice."

A Boy that Couldn't be Killed.—Mr. McFarlane relates: "Last summer a friend and myself were passing from one loch to another one some distance off; neither of us knew the way, but we got a rough-looking boy to guide us. His hair was uncombed, clothing in rags, feet bare, hands brown with peat water, and he was very glad to earn a sixpence. As we walked through the wild picturesque glen, with its overhanging rocks and brawling stream, my friend asked the boy, 'Are you a Christian?' 'Aye, that I am!' 'Well, suppose that rock fell down and killed us, where would you be?' 'That couldn't kill me.' 'Yes it could, your body would be rushed to atoms.' 'My body might be crushed to pieces, but IT'S not me. How can I be killed when I have got everlasting life?' My friend was silenced; the boy had attained to a higher level than himself in the Christian life."

Escape of Entombed Miners.—Mr. Hill Tells of some miners who were intercepted below by a heavy fall of coal, so that they could not get out by the shaft. "There was one man among them who had strong faith in God; he took them into a recess, where they prayed and sang together. Soon their lamp went out for want of oil, but they continued in believing prayer till God brought to the remembrance of the man with strong faith that there was an old disused shaft in another part of the mine, the difficulty being to get there in the dark and to find the opening, which, as it stood, was too small for a man to pass through. He consulted with his mates, and after prayer they decided to try to find it. They went in the direction, and found it almost at once. By a little labor they enlarged the opening, and every man passed through safely, and was taken up the old shaft. God had speedily delivered them in answer to believing prayer in the name of Christ."

A Brave Fireman's Death.—At a Meeting on the Broomielaw, Glasgow, Major Colquhoun said: "Suddenly a cry of 'Fire! fire!' was raised in the darkness of midnight. It was in a town where they use the fire-escape, which is not done here. Shortly after the alarm was given, the engines and escapes were on the spot, but by this time, short as it was, the flames had got the mastery, so that there was no hope of saving the house. It was thought that all had escaped from the building. To the horror of the excited spectators, a face appeared at one of the windows; it was that of a child. In an instant the fire-escape was in position, and a brave fireman soon drove in the window with his axe and saved the child. The next moment it was discovered that a woman was in danger, and she was also saved. Then it was found that four other human beings were in the burning house. There was only one way that they could get from it, and that way was soon ready for them, for the same fireman was soon driving in their window and pulling them out of the fire. By incredible exertions all were at last lowered to the ground amid the plaudits of the people who gathered around. Forgetting the rescuer, they thought only of the rescued. A voice cried out, 'Three cheers for the fireman,' the crowd turned to see the hero of the night, but alas! where was he? Entangled in the network with his belt and axe, he was writhing and struggling to free himself, but could not do it for some time. With a last convulsive effort he was free. Free to do what? To fall a mangled corpse upon the pavement below. He saved others, himself he could not save. Is it any wonder that the country was moved and sorrowed for the death of that brave man? No, it is not; yet when we think of the feeling displayed over that man, we do wonder that the indifference of men to the death of the Lord Jesus who died for them—their ingratitude is such that only the great loving heart of God can pardon them for Christ's sake."

A Sicilian Lady Led to Christ.—Major Colquhoun said: "A few years ago I became acquainted with a young lady living with Christian friends in Paris. Her mother and sister lived in Sicily, and she had come to France to push her way as a governess. Two years since this lady, hearing that I was going to Italy, requested me to visit her mother and sister in Palermo. When I reached that city I remembered my friend's request, and took the first opportunity I could get to call on her relatives. My friend's mother was a fine-looking, elderly lady, who moved in good society, and had seen much of the world. Wearied of its pleasures, she had been seeking rest, but found only sorrow. Her heart opened up to me at once, and I spoke of divine things; our conversation was brief, but it was touching to hear her tell, with tears running down her face, of her concern about her future state. She said, 'When I reached womanhood I believed I found a true friend in a Jesuit father, my confessor; I opened my whole heart to him, but I woke up to the fact that this man was seeking not my soul's salvation, but its damnation. Since then I have distrusted all religious teachers. From the approaches of the priests, knowing them as I do, I shrank with horror, I felt myself a sinner before God. I have cried to heaven for relief, but found none; I have read the New Testament, but no one could explain it to me. I am not ready to die; tell me the way of life.' In that brief hour I preached Christ to her; we asked His blessing and guidance, and I believe that was the moment of conversion for her, when ceasing the struggles of a lifetime, she came to the Saviour's feet."

THE FUTURE TEMPLE.

By Rev. J. R. Graves, LL.D.*

A Temple to be Built—Superior to Solomon's—For all Nations—General Assistance in Building it—What God has Said about the Temple—The Feast without an Antitype—The Shekinah Light—Its Effects on Life and Vegetation.

It is distinctly foretold that Christ, the Archetype of Solomon, will, at the commencement of His reign, build a house that will be far larger and more glorious than the former, or Solomon's (Zech. 6: 12–14). It is the glory of this, the latter or last house, that shall exceed that of the first or former house.

The first thing inaugurated by Christ after the nations have been subdued to His sceptre and the rule of the saints, is the establishment of true religion and a divine system of worship in Jerusalem, the metropolis of this Empire.

If the reader will open to Ezekiel, and read the last verses of chapter 39, he will see that God declares that He will gather the whole house of Israel out of the nations, after they have borne their shame for their trespasses, and that He will plant them in their own land, and that "He will dwell among them," and never more hide His face from them. In the chapter following, the prophet describes with great particularity a temple that is to be built on Mouut Zion in Jerusalem, far superior in to the first temple built by Solomon—indeed, the glorious archetype of that. There are six full chapters given to a description of that one temple and its ordinances. From the dimensions given (Ezek. 40), the court of the temple will be one mile square, covering more than the whole of the present site of Jerusalem, which will bear the name of the "Sanctuary of the Lord's house," in the midst of which this larger and more glorious temple than Solomon's will be built.

Commentators are staggered at its contemplation, and know not what to do with it! They say that its size is against the prophecy being construed literally, and they are free to admit that they know not how to spiritualize it to edification, but they all do so after a fashion.

The description of the dimensions of this temple are as literal as those of the first temple (see 1 Kings, chap. 6), and no indication of a figure, emblem, or symbol in them, and, therefore, it must, by all the laws of interpretation, be understood literally. It is to profane the record to attempt to allegorize it, and no sense can be made by so doing.

We can scarce conceive anything farther from facts and reason than the suggestion of Dr. Clark, that this was but an outline of the first temple, by which the Jews were to rebuild after their return from Babylon! Could they not rebuild by the original pattern given by God in 1 Kings 6? And then it is not a duplicate of that, but different and much larger. For this is to be the "house of worship which declaration of itself proves that it does not allude to Solomon's temple restored, since that never was. It is computed that more than a million of Jews were wont to assemble at Jerusalem during their great annual festivities, as that of the Tabernacles, but who can estimate the countless multitudes gathered out of all nations, peoples, kindreds and tribes who will come up to worship the Messiah and keep the antitypical feast of the tabernacles? Grant the site of the old city is insufficient to contain the court of this Temple, is it not foretold that there will be physical changes made, enlarging the surface of the Mount (Zech. 14 : 10), and then the whole enlarged area will be occupied by the court and temple, and be the sanctuary of God.

Now let us see what God hath said about a temple, larger and more glorious than that of Solomon's, being built in Jerusalem, after the Advent of Christ, and by Christ after the restoration of all Israel, as well as Judah: "And speak unto him, saying, thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is The BRANCH: and He shall grow up out of His place, and He shall build the temple of the Lord: Even He shall build the temple of the Lord; and He shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a priest upon His throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both" (Zech. 6 : 12–14).

Hiram, King of Tyre, and his Tyrians, built the temple for Solomon, and so will the nations which are afar off assist in building this last temple. "And they that are far off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord, and ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you. And this shall come to pass, if ye will diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God" (Zech. 6 : 15).

Isaiah thus speaks of it: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills: and all nations shall flow into it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (2 : 2, 3).

Zechariah foretells its use for all nations, while Solomon's, as we have seen, was but for the Jews only: "And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. . . . In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord: and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts; and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and seethe therein: and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts" (Zech. 14 : 16, 20, 21).

here alluded to is the only one that has had no antitype as yet, and will be fulfilled when the representatives of all nations shall assemble upon Mount Zion to worship in this house, the glory of which will far exceed that of the first temple. "For thus saith the Lord of hosts: Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the Desire of all nations shall come: and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts. The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts. The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts; and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts" (Hag. 2 : 6–9).

It is concerning this last house that God says: "And He said unto me, Son of man, the place of my throne, and the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever, and my holy name, shall the house of Israel no more defile, neither they, nor their kings, by their whoredom, nor by the carcasses of their kings in their high places" (Ezek. 43 : 7). This cannot be said of any one of the three Temples, for they did defile them all, and the last one they made "a den of thieves."

But the most marvellous manifestations of God's presence and favor to this city is yet to be mentioned. Isaiah tells us that when the inhabitants of Jerusalem shall have been restored and purged from all their iniquities, that the Lord—"And the Lord will create upon every dwelling place f Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night: for upon all the glory shall be a defence. And there shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the day-time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain" (Isa. 4 : 5, 6).

And will not this

that will rest, day and night, over the city like the pillar of cloud that accompanied the camp of Israel through the desert—the shadow of a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night—explain these several passages?

This is the glory time, and the holy hill which the Psalmist so often refers to. Let the reader see 2 : 6–15; 143 : 3; 24 : 3; and read especially Ps. 87; and the holy mountain of the prophets. Isa. 11 : 9 and 65 : 25; 56 : 7; 57 : 13; 65 : 11; Joel 3 : 17. "Thus saith the Lord; I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem; and Jerusalem shall be called A city of truth; and the mountains of the Lord of hosts, Thy holy mountain" (Zech. 8 : 3). May it not be that the wonderful changes wrought upon the climate of Judea and the animal and vegetable kingdom, and the prolongation of human life which the prophet likens unto the creation of a new heaven and new earth, when he shall create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy, can all be attributed to the effects of this Shekinah-light and presence of the Lord, described by Isaiah 65 : 17 and onward.

It may be asked, Of what particular interest can this hill and temple be to us, and what profit that we should regard them? Much every way. Are not these eight chapters of Ezekiel a part of God's Word, which it is our duty to study? and though somewhat difficult of apprehension, are they not "Scripture," and therefore given by God, and "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," that we, if His children, may be thoroughly furnished unto all good works?" But if we are indeed His children, and of His blood-washed, shall we not stand on this Mount Zion with the 144,000? Will not our eyes be ravished with these bright visions of delight? Will not our feet, in company with the redeemed, walk the streets of this city of our God, and tread the sacred courts of this glorious temple? Will not our voices mingle with the thousand choirs in swelling the high praises of our God and the Lamb?

Should not the contemplation of these transcendent scenes of pleasure and delight fire our cold hearts with fresh ardor of hope and strengthen our hands in the work of our Lord? God commanded her prophet to "show this house to the house of Israel that they might be ashamed of their iniquities," and should not the contemplation of it wean us from the idolatries of earth, and influence us to seek this city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

THE HULL TRADESMAN WHO SWALLOWED HIS PROPERTY.

In the autumn of 1871, I was asked to call upon a woman in Hull, England, who was ill. I knew the woman very well. She lived in a thickly populated district, and had two sons and two daughters. They were very poor, and I was aware of the cause of their sad condition. The room was very scantily furnished, and some of the articles had been lent by a kind neighbor. I saw the woman several times before her death, and had abundant opportunities of witnessing the reality of the change which had been wrought in her by the Holy Spirit, through attending the mission services held some few months before at the parish church. At these services there was one hymn frequently used which produced a wonderful effect upon her the first time she heard it sung, and to the day of her death it was her favorite hymn. She sang it repeatedly, and for the last time only an hour or two before her death. It was the hymn commencing,

"Art thou weary, art thou languid?"

During her last moments she realized the presence of her Saviour, who she believed had forgiven her many sins, and was about to take her unto Himself.

There is a sad history connected with this family. Some years before, they occupied a very different position. At that time they lived outside the town in a fashionable residence, fitted up, regardless of expense, with everything that could contribute to their comfort. The father conducted a flourishing business in the town, and the premises in which he carried on his business, together with some tenements immediately behind the same, were his own property. Unfortunately, however, he began to frequent the public-house, and became a drinker and a gambler.

The business in time fell off because it was neglected; and eventually the property was sold. Shortly after this he became a bankrupt, and his household furniture and effects were sold to satisfy the claims of his creditors. Even these reverses failed to arouse the man from his fatal stupor, and, if possible, he drank more heavily than before; so by degrees the family was dragged down in the social scale along with the husband and father, until at last they came to dwell in the attic where I first met with them, and where the mother died. Thus it came to pass that a once respectable and affluent family were reduced to the lowest condition through drink and other evils.

Soon after their effects were sold by auction, the mother unfortunately followed her husband's example, as she thought to drown her sorrows, but in reality the consequence was to increase them a hundredfold. And as a candle when lit at both ends is speedily consumed, so when both husband and wife commenced to drink, their ruin was speedily effected. The two sons and two daughters had to provide for themselves, and it cost them many a hard and painful struggle to do so. At the present moment, the daughters are engaged as assistants in one of our large establishments—striving to keep themselves respectable and to pay their way. Having suffered so much themselves through the intemperate habits of their parents, they are all total abstainers, and one at least was for some time a member, and took an active part in the management of a Band of Hope.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Refused, on Thursday, to Accept the action of its conference-committee on the Greely Relief Expedition Bill. The difficulty between the two Houses is as to the selection of men to make up the expedition. The House would empower the President to select, through the Secretary of the Navy, the officers and men for the expedition; but the Senate amended the bill by providing that only volunteers should be sent. The House rejected the amendment, and at the conference the Senate committee withdrew it. On the report Mr. Saulsbury, of Deleware, strenuously opposed the withdrawal of the amendment, declaring that he was against forcing naval officers to go on such an extraordinary service, when it was outside of their regular line of duty, and declared that he was opposed to giving the Secretary of the Navy such a chance to punish any officer, if he desired to do so. After a long debate a new conference committee was appointed with instructions to insist on the amendment. As the case is urgent, it may be hoped that this difficulty will soon be settled. There is not likely to be any lack of volunteers.

The Senate Listened to an Earnest Temperance speech on January 30th from Senator Blair, of New Hampshire, in reference to the petitions sent to that chamber by the Woman's National Christian Temperance Association, praying that the manufacture and sale of intoxicants might be prohibited in the District of Columbia. Mr. Blair made an earnest plea for action upon them. He pointed out how similar petitions had been received year after year without any attention being paid to them, and that to know how to deal with the liquor question had become one of the most serious problems of statesmanship. Mr. Blair referred to Mr. Frye's recent description of what he had seen in a Capitol restaurant, and said it had come to be understood by the nation at large that the Capitol was a great national grog shop. If this was an error it should be corrected; if it was a fact it should cease to be a fact. Mr. Blair declared that in his State, prohibition worked well and did prohibit. He quoted statistics to show that prohibitory laws also worked well in other States, and urged that the liquor traffic should be shut off by Congress in that district. During his remarks Mr. Blair expressed the belief that the root of the evil would never be removed until it was attacked by constitutional restrictions. This is bearding the lion in his den. Washington is the last city on earth in which one would expect to see prohibition enforced.

The Confiscation of the Funds of the Mormon Church is the essence of the measure proposed by Senator Edmunds for the suppression of the Utah evil. Few people have any idea of the momentous character of the bill now under the consideration of the Senate. At present Utah is really governed by the officers of the Mormon Church. The taxes, which are large, are exacted, collected, and expended by the Mormon elders, and the necessities of life can only be had through them. They control the schools and all the avenues to social position and advancement. By their power of excommunication they hold the people in terror, for excommunication means ruin socially and financially to the excommunicated person. In proposing to strip the Church of its power and substitute for it a commission, nominated by the President, having the power to collect and disburse the revenue of the territory, the bill strikes at the root of the great upas tree, and would take off the shackles which now hold every citizen under the tyranny of the priests, a tyranny which in all ages and in all lands has been the most cruel and intolerable of all tyrannies.

Another Keifer Investigation has been Ordered by the House. Mr. Keifer, in his examination before the House Committee on the charge of having, during his Speakership, appointed his nephew by a dishonorable arrangement to an office in the House, made an accusation of unfairness against the newspaper correspondents in Washington. Being pressed to mention names, he gave those of two well-known correspondents, and a committee has been appointed to investigate the charges. The accused correspondents enjoy a wide reputation for honesty and integrity, so that Mr. Keifer's complaint has caused some surprise. The ex-Speaker appears to think that his unenvjable reputation in the country has been caused by the letters of newspaper correspondents, and to some extent he is right. Their accounts of his peculiar official conduct are defended on the ground that correspondents are employed to give true reports and not to conceal facts.

The Petition to the Forthcoming National Conventions of the Republican and Democratic parties on the subject of prohibition, to which we have already referred, has been prepared. It reads as follows: "The National Temperance Society, entirely non-partisan as an organization, earnestly asks your attention to the alcoholic liquor traffic as an issue of urgent and vital importance, involving very largely the nation's welfare and prosperity; and it furthermore respectfully requests that you will, by resolution, favor the submission to the several States of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified, will prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic liquor for drinking purposes, and that you will nominate for President and Vice-President candidates who will favor the prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout our national domain."

Wendell Phillips, the Famous Orator and anti-slavery leader, died on Saturday last at his residence in Boston, Mass., after a short but painful illness. He was in his seventy-third year, having been born November 29th, 1811. He studied for the law, but abandoned the profession after a very short practice in order to take part in the anti-slavery agitation then commenced by William Lloyd Garrison. His first public speech on the question was made in 1837 in Faneuil Hall, Boston, and from that time onward to the passing of the fifteenth amendment the agitation was the main business of his life. In his later years he advocated the doctrines of the Greenback-Labor party and woman suffrage. His fame as an orator was unrivalled. The charm of his eloquence was admitted even by those whose principles were diametrically opposed to his own. He had a deep and generous sympathy with any man or people whom he believed to be wronged or oppressed, but in denouncing the men whom he regarded as the oppressors, his indignation was liable to overpower his judgment. His most intimate friends and warmest admirers speak with regret of "his wrong-headedness," and his readiness to adopt schemes and advocate measures which would have involved those whom he sympathized with, and those whom he denounced in disaster. He was an ardent advocate of temperance, and his private charities were liberal.

A Railroad Disaster of an Exceedingly Distressing character occurred on Thursday last about eight miles from Indianapolis, Ind. A passenger train about ten A.M. was crossing the bridge over White River and Broad Ripple between Indianapolis and Monon, on its way to the former city, when the fireman felt the rear of the train sink and pull. The bridge was undergoing repairs, and he instinctively realized that the structure had given way. He instantly opened the throttle, and the engine sprang forward with great force, breaking the couplings between the tender and baggage-car. The locomotive kept the track, but the baggage and smoking-cars and a passenger coach dropped through the bridge and were piled up in one mass at the foot of the pier, the smoking-car being nearly crushed by the baggage-car. The wreck was partially submerged, but the portion above water immediately took fire from the stoves. Six persons were imprisoned by the seats, and were burned to death or were drowned before the flames reached them. The shrieks of the victims were heard by people in the neighborhood, who rushed to the rescue, but there were no axes or buckets, or several lives might have been saved. Later, when both appliances were procured, it was too late. The passengers who were not held by the broken timbers crawled out, and were picked up by the boats.

Dr. Elisha Harris, the Eminent Philanthropic physician of New York, died on Thursday last at Albany. He was sixty years of age, and at the time of his death occupied the position of Secretary of the State Board of Health. He was conspicuous among the physicians and philanthropists who have labored arduously and successfully in the cause of sanitary reform. One of the greatest works for the benefit of the people in which Dr. Harris was engaged was the first thorough tenement-house survey, known as the Sanitary Survey of 1869. The immediate result of this work was to render tenement-house life less hideous, by making ventilation of dark bedrooms compulsory. By Dr. Harris's suggestion or direction over 50,000 windows, for ventilating purposes were put in such rooms. Dr. Harris was also actively engaged in fighting the epidemic of fever in 1870, when, there being no hospitals for contagious diseases, a thorough system of disinfecting and fumigation was made necessary. To him also is due much credit for taking the first step in establishing the system of public vaccination. This was in 1869, and about fifty physicians in that year vaccinated between 50,000 and 60,000 persons.

Mrs. M. F. Shipman's Services at the Park Avenue Church, Brooklyn, have been extensively blessed. Members of the church say that for years they have been praying for such an outpouring of the Spirit as has now been granted them. The pastor and people labored earnestly with Mrs. Shipman in the work, and not only the church, but the outlying sphere around has felt the effect of the revival.

The Report that Rev. John S. Inskip had been prostrated by a second paralytic seizure, which was widely published last week, is contradicted. Mrs. Inskip writes that the attack, which was at first thought to be another attack of paralysis, was vertigo, and was caused by indigestion. She states that Mr. Inskip, though weak, is recovering, and that he is now able to sit up, and is as well as at any time since his attack of paralysis.

The Rev. E. Payson Hammond's Services at Camden, N. J., have been attended by large numbers of children and young people, over a hundred of whom have made a profession of religion as the result of God's blessing on his labors. The services were held in the Methodist and Baptist churches alternately. There were three meetings each day; prayer and conference in the morning, a children's meeting after the day-schools closed in the afternoon, and the adult gathering in the evening. Many of the meetings were attended by crowds, who filled every available space, and many went away not able to gain admission.

A Remarkable Case of Faith Cure is thus described by The Christian at Work: Miss Sarah Alton, of Putnam, Mass., a young lady aged twenty-three years, has for four years been suffering from spinal disease. She could not move without the use of crutches. The best physicians of the State and of Boston pronounced her case incurable. After her last return from Boston, bound up in a jacket of plaster of Paris, she became rapidly worse. Miss Alton had been frequently importuned by pious friends to have recourse to prayer and faith for a cure. Last Monday night she had a dream in which she thought that she saw herself cured by prayer. She communicated with her friends in Boston asking them to pray for her recovery. At three o'clock Tuesday afternoon she invited some of her neighbors into her house to pray with her. They prayed together. Miss Alton immediately became conscious of a change for the better. Since then she has discarded her crutches, is improving rapidly, and confident of entire recovery.

Mr. Anthony Comstock Described the Progress made during the past year by the Society for the Suppression of Vice in a speech delivered in Association Hall, New York, on January 22d. Mr. Comstock said: "We have advanced one step in 1883 over any previous year. We have checked a licentious French art, or rather copies of it. By a single verdict in the Oyer and Terminer Court in New York City we have cleared many shop windows and checked the tide of obscenity which had been coming from France and other European countries under the specious protection of art. We maintain that genius has no more right to be nasty than the common mind; that the French artist has acquired no right to debauch the morals of our land simply because he has conceived in his mind a lascivious picture and then wrought it upon canvas. It is not a question of art at all. It is simply this: Shall foreigners or others bring lewd, obscene, and indecent pictures here and display them in the public windows to the detriment of the morals of our youth? The law says no." The year closes with a deficiency in the treasury of the society of $274. The expenditure of the society last year was about $9000.

At the Thirty-first Annual Meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York, held on January 28th, the secretary made an interesting statement of the progress of the association. From his remarks it appears that during last year 246,693 persons visited the reception-room, and 104,994 the reading-room, a daily average in the first instance of 757 and of 336 in the latter. The library was made use of by 45,690 persons, and the gymnasium by 36,596. During the year 1410 secular meetings were held and 888 religious services. The attendance at the religious services aggregated 37,843. The total membership of the association on December 31st, 1883, was 3356. The Employment Committee reported that they received last year 1142 applications from employers and 2388 applications from employés. Secretary McBurney stated that the American International Committee of Christian Associations had expended during 1883 $30,715.17, and that it closed the year free from debt. Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, treasurer of the association, reported that the receipts from all sources last year were $31,408.66. The amount expended was $30,374.12, leaving $1034.54. It is proposed to spend $15,000 this year in improving the accommodations of the class-rooms and library. Judge Noah Davis, of the Supreme Court, delivered an address, in the course of which he assailed the evil of intemperance vigorously, and described the strength and power of the liquor-dealers. "On the subject of the liquor traffic," he said, "I wish it were in my power to say that such an evil should not have the license of public law." In another part of his speech the judge alluded to the importance of liquor as an element in politics, and said that it was too often the case that "the direct way to become an Alderman is to float through the rum shops."

Prayer for Tenement House Inmates has been answered in a remarkable manner in Brooklyn. Seven months ago a young man asked for prayer that God's blessing might rest upon himself and others, as they sought to do some mission work in a particular tenement house. The house was notorious for the rough nature of its inmates, who numbered forty-two in all. Moreover, they were all Roman Catholics, who, while not attending church, bristled with prejudices against anything in the way of Protestant endeavors to present the truth. The result is now reported. A mission prayer-meeting has been established, and is held in the house regularly one evening of the week. The children in the house, ignorant and wild before, have been led to the Sabbath-school, and in some instances to day-school, and a hold seems to have been gotten upon them. Two of the inmates of the house profess to have found a Saviour in Christ since the work commenced, and there is a deep interest manifested by others.

The Kansas City, Mo., Young Men's Christian Association is making rapid progress, and is doing a useful work in the city under the vigorous and energetic management of its General Secretary, Mr. F. A. Hatch. It has added over two hundred new members during the past year; new rooms have been secured and occupied, more imposing with one exception than any others in the whole West. A debating society has been organized, also classes in German, short-hand and book-keeping. A series of social meetings and a course of familiar talks and lectures were the most successful ever held by the Association. The religious work is in a healthy state, and some fifty religious meetings are held monthly.

The Rev. Thomas Harrison's Revival Services at Rockford, Ill., still continue with good results. The meetings are held in the Centennial Church. A local paper states 950 have asked for prayer and 840 have found Christ. The work is spreading to the other churches. Mr. Harrison's next sphere of labor is St. Louis.

A Baron Applied for Charitable Relief in Cleveland, Ohio, on January 15th. To a reporter who visited him, he said: "My right name is Gustave Von Rosenstein. The Rosensteins were an old Swedish family, of which I am the last. My mother was Baroness Von Rosenstein, born in Silesia, near the Saxon border. When the revolution for the overthrow of Bernadotte, the French usurper, failed, I with others was exiled. I arrived in New York in 1833 without any means, the Swedish Government having confiscated all my property. I became a whitewasher and house-painter, and remained at that work for six years. I have lived in Cleveland nearly forty-five years." The Baron's pitiable condition is an example of the way earthly kings deal with rebellion. The King of kings did not thus punish those who rebelled against Him. He gave His only-begotten Son to die in their stead (Rom. 5 : 8-10).

THE LORD WITH TWO OR THREE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."—MATTHEW 18 : 20.

The First Mention of a Church-Meeting—A Prayer-Meeting—The Heart of a Prayer—Luther's Prayer—Not a Farce—General Meetings—I. WE have in the verses preceding the text a mention of the first church-meeting of which I remember to have found mention in the New Testament. The Saviour declares of His assembled people, "Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." A few believers, gathered out of the world, have met in the name of the Lord Jesus, to attend to the affairs of His household here below. It is

A CASE OF DISCIPLINE.

A brother has trespassed against another brother. The offended one has sought him out privately, and by personal expostulation has endeavored to bring him to a better mind; but he has failed. He has then taken with him two or three brethren of the church, and they have together pleaded with the offender that he would do that which is right; but he is obstinate; even in the presence of two or three witnesses he persists in his trespass, and refuses to be won over by kindly entreaty. It only remains that they shall tell it to the church.

The church is grieved; it hears the case patiently, and waits upon God in prayer. It asks guidance, and, at last, finding that there is no help for it, removes the member of the body who is not in true sympathy with the rest, and is acting as if he had not the life of God in him. This being done, according to Christ's rule—justly, impartially, lovingly, with prayer—that which is done by a few men and women assembled here below, is registered in the court above. What they have bound on earth is bound in heaven. What they have loosed on earth is also loosed in heaven. It is a happy privilege when they can loose the bound one. When repentance is expressed, when the backslider is restored, when the church has reason to believe that the work of the Spirit is truly in the heart of the offender, then the bond is loosed on earth, and it is also loosed in heaven. The meetings of God's servants for the necessary discipline of the church are not trifling meetings, but there is a divine power in them, since what they do is done in the name of Jesus Christ their Lord. Oh, that church-meetings were more generally looked at in this solemn light!

Next, we are introduced to

in the nineteenth verse we read, "Again I say unto you, that if two of you," two of you, "shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven." It is a very little meeting, it could not be smaller to be a meeting at all. There are only two there, but they are two praying men, and two believers. They are two of the Lord's own servants, whose great concern is His kingdom; they are two earnest persons who very greatly desire the prosperity of the church. They are two of kindred spirit, agreeing in love to God and the truth, and they have talked over the matter, and considered it, and they feel moved by the Spirit of God to unite their supplications about one important subject. Will they meet together and pray in vain? As they are only two, will not the meeting fail to count with God? Assuredly not; the Lord Jesus Christ has aforehand left them this gracious promise, that if they shall agree on earth touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of His Father which is in heaven; they are only two, but this suffices to secure them the promised hearing.

Perhaps the exact petition which they offer may not apparently be answered. Remember that God often hears the prayer of our prayers, and answers that rather than our prayers themselves; by which I mean, that there is an inner soul within true prayer which is the quickening life of true supplication. The body of prayer may die, but the soul of prayer lives and abides forever. If I am asked what my inmost heart prays for, I should reply, is—"The will of the Lord be done." Is not this the essence, quintessence, and extract of the prayer by which our Saviour taught us how to pray? He bade us say, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."

THE HEART OF MY PRAYER

Mean we anything more than this by our prayers? I think that, when well instructed, this is neither more nor less than what we intend, and if it be really so, and we come together, delighting ourselves in the Lord, He will most certainly give us the desire of our hearts. When we come together with our wills sanctified into the likeness of the divine will, then our prayer succeeds, till it becomes no presumption even if we dare to say with Luther in one of his bold prayers, "O my Lord, let my will be done this time!" He ventured to speak thus because he felt sure that his will must be in accordance with the Divine will. Only there do you stand on solid ground; only there may you plead without any reserve for special blessings.

The prayer-meeting is not a farce, no waste of time, no mere pious amusement. Some in these times think so, but such shall be lightly esteemed. Surely they know not the omnipotence that lies in the pleas of God's people. The Lord has taken the keys of His royal treasury, and put them into the hand of faith. There is an accumulated power in united supplication; two do not only double the force, but multiply it tenfold. How soon the gate of mercy opens when two are knocking! God grant to each one of us a praying partner; when John pulls the oar of prayer let James join him in the hearty tug. Better still, may we always believe in our Father's presence at our prayer-meetings, so that we may find the words of Jesus true when He says, "It shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven."

Now, thirdly, we come to a promise which includes every meeting of any sort or kind which is for Christ's glory. So long as it is a sacred meeting of saintly men and women for the purposes of devotion or service—for the purposes of prayer or praise, or whatever else may be most suitable for the occasion, here is the promise for them—"for where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

Now, first, we shall mention with regard to these meetings, matters not essential; then, secondly, we shall carefully mention a matter most essential; and, thirdly, we shall dwell upon an assurance most encouraging.

I. First, let us speak of MATTERS NOT ESSENTIAL.

At the outset, we know that numbers are not essential, for "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I." It is very important in a large church that there should be large gatherings for prayer, for it would be an evidence of a slighting of the ordinance of united supplication if a fair proportion of the members did not come together for that holy and blessed exercise. But, still, where that cannot be—where the church itself is small—where, for divers reasons which we need not here recapitulate, it is not possible for many to gather together—it is a very encouraging circumstance that numbers are not essential to success in prayer. "Where two or three are gathered together." The number is mentioned, I suppose, because that is about the smallest number that could make a congregation. We can hardly call it a congregation where the minister has to say, "Dearly beloved Roger, the Scripture moveth us in divers places," as we have heard was once done by a clergyman; truly it was an assembly of two, and so was within the number, and under the circumstances might find the Lord present. But two out of a large church would have been a wretched sign of decline. Two or three are mentioned, not to encourage absence, but to cheer the faithful few who do not forget the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is.

Still, the number has this advantage, that it is the readiest congregation to be gathered. It is not difficult to make up two or three. A husband and wife: there are two. A husband and wife and a child: there are three. It is a very handy congregation, because it can meet in a bedroom; it can meet in a kitchen; it can meet in a closet; it can meet anywhere, for it is so small. It is also easily hidden away; in persecuting times two or three could get together in a corner, a cave, a cellar, or a garret. For the matter of that, two or three may be in prison together, and they can pray in one narrow cell; or they can do what Latimer and Ridley did when they stood back to back at the stake, and lifted up their hearts as one man. That was brave praying, when the two bishops stood to burn with devotion as well as to burn with fire for Christ's sake. I am sure that Jesus was in the midst of them when they met upon the faggots.

Numbers are not important at all; we need say no more about them except this—I like to note that the text puts it "two or three," for, as one remarks, that is much better than "three or two." For if "three or two" are gathered together, they are getting smaller; but if it be "two or three," they are evidently upon the increase. If they have only increased from two to three, they have advanced fifty per cent, and that is something.

Next, the

is not important. Does it say, "Where two or three ministers are gathered together in My name?" By no means. Ministers may expect the Lord to be in the midst of them, but they have no special promise as ministers; they must come before the Lord as plain believers. The "two or three" may be unable to utter a word by way of teaching the great congregation, but this is not mentioned in the promise. It may be that a poor man and his wife are praying together before retiring for the night. The Lord is there. A couple of servants unite their supplications in the kitchen. The Lord is there. Two or three little boys have come out of school, and they love the Lord, and so they have met in a corner to pray. The Lord is there. Do you remember how Luther was encouraged while he, and Melanchthon too, were down in the dumps about the Lord's work? They were dreadfully downcast; but as Luther passed by a room, he heard the voices of children and he stopped. Some women, the wives of good men, had gathered with a few holy children, and they were praying the Lord to let the Gospel spread in the teeth of the Pope and all his friends from below. Luther went back and said, "It is all right. The children are praying to God. The Lord will hear them. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hath He ordained strength." So you see in the promise of the divine presence there is nothing said about numbers, and nothing about rank.

THE PLACE NOT IMPORTANT.

Neither is a word said as to place, except that it says "where two or three." "Where" means anywhere. In any place where two or three are met together in Christ's name there is He. Not in the cathedral only, but in the barn; not in the tabernacle only, but in the field. "Where" means everywhere. In the loneliest place, in the far-away forest, in an upper room, or on board ship, or in an hospital. Anywhere Christ will be with you when you are with Him in prayer. Have you never read how the Covenanters, when the times of peace came on, and they could worship in the kirk, yet, nevertheless, often looked back with sadness to the glorious days they had in the mosses and on the bleak hill-sides when they were hunted by Claverhouse's dragoons, and the Lord covered them with the skirts of His garments? Anywhere we may meet for prayer and expect Jesus to be in the midst of us. The place is not essential even in the lowest degree.

When I see people running out every morning to church, it savors of a superstition which ought to have died out long ago. When you look into the church you will find no great number assembled; generally the rector and one or two of the family make up the company. But if the whole parish came trooping out to church, I should say that they had better stay at home and pray with their families. Family prayer is a better institution than the tinkling of a bell every morning, and the collecting of people in a church. Have a bell of your own, and be your own priest, and open your Bible, and pray yourself with your children, and that will be a more acceptable sacrifice than if you plod in your superstition half a mile to a so-called sacred place to enjoy the voice of a supposed priestly man. Dedicate your parlor; consecrate your sitting-room; make your kitchen into a church for God; for there is no sacredness in bricks, and mortar, and stone, and stained glass. The outside of a church is as holy as the inside.

THE TIME UNIMPORTANT.

And will you please to notice this, that as numbers and rank and place are all non-essentials, so also is the time? There may be—there ought to be to us from holy habit—an hour of prayer. But though that be especially and rightly the hour of prayer—for he that has no appointed time for prayer may probably forget to pray—yet still that pious custom must never degenerate into superstition as though heaven's gate were opened at a certain quarter of an hour, and shut during all the rest of the day. Meet whenever you please, no time will be unseasonable. The hour of prayer is the hour of need, the hour of opportunity, the hour of desire, the hour when you can come together. Let every hour, according as occasion permits you, become the hour of prayer.

And, once more, there is nothing said here about the form which the meeting is to take. "Where two or three are met together in My name, there am I in the midst of them."

"They are going to break bread together." Very well, they are quite at liberty to do so, and if they have met in the Lord's name, He will be in the midst of them. "But they are going to hear a sermon." All right; so they may. Preaching is an ordinance of God, and He will be in the midst of them. "But they are neither going to hold the communion, nor to hear a sermon; they are going to pray." Quite right; the Lord will be in their midst. "But they are not going to pray, that is to say, vocally; they are going to read a chapter, and sit and think of it." Quite right; the Lord will be in the midst of them. "But they are not even going to read, or sing, or pray vocally; they are going to sit still." The Lord will be in the midst of them if they meet in the name of Jesus. "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them."

Do not be the dupes of those who say, "This one particular form of service is the only one." Christ has not put it so. And we will not be brought into any bondage by those who call themselves "Brethren," and are the most unbrotherly brothers that ever lived. They tell us that we are all wrong; we cannot expect to have the Lord with us. To answer these is not difficult. Dear brothers, we are not at all grieved by your talking as you do, for we know you are wrong, since we have the Lord with us. It does not matter at all to us what you say so long as we enjoy His company, and see the prosperity which He gives to us. So long as we do not quarrel with one another once every few years, we are not anxious to follow you in your methods, which are illustrated by your bitter feuds.

As long as we do not split up into the most miserable sections of sectarians that ever disgraced the name of Christ, we shall not be greatly wounded by any remarks which you have to make. Condemn and welcome, for your condemnations are mere wind. May your objurgations be blessed to us, and may they ease your minds, also, by relieving your minds of a little of your bitterness. We believe that any form which true worship takes is a form which the Lord Jesus Christ not only tolerates, but sanctions, if His Spirit be there. But if you meet without that Spirit of God, even though you should think yourselves infallibly correct in the form which your meeting assumes, that form will be of very little use to you. So much on non-essentials.

II. But now, secondly, there is

and that is, that they should be gathered in Christ's name. Does not this mean that the gathering must be that of Christians met together as Christians to have fellowship with Jesus Christ and so with one another? Does it not mean that they must be met together in obedience to His will as they understand it, to carry out His will as they find it in the New Testament, and as the Spirit of God opens up that New Testament to them? Does it not also mean that they must be met together distinctly for the Lord's purposes?—to honor Christ, to bring glory to His name, to worship Him? They must be met together not to a kind of mystic, invisible, unknown Christ, but in His name, for Christ has a name—a distinct personality, a character; and that must be known, loved, and honored; or else we have not met in His name.

And does not this gathering into His name mean that we are, first, to be known by His name, and then to get close to one another by drawing more and more near to Him? The way to be gathered together is to be gathered by Him and to Him. If all they all press to one another. If each man's aim be personal fellowship with Christ, personal knowledge of Christ, personal trust in Christ, personal adoration of Christ, personal service to Christ, and the getting of a personal likeness to Christ, then we are all coming together. You do not meet to listen to a certain preacher, but because through that preacher you have been helped to get nearer to the Lord Jesus Christ, and, therefore, you are glad to hear His voice, and glad to worship God with those friends with whom you have fellowship in Christ. You do well to come where you have found Christ before; and you do well to stay away from any gathering wherein you have not found Christ.

Some, as they go out of the place where they usually worship, are sadly compelled to cry, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him." Do not go to any church or meeting-house merely because you have been in the habit of going. If your father used to live in Islington, but has now removed, you do not think it needful to go and call at his empty house; do you? Go where the Lord has met with you, and where you may expect that He will meet with you again. Sabbaths are too precious to be thrown away by sitting still to be starved. Even a cow does not care to be tied up in an empty stall, and a horse does not run to an empty manger. Seek the Lord Jesus, and do not rest till you find Him. We must gather into His name and get closer and closer to it, or else the Lord's day will run to waste, and barrenness will devour our souls.

III. Now, as usual, I have taken up too much time with these first two heads, for the last is the most important, and that is, most encouraging—"Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

First, then, very briefly, how is the Lord Jesus there? Notice the exact words. Catch the gracious sense. He does not say, "I will be there," but He does say, "I am there." He is the first at the gathering. As we, His people, meet, He is there, because He is in every one of them. It is a blessed thing to see Christ in His people. Did you every try to do that? I know some who try to see the old man in Christ's people. It does not take them long to see the body of sin and death, and it is not a refreshing sight when they do see it. But, oh, to see Christ in His people—what a charming sight it is!

And, next, He is with us in His Word. Christ is in His ordinances. And then the Lord Jesus Christ is with the assembly by His Spirit. The Spirit is His representative, whom He has sent as the Comforter to ABIDE WITH US FOREVER.

You must have felt Him sometimes convincing you of sin, humbling you, and bowing you down; then cheering you, comforting you, enlightening you, guiding you, relieving you, sustaining you, sanctifying you. Oh, what light He brings! What life He brings! What love He brings! What joy He brings! When the Spirit of God is in the midst of God's people what merry days they have! What days of heaven upon earth!

Next, where is the Lord in the assembly? He has promised to be with His people; but where is He? "There am I in the midst of them." The Lord Jesus Christ does not come into the assembly of His people to bless the minister only. No, you are all equally near in proportion to the grace and nearness you have received. He is in the midst of you, in the centre of all hearts. Like the centre of a wheel, from which all the spokes radiate, Jesus Christ is the middle of the company.

And if He be in the midst of His people, what will He do? He is there to bless those who supplicate and adore. But, mark you, the text does not say this in so many words; and do not you say it, brother, next time you pray. Did I not hear you say, "Lord, thou hast said, 'Where two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of them, and that to bless them, and do them good'?" That last little bit is your own. That addition is not in the Bible, for it is not the Lord's way to say what never need be said. What other blessing do we want than Christ in the midst of us?

Now, dear friends, if Christ Himself be in the midst of His people, He will bring us peace, just as He did when He dropped into the assembly of the eleven, the doors being shut. Does not this make our meetings delightful—Christ in the midst of us? Does not this make our meetings important? How one ought to strain a point to be there! If we have met with Christ aforetime we shall not bear to be away. We shall long to meet Him again, and count it a great denial if we must be absent. When Sir Thomas Abney was Lord Mayor of London, in the middle of the banquet which takes place on the first night, he disappeared for a quarter of an hour, and when he came back, he said to the friends around him that he had been keeping with a most intimate friend, and so he had retired for awhile. That appointment was to have family prayer with his household in the Mansion House, and that gathering for prayer he would not have given up on any account whatever. Say to all other things, "You must stand back, I have a particular appointment; I must meet the Lord Jesus Christ with two or three of His people. He says that He will be there, and I should not like Him to say, 'Where is My servant? Where is My son? Where is My daughter? Are they absent when I am here?'"

It is such a blessing to get to know the Lord Jesus personally. I heard the other day of a famous infidel, an agnostic—that is, an ignoramus, a person who knows nothing—and he went to a certain house to meet an elderly lady of considerable literary renown. He was told that she believed in the Word of God, and was a faithful follower of the Lord Jesus, so he thought that he would have a word with her before he went away. "Madam," said he, "I have been astonished to hear one thing of you. I hear that you believe in the Bible." "Yes, sir," she said, "every word of it." "And pray, madam," he said, "however came you to believe in that book?" She replied, "One of the principal reasons that I have for believing in the Book is that I am intimately acquainted with the Author of it." That was a blessed answer.

Faith gets to know Christ; and so, knowing Christ, and meeting Him in the midst of His people, it becomes armed against all unbelief, and goes forth in its panoply conquering and to conquer. So will it be with you, beloved, if you meet the Well-beloved alone in your closets, and if you add to this a frequent attendance at the holy assembly. I pray you, do not let us have to complain that one of you is away. Come always. My heart will rejoice if our meetings are filled with men and women who there see communion with Jesus. Come, for Jesus is with us. Come, for it would be most unseemly for Him to be here and you away. I pray you come, and make this house like heaven, which is thronged with shining ones who rejoice because Jesus is in their midst. Amen.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF THE MAHDI OF THE SOUDAN.

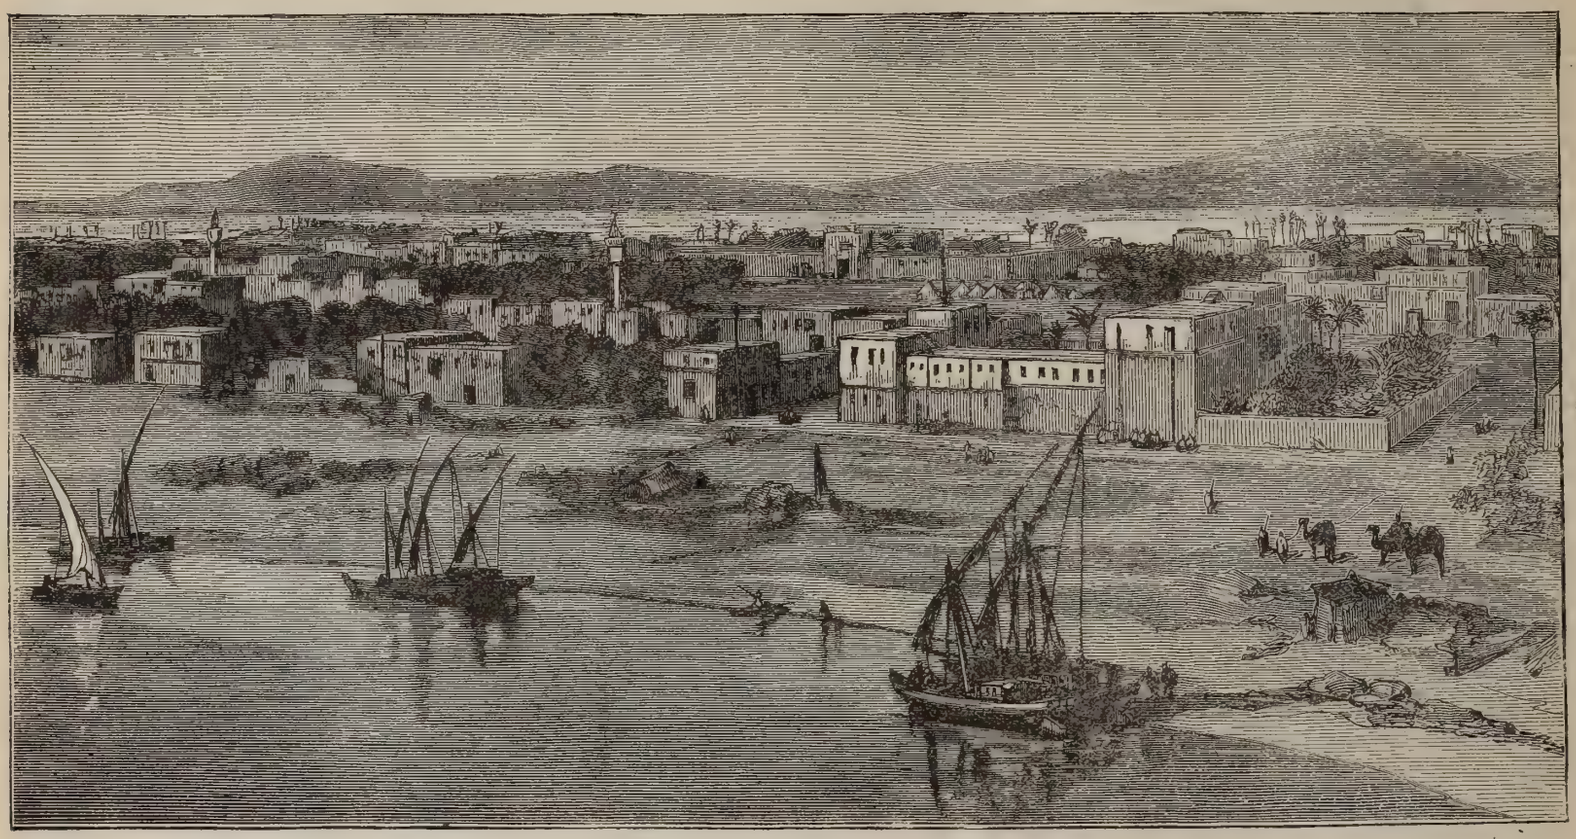
ON the next page is an engraving of Dongola, the reputed birthplace of Mohammed Ahmed, whose recent exploits in the Soudan have occasioned such excitement and astonishment. Aba, a small island on the White Nile, is said by some to have been the place of his birth, but as time passes on, the preponderance of evidence seems to point to Dongola, which is situated in the centre of the Soudan, not far from the town of Khartoum.

The view of the place on the next page is taken from a drawing made by Mr. Fowler, who has surveyed all the way up the Nile to Dongola. The principal building in the picture, nearest the river, is the Governor's residence. It is a quadrangle, with a garden on its northern side. The Governor resides in the part next to this, the wing or side of the quadrangle. Next the river is the prison; so it seems that here, as in Venice, we have "a palace and a prison" in very close conjunction. To the south of the palace is the post-office. The street between it and the Governor's residence leads up to an open space, beyond which is the Bazaar, with a two-storied gateway. Still farther from the river comes the desert, with hills in the distance. This town is New Dongola, on the left bank of the Nile. Old Dongola was higher up, on the right or east bank. All that is left of it now is an old Coptic church, with a solitary priest belonging to it. The people have all moved to New Dongola.

The Mahdi is now about forty years of age, tall, and of copper-red complexion. For a long time he worked with his two brothers in the neighborhood of Khartoum at building boats for the Nile, but got tired of his trade and aspired to become a Fakir, which is about the same thing as a priest. He applied to the Sheik of the island of Tuti, situated close to Khartoum, a little to the north of the junction of the White and Blue Niles. After a few years' study with the Sheik, he succeeded in taking the order of Fakir.

He then sought to become a Sheik, and was again successful. Thenceforth he had but one object in view, namely—to assume the character of a prophet. He retired to the Island of Aba, near Kana on the White River, and, taking up his abode in a dry cistern, he led the life of a Sheik in the strictest sense of the word. He remained there for six years, only leaving his retreat on Fridays to go to the mosque. His reputation for piety spread in course of time throughout the country, and when, subsequently, he came to be regarded as a saint, he expounded his mission to a numerous assembly of Moslems at Kana.



Dongola, the Birthplace of the False Prophet.

He told them that the Archangel Gabriel had twice commanded him to unsheath the sword of faith, in order to reform the bad Moslem and to found a Mussulman Empire, which would be followed by universal peace. He held his mission from the Prophet, and would achieve what Mohammed had been unable to do. His recent military successes are fresh in the memory of our readers, and he is now practically master of the whole of the Soudan.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

An Extraordinary Interruption to a Funeral service took place at Jeffersonville, Ind., on January 15th. A well-known woman was taken suddenly ill a few days before, and in two hours was pronounced dead. Heart disease was assigned as the cause. The funeral was set, and an immense number of people were in attendance. The sermon was preached, sorrowing friends had taken their last look at the face of their loved one, and the undertaker was about to place the lid on the coffin, when a glance at the supposed corpse caused him to draw back with an exclamation of horror. All was confusion in an instant, as the preacher said, "She is not dead." It appears that just as the coffin lid was about to be placed over the face, a flush and slight tremor as of one in a desperate struggle for life passed over the neck and face. Measures were immediately taken to resuscitate the woman. The incident has caused no little excitement in that locality, and for a time, at any rate, there and elsewhere, more care will probably be taken to prevent so horrible a mistake as premature burial. The mistake is often made of regarding hardened sinners as spiritually dead and beyond the reach of hope. Not even in the worst cases ought Christians to despair or cease their efforts and prayers for the conversion of the impenitent (Rom. 11 : 23).

A Burglar was Employed as a Messenger by a lady in New York recently. Inspector Thorne, of the city police, in conversation with a reporter, thus described the remarkable incident: "A lady living in a large brown-stone house just off Fifth Avenue was in her home one night last week with an invalid mother in her charge and nobody but a woman servant to assist her. All the men had gone off to a ball. Just before eleven o'clock the sick woman became worse. The daughter was alarmed, and went to ring the bell intending to send the servant for a particular kind of medicine. The girl appeared just at this moment, and, in a terrified voice, informed her mistress that there was a burglar in the basement. The mistress showed no alarm, but decided that she would use the man as a messenger to procure the medicine. She went down to the basement and encountered a burly negro in one of the lower rooms. 'Come out!' she said in an imperative tone. The negro, who had been a slave, instinctively listened to the tone of authority, and obeyed. He took the order for the prescription, had it filled, and returned with the medicine and change." He thus rendered valuable service to the family he intended to wrong. Violent men have at times been so used in God's service. Saul of Tarsus stopped on his way to Damascus, and commissioned to carry the message of the Gospel to the Gentiles, was an instance of God's power in this respect, and the history of the Christian Church contains many instances of it less eminent but not less remarkable (1 Tim. 12 : 13).

HENRY FLETCHER'S EMBEZZLEMENT.

IN the year 1870 two young men were seated, one day, in the smoking-room of a hotel in Philadelphia. One of them, whose name was Henry Fletcher, was dressed in the height of fashion. His companion, who was about his own age, was his cousin, William Lyon. His appearance betokened his position in society, which was that of a tradesman of the smaller class.

"Now," said Lyon as he sipped his coffee, while Fletcher put down his glass of hot whiskey, "perhaps you will tell me why you have come to Philadelphia, and why you could not come up to the house as usual and see Annie and the children, instead of bringing me down to this hotel where I hate to come?"

"Do not be mad, old fellow," said Mr. Fletcher. "I wanted to have a serious talk with you."

"Say on then," Lyon answered. "You are not in trouble, are you, old man?"

"I am though, and it is a very serious trouble, one that I do not see my way out of."

"That's bad," was Mr. Lyon's comment. "If I had been disposed to envy any one it would have been you, but I never grudged you your good fortune. When you went to the gas company I thought you were a lucky fellow. What's the trouble?"

"The fact is," said Fletcher, "I am heavily in debt to the company."

"What, do you mean that you have embezzled their money?"

"Hush," said Fletcher, "don't breathe such a word here. Some one might hear it who knows me, though I do not see any one from our city here. But it isn't safe to use ugly words like that in a promiscuous crowd. That is what an enemy would call it, but when you have heard the story you will see that I am right in saying I owe the company money."

"Sorry to hear it, my boy; I am afraid no story can change the fact. Borrowing without the consent of the owner is—what I called it just now. How on earth could you have done such a thing?"

"That is the question I often ask myself, but it came about almost insensibly. If any one had told me ten years ago, when you and I used to read the Bible and pray together, that I should ever do anything of the kind I would not have believed it."

"I should think not!" William Lyon ejaculated. "What does Elsie say about it?"

"Oh, my wife does not know. But it was on her account I got into the muss. She was left alone when her father died, and would have had to go to live with one of her married sisters if we had not been married, and she did not like that prospect. So we agreed to commence in a small way. My commission was $2500 a year, and we thought we could live on that and save a little, and so I bought the furniture on credit, and we were to pay for it in four quarterly instalments. As it was only one expense, and it was for our life, it seemed the wisest plan to have it all good. So as you know I furnished the place nicely."

"I know you did," said Mr. Lyon. "I thought when I went down to see you the first time after you were married, that you had a perfect gem of a place."

"It cost a thousand dollars altogether, and after that Elsie missed her piano so much that I was sorry for her, and I gave five hundred more for an instrument that was dirt cheap at the money. When the first bill came due for the furniture I was fifty dollars short; but my commission on the next week's collections would cover it, and I just anticipated it by a week. My accounts were all correct the next week, so though I was a little uneasy for a few days, I was soon out of my misery. The next three months was a bad time. Elsie was ill; and the house expenses, and the doctor, and the druggist made it a heavy time, so when the next furniture bill came due I was a long way out. I had a lot of the company's money by me at the time, and recollecting how quickly I had put the former matter right I did the same thing again. The accounts have never been right since. The company's books show that consumers are owing accounts that they paid me long ago. I tried to economize to put it right, but I have never succeeded, and for more than a year I have been in dread lest it should be discovered. I have led a miserable life. Now you know all; what do you think I had better do?"

Henry Fletcher Arrested.

"How much are you short?" Mr. Lyon asked.

"I don't know. I have been afraid to add it up. I am afraid it would so unnerve me that I could not go about my duty. But it must be over twenty-two hundred."

"I know what I should do," William Lyon said. "I should go to the directors and tell them the whole story and offer to work on half commission until the shortage was paid."

"That would never do; they would arrest me right off; or, if they would not do that, they would discharge me. No, there is another plan. I could borrow the money if you would become security for it, and then I could pay the company right away and pay the other debt in instalments. Come, we have been friends from boyhood; you will not refuse?"

"I will not say no positively, now, though I do not like the plan; it is not straightforward, and will get you deeper in the mire; but I will think of it. I must consult Annie, too; I would not sign without her consent."

But Annie was never consulted. Henry Fletcher had a plausible tongue, and his influence over his cousin was supreme. Before he left Philadelphia on the night train, William Lyon's name was on a promissory note for two thousand dollars, and Henry Fletcher was on his way to the money-lender with it in his pocket.

William Lyon knew he had done a foolish thing, but he was warm-hearted, and could not endure the thought of deserting his cousin, even though he knew he had acted wrongly. He wrote in a few weeks asking Fletcher if his accounts were now straight, but to his horror he learned that they were not. Fletcher explained that the sum must be paid in small amounts, or it would occasion surprise and inquiry. It would, however, soon be settled. A few weeks later he wrote again, but this time he received a letter from his cousin's wife saying that her husband had left home, and she did not know where he had gone.

The directors of the gas company knew, however. A detective in London had received a cable message, and, accompanied by a police inspector, awaited an incoming train from Liverpool. As it drew up to the platform the inspector opened the door of one of the carriages, and invited Henry Fletcher to accompany him before a judge. There an extradition, on the charge of forgery, was procured, and he was soon making his way back across the Atlantic. The money from the money-lender had been dissipated, and had never gone into the company's treasury. Fletcher, in his desperation, knowing that his cousin would have to suffer, and being himself inured to evil-doing, forged a check and decamped with the proceeds.

Poor Lyon was ruined. In the endeavor to help a villain he had sacrificed his own position, which he had striven so hard to maintain. In bitter poverty for many a year he had to regret that he had not heeded the wise king's warning, "Be not one of them that are sureties for debts" (Prov. 22 : 26).

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Bookseller.

LITTLE ASTON is one of those small midland towns in England, lying in the midst of an agricultural district, which offer no attraction to tourists, and where very few events seem to happen. Every family in it, even to the lowest classes, possesses a staid respectability and decency, which is chiefly the heritage of those who live in isolated places, divided from the busier, and perhaps the more wicked, world by a girdle of cornfields and meadows. The population cannot be more than five thousand, which in these day constitutes little more than a family party, whose members must be very closely allied.

A large proportion of the townspeople consists of professional men, and people with means, who keep up the tone of its society. The grosser vices, if there be any, hide themselves diligently from the microscopic scrutiny of the town. Murder has never stained its precincts with blood; suicide is almost unheard of; intrigue is unsuspected. There are scandals, but scandals of the gentler kind, such as one might whisper of one's own mother's son. From day to day, and from year to year, its narrow stream of life flows in commonplace channels, seldom quickened into rougher and swifter currents. There are births, deaths, and marriages; old men retiring from business, and young men attempting small innovations; but the town of Little Aston is always very orderly, and strictly respectable.

Some years ago the centre of respectability was the Market Square, and to dwell elsewhere was to be a grade or two lower in society, and to be inadmissible to the selecter circle. But the next best place was Chapel Street, opening out of the north-west corner of the Square. It was narrow, and very dull, even upon market days; the dullest street in the town. The shops were dark and dingy, and about half-way along it, they gave place to small, poor houses, built capriciously, each one of different height and size. Nearly at the end stood a large and ugly chapel, with a pretentious portico, supported by four square pillars of red brick, and surmounted by a pediment and architrave of blue and yellow tiles. This chapel gave its name to the street.

A few houses distant from the entrance into the Square stood a very old and very dingy dwelling, which had undergone but little alteration from the date of its erection, a century and a half before. Not that there was any of the picturesqueness of antiquity about it; its aspect was only gloomy and weather-beaten, the windows being of small panes of discolored glass, and its walls blackened by smoke and age. The roof formed three gables, and the moss and house-leek grew along the gutters, and choked up the water-pipes. It was a large building, occupying more basement than would have sufficed for two handsome modern houses. It was on the north side of the street, which the sun never gladdened, and looked as if a perpetual cloud overshadowed it. Whether the gloom was within or without one could scarcely tell.

The street was narrow, and the side pavement exceedingly so; yet the old house thrust upon it two ancient bow windows, with casements painted black, and small dark panes, through which a passer-by with good sight might decipher the titles of long rows of books, the bindings and lettering of which were faded by damp, rather than by excess of light. The books were dry, judged by modern taste. They were certainly old, and mostly theological; with here and there a lighter volume of religious biography. Latin and Greek classics might have been found among them. Between the two windows was a door, always closed, but which rang a bell as it opened; and the black lintel above it bore, in dim and tarnished letters, the words "John Morley, Bookseller."

Within, the shop was always dusky, partly because of the books filling the windows; and partly because of its northern frontage; a cool and pleasant shade in summer, but in winter a very den of chill and darkness. As you opened the heavy door, and entered the shop to the tinkle of a noisy bell, John Morley himself would step down into it from some apartment beyond, and meet you face to face. It was less like addressing a tradesman behind his counter, than the meeting of friends or acquaintances. Most of his customers shook hands with him.

At the first glance it would have been said that John Morley was a grave and bookish man; at the second, that he was solemn; at the third, that he was sorrow-stricken. Some souls have a vast capacity for sorrow, and drink it in as a parched land drinks in water. There was no glimmer of sunshine about him any more than about his dwelling. Like it, he was stationed on the northern side of life, where no laughter or splendor of sunlight could fall upon him. Involuntarily, every voice was lowered to a subdued and respectful tone. Not a sound from the rest of the premises penetrated to the dusky and quiet shop; and when John Morley bowed out his customer, and closed the door as upon some departing guest, the little bell rang loudly, like one jingling to the hard pull of a schoolboy in an empty house.

The rest of the dwelling consisted of a number of half-furnished rooms, with steps down or steps up into them, as the fashion is in old buildings; with low, long casements, high and narrow doors, stained ceilings, and half-wainscoted walls. The windows at the back looked upon an inclosed yard, part of which had, a long time ago, been planted as a garden. A few melancholy lilacs and thin privet bushes still sucked a feeble life out of the sooty mould, and sent up slender black branches and a handful of pale leaves, to catch any stray sunbeams which might shine over the surrounding walls. There was a rambling range of outbuildings, including a stable filled to the rafters with rubbish; above which was a small room with a shelving roof, which was approached by an outside staircase. A sad and sombre little room, with dingy ivy-leaves growing round the door, and tapping at the dusty panes of its lattice window, as if in parody of ivied doors, and windows in the country. This room—nobody knew why—bore the name of the nursery; though no children, within the memory of man, had ever played in it.

About a mile from Little Aston stood Aston Court, a handsome, brand-new, desirable family mansion, with pleasure-grounds, conservatories and gardens, all surrounded by a fine, well-timbered park. The old Court had been bought and pulled down ten years ago by David Waldron, Esq., M. P., a famous man among the dissenters, and naturally the great man of the chapel at the end of Chapel Street. The portico had been built in honor of him. The church at Little Aston—by which we mean that "congregation of faithful men" worshipping in the dissenters' chapel—had been small and of no repute, before the advent of Mr. Waldron. It had been looked upon as low and vulgar, fitted only for the poorer classes. There had been but one member of any standing, of any education or learning, belonging to it—a man who had the original tongues on his lips more aptly than the rector himself, and who knew the whole origin, motive, and history of dissent. That man was John Morley.

If these two, David Waldron, M. P., and John Morley, bookseller, had met each other in the aisles of the parish church, they would have kept to their own legitimate spheres, and been no more to one another than the squire and his tradesman. But they were brought together on the democratic platform of a church-fellowship, in which all the members were professedly equal. They called themselves brethren. All the rest of the brethren were content to look up to Mr. Waldron from a long way off, as a brother far above them; and they were quite willing that he who helped to rule the nation should rule their church absolutely. But John Morley was a deacon, like Mr. Waldron; he was also a trustee, like Mr. Waldron. He knew what equality and fraternity meant. If Mr. Waldron had political influence, John Morley had literary influence; for he could use his pen well in defence of their sect and its tenets. These two men held a somewhat uneasy position with regard to one another. John Morley was the Mordecai in the gate; but let it be understood that Mr. Waldron was a very worthy Haman, a really good man, only a little jealous of the homage and authority he believed to be his due.

The room behind John Morley's shop was spacious enough; but it had a low ceiling crossed by a massive beam, and it was lighted only by a long low casement of small panes and thick woodwork, opening upon the mournful garden at the back. It looked like an addition to the crowded shop in front; for the walls were lined with shelves closely packed with books, dull and dark in their bindings, with narrow strips of crimson baize, which had long lost their bright tint, nailed along the edge of each shelf. The furniture was heavy and old; the carpet threadbare and faded. No curtains shut out the black night when it pressed against the window outside.

On the table, during the daytime, there usually lay a pile of business books, a ledger, a day-book, which no neat, meddlesome hand of woman moved from time to time. No woman's work lay side by side with them, neither sewing nor knitting; such as had once, for a brief space of two years, sometimes ruffled John Morley a little by its disorder and interference with his own more important occupations. He had remembered them often, when they could come in his way no more, with a pang too sharp to be shown by any other sign than the deepening shadow under his eyes, and the threads of white growing plainer in his dark hair. In this room, haunted by memories becoming more and more dreamlike, John Morley had spent his evenings alone, without companions, and wishing for none, having his books and his remembrances only; the latter dying away softly and slowly, as if they had merely lingered for a while out of pure good-nature, before leaving him to his solitude.

This room was not, however, yet solitary at six o'clock one winter's evening; though John Morley was occupied with a customer in his shop. It was unlighted, except by a good fire burning brightly in the grate. Stretched at full length upon the hearth lay a little girl, reading by the fire-light, her face glowing partly with the heat, and partly with the interest excited by her book. Her hair, cut short over the forehead, had been flaxen, then golden, and was now taking a sunny chestnut shade of brown. The eyes were large, well opened, and clear, with that peculiar gaze of wonder and innocence which some children's eyes still retain at the age of ten years. In spite of the glow upon the face, it was grave and sad.

You might have seen, looking at her closely, and reading rightly the expression of the eyes and mouth with its sweet and pliant lips, that this was a child whose life would be most completely shaped and colored by the temperaments of those around her. She could never be childishly gay while others were suffering; nor grave in the presence of mirth. By a more direct necessity of her nature than most others possess, she would weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice. Only encircle her with gladness, and she would be the most joyous among the happy; here she was the most subdued among her mournful and sad surroundings.

This child caught at last the sound of animated voices, and lifted up her head, which had been bent over her book. A minute or two afterward she crossed the room quietly to the door which connected it with the shop, and pushed it open far enough to get a glimpse of the talkers. She could see her father's face, and she leaned forward more eagerly to look at it. She could hardly remember to have seen it without its profound and unbroken gloom, which never lightened when looking at her. But now the gloom was gone; the dark eyes glittered, the stern lips smiled, and the heavy eyebrows expanded with an unmistakable pleasure, as he gazed into the face turned toward him. This face the child could not see. The little solitary heart was as quickly troubled as the surface of a mountain tarn, which lies open to every breath that blows; and the tears came, she did not know why, into her eyes.

"Come in, and see my little girl now," said John Morley, in a tone which reached her ears.

The child shrank back shyly, and retreated to the hearth, reaching it just in time to turn, and front the stranger, who seemed to hesitate for a moment on the threshold of the comfortless and sombre room. The face was girlish and exceedingly pretty, set round with rich masses of fair hair, and lit up with blue eyes, which appeared to shine into the gloom, and disperse it. Her hesitation, if it were hesitation, was gone in an instant, and she crossed the floor with a light and eager step to the child, who waited timidly her approach. She laid her arm about her shoulders, and stooped down to kiss her cheek.

"What is your name, my dear?" she asked, in a gay young voice, which seemed to thrill through the child's sensitive frame.

"Hester Morley," she answered, speaking with quaint self-possession, and in measured tones: "what is your name, and where do you come from?"

"My name is Rose Mary," said the stranger, with a laugh breaking through the long, dull silence of the place, with a promise of more music like it; "is it a pretty name, Hester?"

"I think so," replied the child after a moment's musing; "does my father like it?"

"Oh, you droll little creature!" exclaimed the girl, with a sidelong glance at John Morley's radiant face. "I dare say he does, but I sha'n't ask him. How old are you, Hester?"

"I am nine years old," she said, sighing as if she had found the nine years a heavy burden; "but you are older than me. How old are you, Rose Mary?"

"Oh fie!" she cried, lowering her voice to a mock whisper, "you must never ask a lady her age; that is always a secret. But I will tell you; only you must never, never tell your papa. I am twenty-three years old; positively an old woman. What an odd little mortal you are!"

The girl's manner had a light and graceful vivacity about it, full of charm and novelty to both of her grave listeners. She glanced again at John Morley with an expression which the child could not altogether comprehend, but which caused her to withdraw her hand from hers. John Morley came forward to the hearth, and laid his hand upon his little daughter's head.

"She has been sadly neglected," he said, looking fondly at the pretty girl beside him; "but you will soon put her right; Hester, this lady has promised to be your mother."

Hester neither spoke nor moved, except that her clear eyes went quickly from the one face to the other; but dwelt longest on the sombre, yet handsome, features most familiar to her.

"Don't you understand, my little Hester?" asked Rose, putting her hand through John Morley's arm, with a coquettish and caressing gesture. "I am going to be your mamma, and take care of you."

"Yes, I understand," said the child, nodding her head, "you are going to be my stepmother. I have read all about it in books, and Lawson has told me about it. My real mother is dead; and my father is going to marry you. Yes, I know all about it. At first the stepmother is very kind, and is very fond of the children; but as soon as she has a baby of her own, she gets cross with the others, and everything is quite different."

John Morley's face flushed and darkened while his little daughter spoke in her measured tones; but Rose laughed her blithe and musical laugh again, and fell down on her knees before Hester, so as to bring her bright face on a level with the child's serious eyes.

THE CONVERSION OF THE JAILER.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 17, Acts 16: 25-40. Golden Text, Acts 16: 31. By the Editor.*

The Midnight Service in Prison—Prisons of the Soul—Those who Listen—The Strange Interruption—The Jailer's Alarm—Paul Reassures Him—A New Anxiety—The Essence of the Gospel—The First Step—Practical Results—Sorrow and Atonement—Judicial Perturbation—A Fearful Prayer and its Terrible Answer.

THE Spiritualists had been successful. Paul had ruined their business by casting the demon out of the medium, and they, being no longer able to tell fortunes, had appealed to the law, and Paul and his companions had been publicly beaten and put in prison. The jailer received strict injunctions to keep them securely, and he, knowing his responsibility, took special precautions to prevent their rescue or escape. He put them in the inner prison, and put their feet in the stocks. He consulted his own interests in doing so, for the Roman law was very strict in such cases. The penalty of negligence or connivance on the part of a jailer was death. The jailer who suffered prisoners to escape was executed without mercy. (See Acts 12: 19 and 27: 42.)

THE MIDNIGHT SERVICE.

The prisoners, despite the pain from their lacerated flesh and their cramped position, were not depressed. They could not lie down, nor kneel, nor sit in comfort, their ancles being held securely in the apertures of the wooden instrument of torture, but they could pray. Their offence was simple obedience to the orders of the Master, who had commissioned them, among other duties, to cast out devils. Paul had obeyed, and this was the result. Therefore, he was not dismayed. He knew what his mission would involve, and was prepared for an occasional sojourn in prison and other evils (Acts 20: 22-24). The prisoners cast all their care upon God, and even in their pain and bodily misery could pray and sing praises.

It must have sounded strangely in that prison Probably those walls had never before echoed. such sounds as during that midnight service. Curses, profane ejaculations, fierce threats, the sounds of quarrelling and fighting doubtless were familiar enough there, but prayer and especially praise must have been unprecedented. No wonder that, as Luke says, "the prisoners listened." What must it have been to hear Paul pray? The words he wrote have thrilled the world through eighteen centuries. The prisoners in that jail that night heard such words from his lips, and they listened.

Paul may not have known that there were listeners. Being in the inner prison, he and the other Christians were probably shut up by themselves, away from the other prisoners, and also, as we know from the narrative, they were in the dark, because in the general alarm that took place later, the jailer had to call for lights. But still there were listeners, and there are observers and listeners now, who silently watch and draw conclusions from the behavior of Christians. They, even the boys in the class, watch their teacher; the boys who do not go to Sunday-school watch those who do, to see how they act under trial. There is a noise in the school, a stubborn boy in the class, a draught from an open window; the boys know how much the teacher dislikes such things, and they expect an outbreak of temper, or to see the flushed face, the underlip bitten in the effort to control the impulse to angry words. A boy sees another boy irritated, teased, provoked, and he says, "That is a Sunday-school boy; let us see how he will act. I know what I should do. I should fight. Let us see if religion makes any difference." Yes, there are listeners everywhere. In that jail at Philippi, at midnight, the listeners heard a sound of prayer and praise, and it came from that underground cell in which were confined the men who had suffered more, and had suffered more unjustly, than any man in the jail, from those who, of all the prisoners, had most cause for discontent.

But while this midnight service was going on there was a marvellous interruption. There had been prayer and singing of hymns, and there was to be a wonderful sermon, making up a complete service; but before the sermon, came to Paul revealed what it was. He quickly realized that this convulsion was supernatural, and connected it with these strange prisoners whom he had thrust into the inner prison, and who now were solicitous for his welfare, and had interfered to prevent his suicide. Who were they? What was it that the clairvoyant had said about them? She was evidently a well-known woman, and the jailer doubtless knew all about the affair. She had said of these Christian teachers that they were "the servants of the Most High God." To the jailer's mind the earthquake was a confirmation of her words. Yet he had ill-treated them. The jailer, who knew well enough the consequences of ill-treating a citizen of Rome, might well tremble at the thought of having ill-treated the servants of a Power who could send an earthquake. But the clairvoyant had said something else: "They show unto us the way of salvation." He called for lights, sprang in, and fell down before Paul and Silas, and said, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

AN EARTHQUAKE.

Every man's bands were loosed, and the doors were opened. What a startling occurrence in an age when dynamite had not yet been applied to prisons! God had interfered. Probably it was not in answer to prayer. It was not like Paul to pray for release. He would leave all that to God, and would be content to stay in prison until God saw fit to release him. But God interfered, and opened the doors. The jailer was caught napping. What a state of bewilderment he would be in when the shock came! His first thought was of the consequences to himself. Before him appeared, as inevitable, a disgraceful death; and rather than endure that, he drew his sword, and would have killed himself. In some way, how we are not told, the impending crime was revealed to Paul, who, realizing what was passing in the jailer's mind, cried with a loud voice, "Do thyself no harm; for we are all here." That was sufficient to reassure the jailer as to his own physical safety, but another anxiety was upon him.

THE JAILER'S QUESTION

How many times has that momentous question been asked in this world? It is the natural question of the partially enlightened soul. The idea of doing something, paying some penalty, doing some meritorious service, is the one idea of affrighted man. Yet not that way is there hope. Even in our own relations we would not admit it. The kind father whose rebellious son has disobeyed him, dishonored him, defied and insulted him, would not be reconciled on such terms. The payment of a fine, the performance of some menial work would not satisfy him. It might be done hypocritically or with a rebellious spirit. What He requires is a change of heart. Yet like Naaman the Syrian, the jailer and men in all times would prefer to do some great thing.

PAUL'S ANSWER

set aside once for all any such notion. "Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved." Not repentance, not penance, not the building of a church, not even reformation; simply believe. Yet is belief so simple? Ask the man afflicted with a mortal disease to believe in one physician out of a hundred. Ask the man charged with a capital offence to trust one lawyer out of a hundred with his defence. Ask the man standing on a ledge of a precipice, with a thousand feet of rocky depth below him, to trust his life to one rope. Ask the man in a burning building to trust himself to the strength of a fireman's arm. Belief in those cases is a serious matter; yet what is it to trust to Christ for eternity! That was the sermon which completed the midnight service. "The servants of the Most High God" are this day showing the same way of salvation to perishing men. "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved."

"What," say men, "do nothing?" "Is belief to be all?" No; but belief is the one indispensable necessity. Repentance and reformation count for nothing without belief. But let that belief enter into a man's soul, and what mighty results follow! "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," said the wise king (Prov. 23: 7), and he never uttered more pregnant philosophy. How was it with the jailer? "And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes." What was that? Was it not repentance? An effort to undo the evil of yesterday, an attempt to make amends, as far as he could, for the wrong done? That humiliation had been made no part of the bargain for salvation. It was the impulse of the believing man. In the same hour faith was in action. He was already showing his faith by his works. "And he rejoiced greatly with all his house, having believed in God" (Revised Version). There was another fruit of faith. The believing man always rejoices, if he believes aright. So in one night the jailer believed, repented, and rejoiced greatly. He is a type of thousands of converts since.

Let no man think that faith is an insignificant thing. It transforms the life. It becomes the mainspring of existence. It changes motives, disposition, conduct, imparts energy, provides forces of control. It changes the whole man. It is like the leaven in the bushel of meal. It has no need of law, because it prompts action that is on higher and better lines. There is no need to say to a believing man, "Thou shalt not steal." He recoils with horror from the thought of stealing. He is reaching to something far higher than mere honesty. All that is taken for granted. He has passed long ago any impulses of that kind. In a word, he is born again.

But Christianity had still more noted effects in Philippi. The magistrates were alarmed; the earthquake, the converted jailer, the Roman citizenship of the prisoners were facts of a serious character for them. They felt as the Philistines did when they had captured the ark, and were so dismayed at the consequences that they were anxious chiefly to be rid of it (1 Samuel 5: 6-12). They came and besought Paul and Silas, and begged them to leave the city. So had the Gadarenes begged the Saviour to depart from them, and for the same reason (Matt. 8: 34). They wanted to be let alone, to wallow in their iniquity. They had learned the lesson which the impenitent always have to learn, that our God is a consuming fire. The Christian teachers, like their Master, acquiesced. They departed. So does the Holy Spirit depart when repulsed, and there can be no more terrible state imagined than that of the man, who loving his sin, shrinking from sacrifices, asks to be let alone. Happy they who, like the jailer, believe, and repent, and rejoice.

* Mrs. M. Baxter's exposition of this lesson has not been received. It is probably among the mail sent by the Germanic, which steamer was disabled during her voyage to New York, and returned to Liverpool. The mails have not yet arrived here.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Political Affairs in Great Britain are the subject of much interest, as the opening of the Parliament approaches. The Rt. Hon. John Bright's address to his constituents on January 29th has attracted much attention, owing to his known intimacy with the Premier. He intimated that the first duty of Parliament should be to give every citizen a vote, whether he resides in a city or a rural district. After the franchise had been extended, the next question should be the reform of the land laws. He referred to Mr. George's scheme for the nationalization of the land, and denounced it as likely to lead to "immeasurable evil and confusion." Mr. Bright said the scheme was called American because of Mr. George's nationality; but it had not been tried in America, and Mr. Bright took occasion to warmly eulogize the wisdom of the American people. Mr. George's scheme, he said, was "an insult to the common-sense and honesty of the English nation." He said: "Nevertheless, the system of land tenure must be altered so as to enable the land to come gradually and naturally into the hands of those most requiring and desiring it, most able to pay for and best able to work it for the public advantage. It would be easy to abolish the laws of primogeniture and entail, to facilitate the transfer of land. Englishmen should try these reforms before attempting wild and extravagant schemes."

Mr. Chamberlain, who is a Member of the English Cabinet, predicted that the bill for extending the franchise would be passed by the House of Commons by a large majority, and said that if the Lords rejected it Mr. Gladstone might appeal to the people at a general election against the Lords. He promised that he would press his own bill to protect the lives of sailors from the nefarious schemes of ship-owners in spite of all opposition. In this he will have the support of the people, who are naturally indignant at the facts recently disclosed. These show that rotten and unseaworthy ships are sent to sea insured far beyond their value, in expectation that they will founder. The owners gain more money by their being lost than by making a safe voyage. Mr. Chamberlain's bill is a stringent measure designed to stop the practice and punish those who violate the law.

The London Chambers of Commerce Gave a banquet on January 28th, at which Mr. Lowell, our minister to Great Britain, delivered an interesting speech, in the course of which he said the duty of proposing the chief toast of the evening had been confided to him as an expression of kindness and good-will toward the United States —a country which had exemplified what the English colonies might come to if not wisely treated; but neither he nor his countrymen desired such a consummation for those great commonwealths which were bound to England by so many filial ties. Commerce, he said, was the great pacificator between countries. It brought men face to face, and it was the great corrector of the eccentricities of nature, so that a bad harvest in England meant a good season for Minnesota, Kansas, and Manitoba.

Chinese Gordon's Mission to the Soudan was the subject of a lecture delivered in New York on January 29th by Lieutenant-General C. P. Stone, whose long service in Egypt has given him an intimate knowledge of the country. In Egypt he is called Stone Pacha. In the course of his lecture he said: "General Gordon's going to Khartoum single-handed is a daring act of devotion to his country. The only chance of success he has is his own personal courage and his prestige as a former Governor of Soudan. The latter is not likely now to be of much service to him. Before, he found the people submissive to the Khédive. Now he goes as a representative of the British Government. The chances are small that he can reach Khartoum. If he fails, the loss to British prestige will be great, and the gain to El Mahdi will be greater. There is a chance that the defence of the Suez Canal may, in a short time, require a force as great as the British now have in India. If Mohammed is really a great leader of men, the chances are that in a few months his home will be Mecca and his title 'El Mahdi Caliph.'" Referring to the tradition of El Mahdi, he said that during his residence in Egypt he was told of the existence of a tradition that in the last days of the world would arise a false prophet—the Mahdi—who would proceed from one conquest to another throughout the world, and would rule it. His rule, it was believed, would be bad and short, for Jesus Christ would soon appear near Jerusalem and gather up all the great dead warriors of the world. Christ would march to Mecca, seize it, and proclaim peace on earth.

Anxiety for General Gordon's Safety is Felt both in England and Egypt. The Sun's correspondent says: "The fear is strong that the large sums of money he carries afford additional temptation to murder him. He cannot reach Khartoum till February 18th. His expedition began with a bad augury in the discovery that the youth sent for restoration as the legitimate Sultan of Darfur has turned out a confirmed drunkard, with already two and forty wives." It is, however, believed that the drunken polygamist is not the man he is represented to be, but an impostor whom the Egyptians have foisted on General Gordon. The Egyptian Government are secretly opposed to General Gordon, are jealous of him, and do not desire him to succeed. The general is not sanguine himself. Before setting out for Khartoum he said to his friends that he had misgivings as to his success, and that he believed it was now too late for him to do any good. Baker Pacha, who is advancing to relieve the besieged garrison at Sinkat, has been checked by the disaffection of his colored soldiers. It is feared that a mutiny may break out, the effects of which would be as disastrous to him as a conflict with the False Prophet.

A Destructive Hurricane Swept over Western Europe on January 27th. In Paris it severed railway and telegraph communication in all directions. The gale blew down telegraph wires and did much other damage in the suburbs. Many persons were injured while walking in the streets. An immense number of lamps and windows were smashed, scaffolds overthrown, trees uprooted, and chimneys destroyed. In London many persons were injured. The glass roof of the Westminster Aquarium was demolished, causing a panic among the audience, in which several persons were hurt. A printing office in the Haymarket was unroofed, and a boy was killed by the falling débris. Many vessels were wrecked off the coast, and a large number of lives were lost. Telegraph wires to the Continent and Atlantic cables were interrupted for several hours. At Hastings the electric lights were extinguished, and the seas dashed over the streets, making walking dangerous. At Torquay there were many casualties. A mail cart was overturned by the violence of the wind. Gas-lamps were blown down and trees uprooted. At Leeds the roof of a dwelling collapsed, killing the daughter of a workman and injuring his four sons. The mail train between Durham and Darlington was twice stopped by the gale. The Freethinkers' Hall at Portsmouth was completely demolished by the wind. The hurricane demolished an iron chapel at Newcastle. The roof in falling killed a woman and two children.

"Gloomy Forebodings for the Current Year are," says the New York Herald, "heard on every side throughout Europe. It is not the financial situation, although that is bad, that inspires the European press with misgivings, but the revival of nihilism and the unmitigated failure of the repressive measures adopted by the Russian Government to keep it in check. The murder of Colonel Sudeikin, the rumored assassination of a still higher official, and the strange reports connected with the Czar's recent accident are not the only ominous symptoms of approaching trouble in Russia. The Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung, which is often remarkably well informed on the revolutionary movement, states that intelligence of a most serious character has lately reached St. Petersburg from London. The Russian authorities, it asserts, have obtained possession of a cipher letter found at the lodgings of a nihilist refugee in London. This letter has been deciphered at St. Petersburg, and contains a passage to the effect that a revolver can be more safely used than dynamite, and that it will be best to wait for an opportunity when the Emperor and the Czarevich can be attacked together, so that anarchy may set in at once. A simultaneous warning is said to have been sent to St. Petersburg from Paris."

Prince Napoleon's Patience Appears to be exhausted. The French people have shown no disposition to invite him to rule over them, and, indeed, seem, if they abandon the Republican form of government, to lean toward the Orleanists. On February 1st Prince Napoleon informed a Bonapartist deputation which waited upon him that the time had arrived to commence a legal, open, and untiring agitation for the promotion of the Bonapartist cause. It has been decided to hold a large meeting on the 17th inst. for the purpose of discussing the necessity of a revision of the constitution, the object being, it may be supposed, to suggest such changes as will facilitate a Bonapartist restoration.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are now Laboring in the London District of Stratford. The meetings at Battersea are described as the most successful yet held in the British metropolis. The building was continually thronged, and on Sunday, January 13th, more than 20,000 people found their way into the vicinity of the hall, which necessitated the holding of three overflow meetings at night—one in the open air, another in the neighboring Wesleyan Chapel, and another in the Baptist Chapel. It was the most memorable that has been experienced since the London campaign opened. At the hall alone in the evening the inquirers numbered close upon 500. Nearly all the neighboring ministers and clergy assisted, and at times as many as twenty of them were seated together upon the platform. The choir was the largest Mr. Sankey has had at his command, numbering 400. A men's meeting was conducted nightly in the Wesleyan Chapel by Major Whittle, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. McGranahan. The local committee in each district follow up the work after the departure of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. In Islington fifty ladies are still engaged visiting the inquirers, whose names were taken, and the same practice is adopted in the other localities.

The Intolerance of the Spanish Priests was evinced last week in an unmistakable manner. A press dispatch, dated January 28th, says: "The small city of Astorga, in Spain, was the scene yesterday of a religious commotion. A party of students, under the leadership of priests, made an attack upon an Englishman and a native, who were hawking Bibles about the streets. They even threatened to burn the Spaniard. The victims made unavailing appeals to the police for protection."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

ISAAC MARSDEN, whose portrait, together with scenes in his life, appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, was born at Skelmanthorpe, England, on June 3d, 1807, and died on January 17th, 1882, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. His parents were hand-loom weavers of woollen cloth; their house was a scene of ceaseless activity, for it required all their energies to keep out of debt and make their way in the world.

At the age of twelve Isaac was taken from the little rural school, and set to learn the art of weaving; but, owing to his inveterate carelessness, he was soon removed from the loom in disgrace, and was taught "cropping," another branch in the industry of cloth production, and at this he remained till he was about seventeen years old; but during that period home lost all its charms for the light-hearted lad, and he formed companionships that seriously affected his character.

The business of Isaac's father became very prosperous, and he took long journeys with a horse and cart into Lincolnshire and Yorkshire for the purpose of finding customers for his cloth. In these journeys his son Isaac accompanied him, and showed signs of becoming a good salesman. The fact is, the new employment was to Isaac's taste, and he did his best to please his father in every respect.

At length, Mr. Marsden trusted his son on some of these journeys alone, and placed him in charge of a warehouse he had hired at Doncaster. His duties required him to attend certain hotels, in order to meet his customers. Thus he soon learned to drink and to mix with the idle, dissolute characters who haunted the kitchen and taproom, and as he was free and open-handed, and fond of practical joking, he became exceedingly popular with them.

In those days good books were scarce and dear. The Christian Church had not awakened to the value of pure literature; and as Isaac could not read good books, he read bad ones. He carefully studied every tract and pamphlet issued from of that period. He adopted the opinions therein enunciated, and used the arguments used there to excuse, if not to defend, his own wickedness. Thus he learned to sneer at virtue, and ridicule religion, and hold up good men to scorn and derision. Nothing pleased his companions better than a pot-house discussion on religion or politics, especially when he could find a foeman worthy of his steel; but he was so dogmatic and contentious that few dared to contradict him. If he failed to find an able opponent to argue with him, he would vary the evening's performance by ridiculing religion and playing practical jokes on all who did not indorse his opinions.

Through ten years of sin and guilty folly there was only one person in the world who had any influence over him for good. He had cast off every other bond that saved him from drifting to shipwreck and ruin, but his love for his mother. Her love was that held him fast. Her piety secretly charmed him, and she could touch a chord in his heart that was beyond the reach of all the world beside. Every day she prayed, "Lord, save my Isaac. He is beyond the reach of every other arm but Thine." This was the burden of her prayer, morning, noon, and night.

In her agony and distress one night she forgot all about the flight of time. Her husband was away from home, and the children were in bed, and Isaac was away in some scene of folly and sin; so she for his conversion. About four o'clock in the morning a sudden conviction filled her mind that her prayer was answered, and Isaac would be saved. Filled with this blessed assurance, she determined to try night and day to reclaim him, and watch for the signs of any change in his conduct, and pray incessantly, "Lord, save my Isaac."

One Sunday, in the autumn of 1834, the Rev. Robert Aitken was announced to preach special sermons at Doncaster, and Isaac resolved to go and hear him, in order that he might compare him with other preachers whom he had heard, and get as much fun out of the service as possible. The preacher was a "son of thunder," and with "thoughts that breathed and words that burned," his utterances so completely overcame the young man, that he was induced to remain at the prayer-meeting after the service. He felt, at last, that he was a sinner needing mercy, but though sorely wounded by the Holy Spirit's sword, he did not at once yield himself to Christ.

Very shortly after this, he attended a meeting at Skelmanthorpe, with the intention of parodying the service. The testimony he heard, however, revealed to him the falsity of his infidel notions. His proud intellect was confessedly beaten, and he sprang to his feet. In a few brief sentences he told the people present how he had heard first one and then another tell how the religion of Christ made them happy. He was not happy, but he had made up his mind that if there was a heaven he would gain it; and if there was a hell, he would miss it. Then bringing down his hand on the pew-door before him like a sledge-hammer, he finished his remarks by saying, "And if I ever do get converted, the devil may look out."

Providentially he fell into the company of a few friends at Doncaster who gave him most valuable help and counsel at this critical period. Among them was "Friend Waring," who went to visit him in his rooms at the "Wellington Inn," and found he had a library of infidel books that had cost him nearly one hundred dollars. He pointed out that these writings had done incalculable harm to the cause of Christ, and had supplied Isaac with arguments and information that helped to bring religion into contempt. How could he ask the Lord to receive him with these unclean and mischievous things in his hands? They talked the matter over, and prayed about it, till Isaac resolved that all his bad books should be destroyed by fire. They carried them down-stairs into the brew-house in the yard, and consigned them, one by one, to the brew-house fire. But this mode of destruction was too slow; so they made and when the last book had been burned to tinder he walked into the house, saying to himself: "There, they will never do anybody else the harm they have done me" (see frontispiece).

From this time, in penitence and prayer, he diligently sought for mercy. The crisis was reached on Sunday morning, October 11th, 1834, when he resolved to pray until his prayers were answered and his sins forgiven. He attended the six o'clock prayer-meeting that morning, asked his friends to pray for him every hour of the day, and told them privately that he "meant business." And that day deliverance came. He attended all the public means of grace, but it was in his room, during the interval of service, that his prayers were answered. It was while he was alone, on his knees, offering himself as a poor captive exile to God, and pleading for mercy, that he found Christ, and his soul was set at liberty.

Immediately after his conversion, he went to the "Wellington Inn," the scene of many of his wildest pranks; and finding a number of his old companions there, he told them of and invited them to follow his example. He warned them that if they would not go with him to heaven, he would take care he did not go with them to hell. He solemnly admonished them that he had done with them forever, unless they repented. Then he knelt on the sanded floor, and fervently prayed for their conversion. The landlady told him he had lost his senses, and some of his comrades ridiculed him; but he went again and again, and, with tears in his eyes and anguish in his soul, he tried to save them.

Three of his companions were either killed or carried away by swift and fatal disease, and they died in their sins. Their sudden deaths made a great impression on him. It was now a terrible revelation to him that it is much easier to lead men to ruin than to bring them to Christ. Some of his old companions threw his former deeds in his teeth, and laughed him to scorn. But he faithfully warned them, and continually prayed for them, until some of them yielded themselves to Christ, and became His spiritual children.

He now became

and was instant in season and out of season. Often, after he had sold his cloth in the market-place, his cart became his pulpit and the market-people his congregation, and he would stand, on hot summer days, bare-headed and without coat, warning sinners and inviting them to the Saviour (see frontispiece). The people would gather round, and spend a few minutes listening to his rough but powerful language. He had a ready wit and a fluent tongue; and though he had now begun to fear God, he never was afraid of either man or devil. He sometimes met with rudeness and insolence; but if any man tried to silence him, or put him down, he found it a formidable task. These street harangues were signally owned of God in the conversion of sinners of the worst kind.

At the time of Mr. Marsden's conversion, when he consecrated all he had to God, he included his horse "Short" in the list. Henceforth "Short" was to be the Lord's horse. It was to carry him to his preaching appointments, and be the messenger of the Gospel. Occasionally it was in danger. Its master and his friend Butler had been preaching at Smeaton one night, and were driving home, when a tramp stopped them and wanted to ride. It was a lonely part of the road, and the district was then infested with "footpads" and thieves. These highway robbers often used violence if their victims resisted, and it was evident the tramp was one of a gang, for they could hear him exchange signals with his confederates. But while they were parleying with the tramp, "Short" bolted at such a speed that he dashed through the men, scattering them right and left, and leaving them prostrate in the road (see frontispiece). He never stopped till he had safely reached Doncaster.

One Monday at noon he went to a contractor's yard at Wigan, and gathered the workmen together during the dinner-hour for worship. He knelt among the bricks and timber, and prayed so touchingly and fervently for these rough workmen that many were moved to tears. Then Mr. Marsden announced that he would preach at in the market-place at seven o'clock, and asked the workmen to come and hear him preach. As soon as it became known that he intended to preach in the market-place, a number of rough Irishmen, who objected to all kinds of preaching as a rebuke to their own lives, and especially to a layman preaching, instead of leaving it to the priests, declared that they would take his life rather than he should preach there. Undeterred by threats of violence, he took his stand by the "big lamp" at the appointed hour (see frontispiece), and his friends from the contractor's yard formed his body-guard and surrounded him on every side.

They sang and he prayed; but as soon as he began to preach, a mob of Irishmen attempted to storm the position and drag him into their midst. But they were met with cries of "Stand ack," "Touch him if you dare," "We'll de-nd him."

Regardless of these warnings, the Irishmen ame on to the attack; but his body-guard re-elled the onset, and kept the disturbers at bay ll the sermon was ended. Then they formed procession, and, followed by an immense owd, marched to the chapel and crowded it. he service was a grand success. The Spirit of od arrested several of his opponents, and many the men were converted.

In his evangelistic work Mr. Marsden was ntinually receiving invitations from new iends in strange places, and he always tried to lapt himself to the special needs of the place. e would first of all take a stroll through the wn or village, and get into conversation with ungers at the street-corners or women at their ouse-doors. A favorite plan of his was to walk to a stranger and ask if he could tell which ouse the Lord Jesus Christ lived in. Of course e received some curious answers to such it he was satisfied if he could only set people inking.

A young wife was nursing her baby at the or, when he walked up to her and said: Does the Lord Jesus Christ live here?" She niled and said, "I hope so." Looking at the ng on her finger, he said: "You are married; es your husband live here?" She answered omptly, "Yes." He replied: "You don't pe so, you know it. And if the Lord Jesus hrist lived here, you would know it. He ould not put a ring round your finger, but He ould put His love in your heart, and make you happy that life would be one sweet song. ou will know it when He comes to live with ou."

In one of the lowest parts of a certain town as a row of wretched cottages called "the ookery." He was coming through the street ith a newspaper in his hand, when a rough-oking woman shouted after him: "You are a arson, and parsons should not read news-apers." He turned back, and found that the eaker was a middle-aged woman, standing ashing at her door, with a short black pipe in er mouth; her children were ragged and dirty; nd her home was remarkable for its dirt and isorder. He said: "I am compelled to read ne newspapers to see what the devil is doing all ver the country. How can I defeat him if I on't know what he is doing?"

"You are always talking about the devil" she nswered; "you might know a deal about him." I ought to know a great deal," he replied; for he used to be my master, and I served him ithfully for a good many years. But I quar-elled with him, and left his service, and now I n serving the Lord Jesus Christ. Eh! if you ould only join His service, you would find such difference as you little imagine. He would ash your heart—not in that wash-tub, but in lis precious blood, and make it pure and clean. ome and join us to-night at the service, and ive your heart to God."

Just then

om a neighboring house came rushing into the reet, flourishing a wet mop, and abusing the reacher, and the woman also for talking with im (see frontispiece). This increased the small rowd of dirty ungainly women and ragged chil-ren who had assembled to hear the contention. he new-comer was a tall, gaunt, masculine oman, with a dirty face and hair unkempt, and eculiarly offensive with her tongue. As soon s he had a chance of putting in a word, he asked ne crowd if that woman's husband had not gone way and left her. Somebody told him that she ad been deserted for a long time.

"I thought so," he replied; "no sane man ould live with such a woman as that. Those erce eyes and frowning features are signs hung utside to show what is within. I would not ear such a face as that for a thousand a year. t is time somebody came to preach the Gospel n this Rookery." By this time the virago had effected her escape from his raking fire of home truths, so he distributed a few tracts, and pressed upon the people their need of Christ's salvation, and of His willingness to pardon and bless them.

STRANGE SCENE AT A BALL.

At Accrington, in Lancashire, on one occasion, Mr. Marsden was about to conduct a series of services, when he heard that a grand ball was to be held at one of the principal hotels in honor of a lady and gentleman who had been newly married. Such an opportunity of speaking a word for the Master was one Mr. Marsden was not the man to miss. He knew it would need tact and delicacy, but he believed all necessary qualifications would be given him for the effort, and was not anxious. He said to a few friends: "I will go to the ball, if some of you will accompany me." They went with him, and he marched up to the pianist during one of the intervals in the dancing and said, "Will you play a tune for me?" He agreed to do so; and while the rest were gazing in blank astonishment, he gave out a suitable hymn, and the company joined in singing it.

He then gave an address to the newly-married pair, showing them the true way of happiness for time and eternity. His manner was so gentlemanly and courteous that the company listened with respect, and when he proposed that they should unite with him in prayer, they knelt down with him while he prayed. As he pleaded the Holy Spirit touched the consciences, and many of them were in tears; and when he concluded, he invited them all to his services. Many of them accepted his invitation, and several of them were converted.

Year after year Mr. Marsden continued to toil for the glory of his Lord and Saviour. But in the year 1881 his labors began to tell heavily upon him, and he showed signs of failing health. Still he struggled bravely on in spite of old age and infirmity and exhausting toil. He would keep his engagements as long as he was able, but in November of that year the Rev. J. I. Britten spoke to him, and advised him to abandon his engagements in other circuits, and preach only occasionally in his own. He promised to take his advice, and shortly afterward, feeling his utter prostration, he said, "It is all over,

MY WORK IS DONE."

For some time his friends hoped that he would rally again. His vigorous constitution and uniform good health led them to expect a longer lease of life. But there came symptoms of an obstruction of the intestinal canal, with nausea, vomiting, and sleeplessness. Various remedies were tried to remove the obstruction, but they were unavailing. Writing on December 24th, 1881, he said: "I gradually get worse and worse, and now I am very poorly. I have two to look after me—one a doctor, and the other more than a doctor—my beloved wife. Oh what nights of sickness and vomiting, and no rest nor desire for food! I am in such a state I shall have to give up some of my engagements—many, unless I improve. I am in the Lord's hands, and they are safe and right—infinitely right. Should a man complain who has had health nearly seventy-five years? No, no complaining after so much good health for such a length of time. Oh what a wicked thing to have given to the devil my younger part of it! But God is merciful, and on that mercy I stand."

PEACEFUL CHRISTIAN DEATH.

From that time he slowly but surely lost strength, and gradually wasted away. He uttered no murmur. He breathed no complaint. He was not anxious to die, but perfectly submissive. He spent much of his time in prayer. Then he became so weak that he could scarcely speak, and finally he fell into a stupor and gently breathed his last about two o'clock on Tuesday morning, January 17th, 1882, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He was interred at the Doncaster cemetery on Friday morning, January 20th.

PASTORAL TESTIMONY.

The Rev. J. I. Britten, in an address at the interment of the mortal remains of Mr. Marsden, said: "Isaac Marsden was a grand man. Take him all in all, we shall not soon see his like again. For nearly fifty years he worked and preached. He loved soul-saving work. He was never so happy as when surrounded with broken-spirited penitents. With my colleagues I often visited him. It was a pleasure and profit to sit by his bedside. His patience was 'lamb-like.' His resignation was complete. The strong will was merged in the divine. The strong man lay still and placid as a child. He said one day: 'I don't feel anything or think anything of Isaac Marsden, it is all Christ!'

"On another occasion he said to me: 'I have been looking back and reviewing seventy years, but I see nothing but the Atonement!—the Atonement at every turn!' He got weaker and weaker, and then could scarcely speak. The day he died I saw him, and a few hours before his decease. For a time he seemed gone, his eyes were closed, and there was no response. I said to Mrs. Marsden: 'I should like him to recognize me once more; you speak to him.' She said: 'My dear, Mr. Britten is come to see and pray with you once more.' He paused, and then feebly said: 'Bless him!'

"Taking advantage of the momentary consciousness, I bent down and said: 'Brother Marsden, is Christ precious?' The lips moved, a smile gleamed, and he replied, with marked emphasis: 'Very!' A few moments afterward he passed painlessly and peacefully away, and Isaac Marsden's name was added to the honored roll of the sainted dead, who have left us noble examples in their lives and deeds. Let us be 'not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.'"

WHY HE REFORMED.

(From the Arkansaw Traveller.)

THERE was a drunkard in an Arkansas town who became a sober man through a kind Providence granting him what Burns longed for:

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us!"

One day several acquaintances, on asking him to drink, were surprised to hear him say, "You must excuse me, gentlemen, for I can't drink anything." To their question, "What is the matter with you?" he said:

"I'll tell you. The other day I met a party of friends. When I left them I was about half drunk. I would not have stopped at this, but my friends had to hurry away to catch a train.

"To a man of my temperament, to be half drunk is a miserable condition, for the desire for more is so strong that he forgets his self-respect in his efforts to get more to drink.

"Failing at the saloons, I remembered that there was a half-pint of whiskey at home, which had been purchased for medicinal purposes.

"Just before reaching the gate I heard voices in the garden, and looking over the fence I saw my little son and daughter playing. 'No, you be ma,' said the boy, 'and I'll be pa. Now you sit here an' I'll come in drunk. Wait, now, till I fill my bottle.'

"He took a bottle, ran away, and filled it with water. Pretty soon he returned and entering the play-house, nodded idiotically at his little girl, and sat down without saying anything. Then the girl looked up from her work and said:

"'James, why will you do this way?'

"'Whizzer way?' he replied.

"'Gettin' drunk.'

"'Who's drunk?'

"'You are, an' you promised when the baby died that you wouldn't drink any more. The children are almost ragged, an' we haven't anything to eat hardly, but you still throw your money away. Don't you know you are breakin' my heart?'

"I hurried away. The acting was too life-like. I could think of nothing all day but those little children playing in the garden, and I vowed that I would never take another drink, and I will not, so help me God!"

THE BEAUTY OF RELIGION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 10, 1884.

"The crystal cannot equal it."—JOB 28 : 17.

The Star of the Mountain—Job's Estimate of Value—Religion Superior to the Crystal—I. In Exactness—The Precision of God's Methods—No "Happen-so's"—An Unfrayed Robe—A Bereavement in Philadelphia—II. In Transparency—Its Revelations—A Clear Bible—Light on Persecution—III. In Beauty—Its Symmetry—Its Freshness—IV. In Transformations—Will God Wear Jewelry?—The Carbon becoming a Solitaire—Its Settings—Three Crystals—The Carthage Martyr's Fiery Boat.

MANY of the precious stones of the Bible have come to prompt recognition. But for the present I take up the less valuable crystal. Job in my text compares saving wisdom with a specimen of topaz. An infidel chemist or mineralogist would pronounce the latter worth more than the former, but Job makes an intelligent comparison; looks at religion and then looks at the crystal, and pronounces the former as of far superior value to the latter, exclaiming in the words of my text, "The crystal cannot equal it!"

Now, it is not a part of my sermonic design to depreciate the crystal, whether it be found in Cornish mine or Hartz Mountain or Mammoth Cave or tinkling among the pendants of the chandeliers of a palace. The crystal is it is the queen of the cave; it is the ear-drop of the hills; it finds its heaven in the diamond. Among all the pages of natural history there is no page more interesting to me than the page crystallographic. But I want to show you that Job was right when, taking religion in one hand and the crystal in the other, he declared that the former is of far more value and beauty than the latter, recommending it to all the people and to all the ages, declaring, "The crystal cannot equal it."

I. In the first place I remark that religion is in exactness.

That shapeless mass of crystal against which you accidentally dashed your foot is laid out with more exactness than any earthly city. There are six styles of crystallization and all of them divinely ordained. Every crystal has mathematical precision. God's geometry reaches through it, and it is a square or it is a rectangle or it is a rhomboid or in some way it hath a mathematical figure.

Now religion beats that in the simple fact that spiritual accuracy is more beautiful than material accuracy. God's attributes are exact. God's law exact. God's decrees exact. God's management of the world exact. Never counting wrong, though He counts the grass-blades and the stars and the sands and the cycles. His providences never dealing with us perpendicularly when those providences ought to be oblique, nor lateral when they ought to be vertical. Everything in our life arranged without any possibility of mistake. Each life a six-sided prism. Born at the right time; dying at the right time. There are in our theology.

If I thought this was a slipshod universe I would go crazy. God is not an anarchist. Law, order, symmetry, precision, a perfect square, a perfect rectangle, a perfect rhomboid, a perfect circle. The edge of God's robe of government never frays out. There are no loose screws in the world's machinery. It did not just happen that Napoleon was attacked with indigestion at Borodino so that he became incompetent for the day. It did not just happen that John Thomas, the missionary, on a heathen island, waiting for an outfit and orders for another missionary tour, received that outfit and those orders in a box that floated ashore, while the ship and the crew that carried the box were never heard of. The barking of F. W. Robertson's dog, he tells us, led to a line of events which brought him from the army into the Christian ministry, where he served God with world-renowned usefulness. It did not merely happen so. I believe in a particular providence. I believe God's geometry may be seen in all our life more beautifully than in crystallography. Job was right. "The crystal cannot equal it."

Just after my arrival in Philadelphia to take a pastorate I was called to a house of great sorrow. The family had been to Cape May for a summering. The son of the household had been drowned in a pond not far from the beach. As I entered the afflicted home and the lad prepared for sepulchre lay in one room, there rang through the hall the wailing of the father and the mother, a grief appalling and indescribable. The parents said they could not forgive themselves, because they had changed their plans for the summer and had not gone to the White Mountains as they had purposed, and had gone to Cape May. "Oh," I said to them, "do not say, 'I wish we had gone to the mountains instead of going to Cape May;' do you not think God has arranged all this? You cannot understand now the mercy of it, but trust Him; there are no accidents; the God who arranges all the affairs of your life arranged the death of that boy." Do not say, as I have often heard some of you say, "Oh," if I had not gone here and if I had not gone there, this would not have occurred, and that would not have occurred!" Things are not at loose ends. Precision, accuracy. Job was right. "The crystal cannot equal it."

II. Again, I remark that religion is superior to the crystal

IN TRANSPARENCY.

We know not when or by whom glass was first discovered. Beads of it have been found in the tomb of Alexander Severus. Vases of it are brought up from the ruins of Herculaneum. There were female adornments made out of it three thousand years ago—those adornments found now attached to the mummies of Egypt. A great many commentators believe that my text means glass. What would we do without the crystal? The crystal in the window to keep out the storm and let in the day—the crystal over the watch defending its delicate machinery, yet allowing us to see the hour—the crystal of the telescope by which the astronomer brings distant worlds so near he can inspect them. Oh, the triumphs of the crystals in the celebrated windows of Rouen and Salisbury!

But there is nothing so transparent in a crystal as in our holy religion. It is a transparent religion. You put it to your eye and you see man—his sin, his soul, his destiny. You look at God and you see something of the grandeur of His character. It is a transparent religion. Infidels tell us it is opaque. Do you know why they tell us it is opaque? It is because they are blind. The natural man receiveth not the things of God because they are spiritually discerned. There is no trouble with the crystal; the trouble is with the eyes which try to look through it.

WE PRAY FOR VISION,

Lord, that our eyes might be opened. When the eye-salve cures our blindness then we find that religion is transparent.

It is a transparent Bible. All the mountains of the Bible come out: Sinai, the mountain of the law; Pisgah, the mountain of prospect; Olivet, the mountain of instruction; Calvary, the mountain of sacrifice. All the rivers of the Bible come out—Hidekel, or the river of paradisaical beauty; Jordan, or the river of holy chrism; Cherith, or the river of prophetic supply; Nile, or the river of palaces; and the pure river of life from under the throne clear as crystal. While reading this Bible after our eyes have been touched by grace, we find it all transparent, and the earth rocks, now with crucifixion agony and now with judgment terror, and Christ appears in some of His two hundred and fifty-six titles, as far as I can count them—the bread, the rock, the captain, the commander, the conqueror, the star, and on and beyond any capacity of mine to rehearse them. Transpa religion!

The providence that seemed dark before comes pellucid. Now you find God is not ing to put you down. Now you understand you lost that child and why you lost your p erty; it was to prepare you for eternal t ures. And why sickness came; it being precursor of immortal juvenescence. And you understand and tried to drive you hither and thither. was to put you in the glorious company of s men as Ignatius, who, when he went out t destroyed by the lions, said: "I am the w and the teeth of the wild beasts must first g me before I can become pure bread for J Christ;" or the company of such men as P carp, who when standing in the midst of amphitheatre waiting for the lions to come ou their cave and destroy him and the people in galleries jeering and shouting, "The lions Polycarp," replied: "Let them come on," then stooping down toward the cave where wild beasts were roaring to get out, "Let th come on." Ah, yes, it is persecution to put in glorious company; and while there are m things that you will have to postpone to future world for explanation, I tell you that the whole tendency of your religion to unr and explain and interpret and illumine irradiate. Job was right. It is a glorious tr parency. "The crystal cannot equal it."

WHY THEY LIED ABOUT YOU

III. I remark again that religion surpa the crystal

IN ITS BEAUTY.

That lump of crystal is put under the magn ing glass of the crystallographer and he see it indescribable beauty—snowdrift and splint of hoar-frost and corals and wreaths and s and crowns and castellations of conspicu beauty. The fact is that crystal is so beaut that I can think of but one thing in all the u verse that is so beautiful, and that is the ligion of the Bible. No wonder this Bible r resents that religion as the daybreak, as the ple-blossoms, as the glitter of a king's banq It is the joy of the whole earth.

People talk too much about their cross not enough about their crown. Do you kn the Bible mentions a cross but twenty-se times while it mentions a crown eighty tim Ask that old man what he thinks of religi He has been a close observer. He has b culturing an æsthetic taste. He has seen sunrises of a half century. He has been early riser. He has been an admirer of cam and corals and all kinds of beautiful thin Ask him what he thinks of religion, and he w tell you, "It is the most beautiful thing I e saw." "The crystal cannot equal it."

Beautiful in its symmetry. When it prese God's character it does not present Him as h ing love like a great protuberance on one s of His nature, but makes that love in harmo with His justice—a love that will accept those who come to Him, and a justice that w by no means clear the guilty. Beautiful religi in the sentiment it implants! Beautiful ligion in the hope it kindles! Beautiful religi in the fact that it proposes to garland a enthrone and emparadise an immortal spir Solomon says it is a lily. Paul says it is crown. The Apocalypse says it is a fount kissed of the sun. Ezekiel says it is a foliag cedar. Christ says it is a bridegroom come fetch home a bride. While Job in the t takes up a whole vase of precious stones—t topaz and the sapphire and the chrysopras and he takes out of this beautiful vase just o crystal and holds it up until it gleams in t warm light of the eastern sky, and he exclain "The crystal cannot equal it."

Oh, it is

it is not a stupid religion, it is not a toot less hag as some seem to have represent it; it is not a Meg Merrilies with shrivell arm come to scare the world. It is the fa daughter of God, heiress of all His wealth· cheek the morning sky; her voice the ic of the south wind; her step the dance of sea. Come and woo her. The Spirit and Bride say come, and whosoever will, let him e. Do you agree with Solomon and say it lily? Then pluck it and wear it over your t. Do you agree with Paul and say it is a vn? Then let this hour be your coronation. you agree with the Apocalypse and say it is pringing fountain? Then come and slake thirst of your soul. Do you believe with kiel and say it is a foliaged cedar? Then e under its shadow. Do you believe with st and say it is a bridegroom come to fetch e a bride? Then strike hands with your l the king while I pronounce you everlast- one. Or if you think with Job that it is a l, then put it on your hand like a ring, on neck like a bead, on your forehead like a while looking into the mirror of God's d you acknowledge "the crystal cannot l it."

Again, religion is superior to the crystal

ITS TRANSFORMATIONS.

e diamond is only a crystallization of coal. onate of lime rises till it becomes calcite or onite. Red oxide of copper crystallizes into s and octahedrons. Those crystals which n our persons and our homes and our ums have only been resurrected from forms were far from lustrous. Scientists for ages been examining these wonderful trans- ations. But I tell you in the Gospel of the of God there is a more wonderful trans- ation. Over souls by reason of sin black as and hard as iron God by His comforting stoops and says: "They shall be Mine in ay when I make up My jewels."

What," say you,

"WILL GOD WEAR JEWELRY?"

e wanted it He could make the stars of n His belt and have the evening cloud for andals of His feet; but He does not want adornment. He will not have that jewelry. n God wants jewelry He comes down and it out of the depths and darkness of sin. e souls are all crystallizations of mercy. uts them on and He wears them in the nce of the whole universe. He wears them e hand that was nailed, over the heart that pierced, on the temples that were stung. y shall be mine," saith the Lord, "in the hen I make up my jewels." Wonderful ormation!

There, behind the bars rison, but he shall reign with Christ for- Where sin abounded grace shall much abound. The carbon, the solitaire. "The l cannot equal it."

v, I have no liking for those people who ways enlarging in Christian meetings about early dissipation. Do not go into the ulars, my brothers. Simply say you were ut make no display of your ulcers. The tock in trade of some ministers and Chris- orkers seems to be their early crimes and ations. The number of pockets you picked e number of chickens you stole make very prayer-meeting rhetoric. Besides that, it rages other Christian people who never unk or stole anything. But it is pleasant ow that those who were farthest down een brought highest up. Out of infernal m into eternal liberty. Out of darkness ght. From coal to the solitaire. "The cannot equal it."

my friends, the chief transforming power Gospel will not be seen in this world and til heaven breaks upon the soul. When ght falls upon the soul then you will see rstals. Oh, what se jewels of eternity! I sometimes hear people representing heaven in a way that is far from attractive to me. It seems almost a vulgar heaven as they represent it with great blotches of color and bands of music making a deafening racket. John represents heaven as exquisitely beautiful. Three crystals. In one place he says: "Her light was like a precious stone, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "I saw a pure river from under the throne, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "Before the throne there was a sea of glass clear as crystal."

THREE CRYSTALS.

John says crystal atmosphere. That means health. Balm of eternal June. What weather after the world's east wind! No rack of storm clouds. One breath of that air will cure the worst tubercle. Crystal light on all the leaves. Crystal light shimmering on the topaz of the temples. Crystal light tossing in the plumes of the equestrians of heaven on white horses. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

John says crystal river. That means joy. Deep and ever rolling. Not one drop of the Thames or the Hudson or the Rhine to soil it. Not one tear of human sorrow to embitter it. Crystal, the rain out of which it was made. Crystal, the bed over which it shall roll and ripple. Crystal, its infinite surface. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

John says crystal sea. That means multitudinously vast. Vast in rapture. Rapture vast as the sea, deep as the sea, strong as the sea, ever changing as the sea. Billows of light. Billows of beauty, blue with skies that were never clouded and green with depths that were never fathomed. Arctics and Antarctics and Mediterraneans and Atlantics and Pacifics in crystalline magnificence. Three crystals. Crystal light falling on a crystal river. Crystal river rolling into a crystal sea. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

"Oh," says some one putting his hand over his eyes, "can it be that I who have been in so much sin and trouble will ever COME TO THOSE CRYSTALS?"

Yes, it may be—it will be. Heaven we must have whatever else we have or have not, and we come here to get it. "How much must I pay for it?" you say. You will pay for it just as much as the coal pays to become the diamond. In other words, nothing. The same Almighty power that makes the crystal in the mountain will change your heart which is harder than stone, for the promise is, "I will take away your stony heart and I will give you a heart of flesh."

"Oh," says some one, "it is just the doctrine I want; God is to do everything and I am to do nothing." My brother, it is not the doctrine you want. The coal makes no resistance. It hears the resurrection voice in the mountain and it comes to crystallization, but your heart resists. The trouble with you, my brother, is the coal wants to stay coal. I do not ask you to throw open the door and let Christ in. I only ask that you stop bolting it and barring it.

O my friends, we will have to get rid of our sins. I will have to get rid of my sins and you will have to get rid of your sins.

WHAT WILL WE DO WITH OUR SINS

among the three crystals? The crystal atmosphere will display our pollution. The crystal river would be befouled with our touch. The crystal sea would whelm us with its glistening surge. Transformation now or no transformation at all. Give sin full chance in your heart and the transformation will be downward instead of upward. Instead of a crystal it will be a cinder.

A BURNING BOAT.

In the days of Carthage a Christian girl was condemned to die for her faith, and a boat was bedaubed with tar and pitch and filled with combustibles and set on fire, and the Christian girl was placed in the boat, and the wind was off shore, and the boat floated away with its precious treasure. No one can doubt that boat landed at the shore of heaven. Sin wants to put you in a fiery boat and shove you off in an opposite direction—off from peace, off from God, off from heaven, everlastingly off; and the port toward which you would sail would be a port of darkness, and the guns that would greet you would be the guns of despair, and the flags that would wave at your arrival would be the black flags of death.

O my brother, you must either kill sin or sin will kill you. It is no wild exaggeration when I say that any man or woman that wants to be saved may be saved. Tremendous choice. A thousand people are choosing this moment between salvation and destruction, between light and darkness, between heaven and hell, between charred ruin and glorious crystallization.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Loan on a Brick Resulted in the Arraignment of a man in a New York police court last week. A physician, who invests the proceeds of his profession in speculative ventures, was induced to entertain a proposal for a loan on a gold brick. He was taken by two men to a room on Sixth Avenue, where what was represented to be a gold brick was exhibited to him. This was represented to be worth several thousand dollars, and the men said that they desired a loan of $1000, for which they would give the brick as security. The doctor was permitted to bore the brick in three different places, and at the United States Assay Office the scrapings were reported to be ninety per cent fine gold. Finally the doctor gave the men $1000 in cash, and received the brick. To his sorrow he subsequently learned that it was of base metal washed with gold. The doctor says that he was swindled by an exchange of the envelopes in which the scrapings of the brick were placed. The physician doubtless thought the precaution he took was sufficient to prevent his being outwitted, but he was baffled by superior cunning. Ministers of the Gospel and Church officers are often so outwitted by men who seek to advance their worldly interests by a false profession of religion. They pick up, parrot-like, the phraseology of Christians, which they offer as tests of their own condition (Isa. 30 : 1).

A Destitute Scotch Immigrant Recently heard of an inheritance to which he was entitled in a very remarkable manner. He came to this country two years ago to make his fortune, but was unable to obtain work. For a time he had employment with a truckman named Bedloe, who has stables near the Bible House, New York, but his fondness for Scotch whiskey soon caused him to lose his place, and he drifted into a furniture house on Eighteenth Street, where he was employed as porter. Becoming tired of this work, he made his way to Chicago, where he went from bad to worse, working at odd times, drinking hard, and spending many nights in the station-house. Afterward he drifted to Philadelphia, where he became so utterly destitute that he had to beg his bread. Some one gave him a parcel of broken meat. He ate it, and having nothing to do, sat reading the copy of the Ledger, in which it was wrapped. There he saw his own name, William Anderson, among the advertised letters, and, while doubting that it was for him, he went to the Post Office and applied for it. It was several weeks old, and had been sent to his old address in New York. Though the number was correct, the street was given as "North Eighteenth Street," instead of "East Eighteenth," and the envelope for this reason was indorsed, "Try Philadelphia." It was this letter, from a firm of attorneys at Inverness, which told Anderson of the death of his father in December, leaving him the sole heir to the property, amounting to £6000. He sailed for Scotland on February 6th to claim his inheritance. He showed no disposition to continue his miserable life here after he heard a fortune was awaiting him. In this he differed from many who listen to the offer of eternal riches made to them in the Gospel. They are content with their present condition of spiritual destitution (Rev. 3 : 17, 18).

THE CZAR AND THE BABE.

By Rev Charles F. Deems. D.D., LL.D.

ON the 17th of March, 1855, I was going from Petersburg, Va., to my home in North Carolina. In the car was a gentleman with New York papers bearing the intelligence of the recent death of Nicholas, Autocrat of all the Russias. He was gone. A man of great stature, of iron will, of vast energies, a born king, ruling fifty millions by his simple word, he had bowed to destiny and death, and dropped the sceptre which swayed an empire.

He had died at a crisis in which he was the most conspicuous and important personage among men, at such a juncture in affairs as will draw an arresting line across the page of human history. He had brought thousands into fortified towns, and stretched tents and camp-fires along miles of hills and valleys. The stride of his ambition had made troops of orphan children and thrilled the nation with woe. He was known to all the world, and his history, his words, his deeds, his policy, were the study of all who read or thought. But he had gone.

Europe stood still and held its breath as the curtain dropped upon the colossal actor on the stage trembling with the thunder of artillery and red with the gore of the gallant. And then the cabinets of all governments, and the traders upon the marts of the busy nations, began industriously to calculate the probable effects of this great departure upon all the operations of mankind; and Russia was preparing to bury "the father" with mingled barbaric pomp and civilized splendor.

I was not indifferent to the importance of such an event as the death of the emperor; but it stirred my heart very little. It was far off.

Twenty miles further south I heard of another death. In this case it was a babe, only ten months old. He was heir to no great estate or title. He was known to very few, and very few had any interest in him—he had never uttered a word. He was in no one's way. His life made no great promise. He had always been delicate. He was a merely intelligent, "pretty little fellow," as his father was fond of calling him. He was dead. How sad, how very sad a thought was this to me! He was our little George.

All the potentates of Europe might have died and my heart felt no pain. But this was a near grief. This was the first departure from the little flock. There was no pomp at his funeral. He lay calm and lovely in his little coffin—beautifully dead. His brothers and his little sister stood in the awe which the first invasion of the invisible feet makes in a family. A few friends went from the humble house of the bereaved living to the humble resting-place of the shrouded dead. No retinue, no plumes, no emblazonry of ostentatious sorrow marked the child's removal to his last home. But he was our babe.

How little thought his mother of the grand griefs of a European empire! Her little kingdom was darkened. While we had read accounts of the slaughters which marked the Crimean campaign, and shuddered at the desolations they must have brought thousands of homes, none of the thrilling reports had penetrated and agonized us like the sight of our own dead. Nothing I ever read, or saw, or felt, transfixed me with such cold pain as the kiss of the little hands folded over the breast of our serene and breathless little boy. They were beautiful hands. How often I had admired them as he clapped them when his earnest gaze had brightened into a smile and broadened into infantile glee! How often had they pressed their soft little palms upon my aching head, and buried their little dimples under my chin!

Death had not discolored the lovely flesh, but had made it clearer and finer, as if it had been purged of all taints of corruption. And so I could hardly believe him dead. But when I stooped to kiss those hands for the last time, they met my lips with such an unexpected chill that I felt stricken. It was as though I had been stabbed in the heart with a dagger of ice.

Oh, how different the far and near! A quarter of a century lies between that death and this writing, but that dead babe to-day has more power over me than any living man. He walks the streets with me. He goes to all the funerals of infants. Before his death I did not know how to talk at the funeral of a babe. Now I know at least how to sympathize with the parents. When a man comes into my house and tells me with quivering lips that there is a babe lying dead in his home, I go with him, led by the hand of a little child whose mortal body was buried a quarter of a century ago.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Worse than a Wrecked Ship.—Mr. Hill Said at a recent meeting: "A friend of mine, who is a large shipowner, lost one of his ships at sea. I went to sympathize with him, as the loss amounted to $40,000. When I spoke about it, he replied, 'Never mind the loss; I can bear that and another $40,000 to that, and another $40,000 to that, without feeling it much; but (opening the drawing-room door and pointing to his wife lying on a sofa helplessly intoxicated) if I could remedy this I would give all I have in the world.'"

How a Cobbler Got a Good Coat.—The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "A Christian worker once enlisted under the banner of Christ a non-church-going shoemaker by a prompt testimony of the goodness of the Lord. The worker inquired, 'Why don't you come to church?' 'I have not got a coat,' the cobbler replied. 'I fear, then, that you don't serve a good master; for my part I don't know a Christian who has not got a good Sabbath coat to his back.' This clear and emphatic reply made the cobbler come out and attend church just as he was, and it was not long before he had a capital coat, and the knowledge of salvation through Christ who died for him. God's wardrobe and larder are sufficiently large to supply all who trust in Him."

Husband and Wife Made One in Christ.—Mr. Jack related: "A husband and his wife, who evidently belonged to the better class of society, came to a little meeting where the message of salvation was proclaimed. The wife was much moved. A worker seeing her emotions spoke to her, and had the pleasure of hearing her decide for Christ. Immediately the light had entered her own heart, she began to be concerned about her husband. The wife told, with loving tenderness, the decision she had come to, and was able to persuade her husband to return to another meeting at which the Lord opened his eyes and gave him grace to decide for Jesus. They are now both living to the 'praise of Him who called them out of nature's darkness into His marvellous light.'"

Three Thousand Conversions in a Moment.— Mr. Oatts related: "An evangelist was travelling in the north of Scotland. In the same compartment of the railway carriage there was a minister who did not believe in sudden conversion. They both had some distance to travel together, and entered into conversation till, almost insensibly, they glided into a discussion upon sudden conversion. Their talk was brought to a point by the evangelist saying, 'Well, sir, take your Bible, and search for all the cases of gradual conversion mentioned in it, and I will do the same for the cases of sudden conversion.' At the end of half an hour the evangelist asked, 'How many have you got?' 'None.' 'In Acts 2 you will find that three thousand were instantaneously converted at one time.'"

Impressive Dream of a Swedish Lady.—Mr. Napier said: "A lady in Sweden took charge of some thirty poor children for the love of God. There was one of them a poor, decrepit, ulcerated, loathsome child; she could not love it, notwithstanding she gave it special attention and care, but the same repulsive feeling continued in her heart toward the poor child. One day the lady was sitting in the garden with t child on her knees; she fell asleep and dream that she had changed places with the child, a that the Lord held her in His lap, and said, ' I can bear so patiently and lovingly with one full of sin as you, why cannot you love t child?' The lady awoke, and acting on the i pulse of the moment, bent down and kissed t child, who returned the caress with the smile an angel. The little one felt that she was n loved. Love brought forth love."

A Jew Saved through Open-Air Preaching Mr. Matthew said: "When I first came to t country I heard an old gentleman preaching the open-air. He was standing on a chair, a had no large choir to support him. His the was 'Jesus,' nothing else. I went on my wa but could not get rid of that name 'Jesus;' never left me. I prayed to God as a Jew to sa me from the annoyance, but it only beca worse. Next Sunday I was irresistibly drawn hear that old gentleman in the open-air, a again for seven Sundays I listened to the Wo spoken by him. I never shook off the impr sion the Holy Spirit made upon me throu his instrumentality. That gentleman is now heaven, and died without knowing that a J was converted through his preaching. 'Let not be weary in well doing, for in due season shall reap, if we faint not.'" (Gal. 6 : 9).

An Unknown Gem for Christ's Crown.—M Aaron Matthew related: "I visited Dunc about eighteen years ago, and preached in t church of which Mr. Lund was the pastor. delivered the message of my Divine Master, a went on my way, thinking no more about it. was at Bishop Auckland one day, and on t way to a Wesleyan chapel there, I saw a gent man nodding and smiling in my direction. could not think it was to me; but when caught my eye, he came running across t street, and said, 'Mr. Matthew, do you reme ber preaching in Mr. Lund's church in Dunc some time ago?' 'Yes.' 'That sermon w the means of my conversion to Christ. Goo by! I have to catch my train.' Off he we without another word; and I have never se him since; and I do not know his name. I l sight of everything that night but the one gr fact, that the Lord had given me a soul."

A Safe Voyage up Channel.—The Rev. J Sloan said: "I remember coming up Chan once on board a fine Indian merchantm When the sun set, lights appeared on every si and to those not acquainted with the rule of t road it seemed as if it was impossible for c ship to avoid coming into collision with some the other vessels. How was it that we did cape? On the top-gallant forecastle a man w keeping a lookout right ahead; he look neither to the right nor left, but straight bef the bow. On the bridge the captain and secon mate had night-glasses and kept a constant loo out on every side. We knew by experie that we could trust them with our lives, and tired to our staterooms confiding in them. I similar way, when the night of sorrow or p overtakes us, we should confide ourselves to t Captain of our salvation, the Lord Jesus, w will take every care of us, and do it better th we can ourselves."

How a Lady's Indignation Ended.—Mr. G diner related: "We had a series of Gos temperance meetings, and the blessing of t Lord attended our efforts. At one meeting, chairman asked those who knew that their s were forgiven to stand up. Two young wom among others responded; and they were asl to lead in prayer. A lady whose husband w much given to drink saw them, and remarked herself, 'How dare these women stand up th saying their sins are forgiven when they owing me money; besides that, they are go to pray for me!' The lady at once left meeting in great tumult of mind, which resul in deep anxiety about her soul; she return another night and found rest in Jesus. Wh the lady informed her husband that she wa Christian, he got angry and forbade her to tend any more of the meetings; but she declined to obey. This inflamed his anger still more, and he went to a tavern at the entrance of our hall, so that he might get up his courage to insult his wife as she left the hall. Having sat too long over his cups, he missed his wife, but he went home and threatened to drag her out of bed. The wife did not speak back as she used to do, but patiently bore his threats in silence. At length she asked, 'Will you let me speak?' 'No; I'll kill you.' She put her arms round his neck and said, 'Is this to be the end of it?' The tender action and voice touched his heart, and made him break down. The next night he went to the meeting, where he was awakened to a sense of his sins. In his distress he cried to the Lord, who revealed Himself to him as his Saviour at once."

A French Knife-Grinder's Happy Death.—Mr. McCall, of Paris, relates: "A knife-grinder came for bodily healing to our dispensary. He was excessively ignorant, so that when the Gospel was preached to him he did not understand it. His sickness was incurable, so he was sent to the hospital, where he read the Bible which he got from us. The nurses were nuns, and were very kind to him, but cruel to his soul. In a few days they told him, 'You are going to die; we must send for a priest.' 'No, I don't want a priest; I want some one else.' 'Who is he?' 'The gentleman at the dispensary.' When the nuns understood that he wanted to see a Protestant, and above all an evangelical, they immediately sent him from the hospital to his own poor house. He sent for us, and we visited him in his own home. He was dying in poverty, wretchedness, and filth, but there was no whine for bodily aid. He wanted to tell us that he was saved. He said, 'Now, sir, I can see clearly that we can be saved only by the meritorious death of Jesus.' His last word was 'Jesus.' There was a large attendance at the funeral, and an earnest pastor had the opportunity of preaching the Gospel to the mourners."

PREDICTED CHANGES IN THE NATURAL WORLD.

(A Sequel to "The Future Temple," page 87.)

By Rev. J. R. Graves, LL.D.*

The Living Streams—Literal Fulfilment Necessary—The Dead Sea to Become a Living One—The Tongue of the Red Sea.

THE LIVING STREAMS.

THE next vision shown the prophet, after the coming of Christ and the completion of this glorious Temple, was the bursting forth of two perennial streams of water from near the Temple. It is thus foretold by the prophet:

"And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea; in summer and in winter shall it be" (Zech. 14 : 8).

Ezekiel more specifically describes the one flowing down from the mountain into the Dead Sea, and its effects: "Afterward He brought me again unto the door of the house; and, behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward; for the forefront of the house stood toward the East and the waters came down from under, from the right side of the house, at the south side of the altar. . . . Then said He unto me, these waters issue out toward the East country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea; which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. And it shall come to pass, that everything that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the rivers shall come, shall live; and there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither: for they shall be healed; and everything shall live whither the river cometh. . . . But the miry places thereof and the marshes thereof shall not be healed; they shall be given to salt" (Ezek. 17 : 1, 8, 9, 11).

Can language be more

than this? Is there a figure of speech in it? Are not the places well known—"Jerusalem," "the plain eastward," and the "Dead Sea"—the salt-bituminous waters, destitute of life—its salt marshes on the south of it? This is demonstrative that the language of the prophecy is to be construed literally.

The reader may see that this prophecy is to be literally fulfilled, and that the fulfilment of another, if possible, more singular and improbable, depends upon it, by looking at a map of the locality of the Dead Sea; also of the Red Sea and its peculiar northern formation, called "The Tongue," also the Gulf of Akabah, and the "River of Egypt" with its "seven mouths," noted in the Scriptures of truth, touching which changes are foretold.

It certainly is not impossible for God to cause a large spring to break forth from under the threshold of the temple in Jerusalem; and nothing improbable, if we refer it to natural causes, as the earthquake that is to break up the Mount of Olivet, running one part of it northward and the other southward, opening a valley from the west to the east as far as Azal [Nazal ?].* This valley through the cleft of the mountain opens a way for the stream that is rapidly augmented by the springs that burst forth from the rent bowels of Mount Olivet, as it rolls down this valley into the Dead Sea.

A MIGHTY RIVER.

Dr. Barclay, resident missionary and explorer of Jerusalem, in his great work, of this river says:

"Should this river rush immediately down this valley—the Wady Anak Nazal—into the Dead Sea it would produce a succession of rapids, cascades and cataracts unequalled in all the world, for the distance being only fifteen or twenty miles, and the difference in altitude nearly 4000 feet [i.e., from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea], the rate of descent could not be less than an average of 200 feet per mile, or one foot in twenty-six—a fall of 4000 feet in twenty miles! while the entire fall in the Mississippi River, throughout its whole course of 2000 miles, is only 1575 feet!

What a vast inconceivable power for the propulsion of machinery! What teeming luxuriance must crown the banks of this fertilizing and vivifying stream, and especially if the waters be made to meander along the declivities of the once frightful and barren and desolate deserts! How surprisingly beautiful the ever-green landscape in which the life-giving river sweetly meanders, where grow all trees for food, whose leaf fadeth not, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed—bringing forth new fruit according to its months—the fruit thereof for meat and the leaf for medicine! (Isaiah 46 : 12.) Then indeed will the wilderness and the solitary place be glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose. These are the gladdening waters of which the Psalmist spoke in vision."

THE DEAD SEA.

The natural result of this large body of fresh, living waters, with the large increase from all the other streams flowing into this sea, swollen by the bursting of springs all over Palestine, occasioned by the return of the latter rains, would fill its deep basin and increase its length southward, until its swollen volume would finally break forth, and, sweeping the sands from its old channel, carry them on with it into the Gulf of Akabah, and by this means its salt and bitter waters would be eventually carried into the Red Sea, and the waters of the Dead Sea be healed, and become cool, sweet, living waters. In this way the glowing prophecies with respect to this wilderness of Zin and desert land will be literally fulfilled, for they can be fulfilled in no other way, which are now interpreted figuratively; e.g.: "In the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert, and the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water."

If this river is navigable, as it doubtless is designed by God to be, the Dead Sea will indeed be a haven for ships of all nations, and the wealth of the East and the commerce of the mighty West will be laid down at the feet of the new commercial city which is to be built at the head and on the eastern shore of the present Dead Sea, when the Suez Canal is destroyed.

THE TONGUE OF THE RED SEA.

There is another prophecy that must be literally fulfilled or the Scriptures rejected as unauthentic: "And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian Sea; and with His mighty wind shall He shake His hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dryshod. And there shall be a highway for the remnant of His people, which shall be left from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that He came up out of the land of Egypt" (Isa. 11 : 15, 16).

If the reader will refer to the map, he will be struck with the peculiar formation of the northern part of the Red Sea. It has somewhat the appearance of the head of an animal—the Gulf of Akabah its upper jaw, and the Gulf of Suez its tongue outstretched to lap the waters of the Mediterranean.

This western gulf, God calls "the tongue of the Egyptian Sea," which He declares He will, after the Advent and before the restoration of the ten lost tribes, "utterly destroy," which certainly means a permanent filling up of its bed, which is now quite shallow, so that there will evermore be dry land where this gulf now is, and that there shall be a highway [a railroad ?] for the remnant of His people, who are left from Assyria, etc. Now, God can do this by a slight physical change, the instantaneous work of an earthquake, uplifting this gulf or "tongue of the sea," or He can allow it to be accomplished by the laws governing currents and deposits.

Any one familiar with these will easily perceive that the vast "mountains of sand" that will be swept out of the river channel of the old Jordan, carried into the Gulf of Akabah, and thence pushed by the mighty current of this river, flowing out of the Dead Sea into the Red Sea, and this sand carried by the eddying waters back into the Gulf of Suez, will very soon fill its bed with sand and dry up, without the interposition of a miracle.

THE SUEZ CANAL DESTROYED.

This prophecy literally fulfilled, and if fulfilled at all, it must be literally, will by "utterly destroying the tongue of the Egyptian Sea" utterly destroy that work of man, "the Suez Canal," and bring to naught the design of man to bring the wealth of the East, past Jerusalem and Palestine, and lay it down at the gates of western Tarshish. As it was in the days of Solomon, the wealth of the nations was laid at his feet—for ships from the East and from the West brought the commerce of the world to Palestine; so will it be, only in a far greater degree, in the Saturday of the world's week—the returned Jews will handle the commerce of the world.

The Dead Sea will become a harbor for vessels—a haven for ships—by means of the river flowing from it into the Red Sea, and Zebulon, whose portion will be bounded by the Mediterranean Sea on the west, and by the Gulf of Akabah on the east, would have seaports on the former and a port of entry on the latter, so that in the new division of the land will then in very deed "dwell at the haven of the sea, and be for a haven of ships," and "suck the abundance of the seas and of treasures hid in the sand." This never has been fulfilled in any sense, and cannot be until the redivision of the land and the conversion of the Dead Sea into "a haven for ships."

It seems to us that these Scriptures are, of themselves, sufficient to convince every one that these prophecies must have a literal fulfilment.

* Quite a large river burst forth from a mountain in Armenia a few years ago, and not long since a large stream of water made its appearance in South America after an earthquake. Dr. Barclay says that it is a little singular that a few yards below the surface, among some broken rocks in the valley opposite to Jerusalem, the ripple of a stream can now be heard.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Proposal to Establish a New Department is made in a bill introduced into the House by Mr. Hopkins, which has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Labor. It is proposed by the bill to establish a Department of Labor Statstics, under a Commissioner empowered to "acquire all useful information upon the subject of labor, its relations to capital, and the means of promoting the material, social, religious, and intellectual prosperity of the laboring men and women." There can be no question as to the utility of such an inquiry, and it ought to lead to the acquisition of information of vital importance to the community, especially as regards the liquor question. Whether a government department is the best agency to employ, is a different question.

The New Attempt to Settle the Tariff Question, by a horizontal reduction, which Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is making, excites determined opposition. His bill proposes to make a general reduction of twenty per cent except on certain articles for which a special rate is fixed. His object appears to be to avoid the interminable debates, and the interested opposition which would be stirred up by an effort to reform the tariff in detail. It is a rough-and-ready method of reducing the tariff, which must necessarily involve some anomalies, but which will certainly effect the reduction promised, but not given by the Forty-seventh Congress. The exceptions Mr. Morrison proposes to the twenty per cent reduction are important. Among them are the articles placed on the free list, which include iron, copper, lead and nickel ores, coal, timber and jute butts, dextrine, cements and the products of coal tar. The clause which is likely to be most strenuously opposed is the following: No duty shall, after the 1st of July, 1884, be levied, collected, or paid in excess of forty per cent ad valorem or its equivalent on cotton and cotton goods; fifty per cent ad valorem or its equivalent on metals, and sixty per cent ad valorem on wool and woollen goods. Provided that nothing in this act shall operate to reduce the duty above imposed on any article below the rate at which such said articles were severally dutiable under the Morrill tariff of 1861. It will be seen that Mr. Morrison has tried to disarm opposition by giving the manufacturers cheap raw material and by fixing the minimum rate at that of the ante-war period.

The Anxiety felt Throughout the Country as to the fate of Lieutenant Greely and his brave companions in the Arctic, and the desire that the nation shall keep its promise of sending them relief, appears to find little sympathy in Congress. Through the whole of last week no progress was made in granting the appropriation. Senator Ingalls, indeed, was indignant because the Secretary of the Navy has purchased a vessel without waiting for the Senate to finish its debate. It was explained, however, that the Secretary had acted from motives of humanity, and that he and Secretary Lincoln were prepared to pay for the vessel if Congress declined to indorse the purchase. The Greely party were led to expect that relief would be sent them in 1882 and 1883, but they did not receive it in either year. They were ordered to commence, in September last, a long and perilous journey homeward to a point where provisions would be stored for them, but when they arrive there they will find that the promised provisions have not been sent. The knowledge of these facts and of the urgent necessity existing for prompt action to rescue the party from a horrible death should lead the Senators to hurry through with their talking, lest they delay the expedition on which valuable lives depend. While they are debating points of order and standing on their dignity, these explorers may be dying of starvation.

The Republican Party in New York has gained nothing by the new arrangement which, it was thought, would effectually reform it. The labors of the Committee of Eighteen have either been thwarted or made subservient to the old control. Mr. John J. O'Brien is practically the manager, the County Committee having elected him temporary chairman. That fact is a sufficient proof of the failure of the attempt to reform the party in the State. If any doubt still remained it would be removed by the behavior of the heelers at the meeting of the committee last week. Their hisses, howls, and cat-calls, and the disorder which prevailed, proved that the old methods will continue. With John J. O'Brien in command at the Republican headquarters, John Kelly as Democratic boss at Tammany Hall, and William P. Kirk, the liquor-seller, presiding in the Board of Aldermen, the members of either party who are hopeful of better methods in politics must be more sanguine than sagacious.

The Floods in Many Districts of the Country caused appalling suffering and a heavy loss of property last week. From all parts of Ohio, from Wheeling, W. Va., from Pittsburg, Pa., Madison, Ind., Louisville, Ky., and St. Louis, Mo., come reports of desolation. Early in the week the Ohio was stated to be rising rapidly, and in Cleveland and Cincinnati precautions were taken in the expectation of a flood. On Tuesday the river at Cincinnati rose to a height of fifty-four feet, and as it was raining then business was partially suspended, and all unemployed men were set to work removing goods from the points of danger. The next day the river rose to above sixty-one feet, and only two railroad companies were able to receive freight. On Saturday the water reached sixty-four feet, only twenty-four inches below the mark of last year. The losses, however, in personal property and furniture will not be so serious as last year, owing to the precautions taken. At Wheeling, W. Va., the suffering appears to have been worst. On Wednesday all the lower portions of the city were deluged, and the people were living in the upper floors of their houses and going to and fro in skiffs. The railroads were under water, and no mails were received or dispatched. The gas was extinguished, and the work of rescue was carried on in Egyptian darkness. The next day increased the horror. An observer, telegraphing from Wheeling on Thursday night, thus describes the scene: "At the windows of every house were men, women and children who hailed passing skiffs and boats, and implored aid. The plunge of heavy logs of wood through the windows of deserted houses, the crashing and crushing of blocks of ice, the surging of drift-wood, the displacement of outhouses and other small buildings, the floating fencing and dwellings, the shrieking women and crying children, all served to make a scene that one wants to see but once in his lifetime. All this was intensified by a steady downpour of drenching rain, which only added to the awful gloom." Countless houses were overturned by the torrent, and it is feared many lives must have been lost. In adjacent towns the horror of fire was added to that of flood. The gas house and several factories were fired by slaking lime, and were totally destroyed. The waters receded a little on Friday, and the work of relieving the destitute and homeless commenced. Although $6000 was promptly raised, it was insufficient, and an appeal for aid has been issued by the mayor. Similar reports come from the other cities mentioned, and Pittsburg, especially, is suffering terribly. Nearly six thousand houses in that city were said to be under water on Saturday. It was then feared that the climax had not been reached in the Lower Ohio and Mississippi, and the region south of Louisville, and that between Cairo and Vicksburg were in imminent danger. On Monday the waters were reported as still rising.

An Influential Prohibition Meeting was held in Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass., on February 5th. Six hundred ladies and gentlemen from all parts of Massachusetts assembled, in answer to a call of the committee having in charge the movement to promote the prohibition of the alcoholic drink traffic by a constitutional amendment. Dr. Daniel Dorchester said that a sharp, energetic campaign for constitutional prohibition had been carried on all over the State within the past six weeks with unexpectedly flattering results. The Rev. A. A. Plumb, D.D., of Boston, was chosen president. A plan of action was reported to the effect that if the prayer of the prohibitionists for such legislation as they desire is not granted by the present Legislature, then in 1885 a campaign shall be inaugurated to secure as large a petition as possible, which would bring the question directly before the people for their vote. A contingent fund of $10,000 is to be raised for the purpose of carrying out this policy.

The Special Services Conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison at St. Louis, Mo., are already fruitful in results. The St. Louis correspondent of a Boston journal, in describing the meetings, says: "Thomas Harrison has been here a week now, and it is claimed that there are already nearly two hundred conversions. He succeeded from the very start. The first man to kneel at the altar, 'with his face buried in his hands,' was a member of a church whose pastor had previously made the cheerful remark that he thought Harrison possessed of the devil. Others knelt beside him, and every night since scores have been at the altar. Yesterday the audiences were greater than at any of the previous week meetings, and they bid fair to go right on increasing. Just as it has been elsewhere, people come from all parts of the surrounding country. In personal appearance the evangelist has changed somewhat since last year. His face has aged very much, and he looks as if he would soon wear and tear himself away. It is hardly short of a miracle that his little body has endured the strain thus long."

The Gallant Efforts for the Rescue of Life at the Gay Head disaster of January 16th have been publicly recognized. The Massachusetts Humane Society has awarded to the crew of the revenue cutter Dexter $200, to be divided among them. They have also awarded to Lieutenant John U. Rhodes, of the Dexter, the society's gold medal for his heroic exertions; to Captain Eric Gabrielson, of the same vessel, the society's silver medal. The society has also awarded to each of the Gay Head Indians who went in a boat to rescue the survivors, a silver medal and $25; to the members of another crew, each a bronze medal and $15. The certificate of the society and a cash award are given to Light-house-keeper Pease, the Rev. A. P. Shields and several women of Gay Head for their heroic efforts in saving life. Money awards from $5 to $10 each are given to a large number of other persons on the island. The fund for Lieutenant Rhodes, of the cutter Dexter, has reached $2001, and the Gay Head Indian fund now amounts to $4251.

The Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Ohio assembles this day at Dayton, and will continue in session four days. This is the seventeenth annual convention, and it promises to be of an exceedingly interesting character. Rev. Arthur Mitchell, D.D., of Cleveland, Rev. H. F. Williams, former State Secretary, L. D. Wishart, International College Secretary, R. R. McBurney, Secretary New York City Association, and other prominent workers will be present and take part in the programme. Many important phases of association work will be considered, such as Bible Study, Young Men's Meetings, Boy's Work, Reading Rooms, Work among Railroad Men and in Colleges, State and International Work, etc.

Mr. Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, is now laboring in Montana. He thus writes to the Witness of his work: "I have been working in Montana going on three months. I have been working in Butte City two months, one of the richest mining camps in Montana, over three thousand men averaging $5.50 per day; the most of this is spent for whiskey and gambling, the gambling-house being as public as a business house, on account of being licensed. I started a reform club and reading room; about five hundred have joined themselves together as a band of co-workers in this cause. Those men were all low down by drinking and gambling, but now they are happy with their families in the new life. I am now working in Helena at present. I have been speaking to crowded houses every night. Hundreds have signed the pledge, and are now going to the house of God. For the last fifteen years the dance and gambling-house was their home. I meet men here from all parts of America, that have come here to make their fortune, but being entangled with bad associates they made their misfortune."

"Billy" McGlory, the Proprietor of the Notorious resort in New York known as Armory Hall, was sentenced last week to six months' imprisonment, to the astonishment of himself and his friends. The place has enjoyed an immunity from interference so long, that the arrest and punishment of its proprietor has naturally caused general surprise. Some earnest temperance workers visited McGlory in prison, and showed him much kindness. He was deeply moved by the unexpected attention, and vowed that if he escaped punishment he would become a total abstainer, and would work in the temperance cause. Mr. Gibbs, the president of the Manhattan Temperance Association, exerted himself in McGlory's behalf, and stood beside him in the dock when he was called up for sentence, while his quondam friends deserted him. The judge, however, appears to have been influenced by the fact, which could not be truthfully denied, that whiskey was sold in McGlory's place after his license was withdrawn, and that he had shown no disposition to reform until he was locked up. There can be no doubt as to the character of McGlory's Hall. If, when he is liberated, McGlory closes it or uses it for a better purpose he will serve the cause of morality and give practical evidence of the sincerity of his own reformation. Mr. Gibbs informs us that his confidence in McGlory's reformation is unabated.

The Success of the Services in Cooper Union, conducted by Mr. C. W. Sawyer, continues and increases. At a special meeting held on Sunday, February 3d, the hall was crowded, even the aisles being full of standing people. Many of the early friends of the Park Theatre and Cooper Union religious meetings occupied seats on the platform. Mr. William E. Dodge gave a general outline of the work accomplished by the meetings. Their principal object, he said, is to bring together in a familiar, home-like way the thousands of strangers who are continually coming here from all countries. He wished the meetings would be kept up this year as they were last, and prove as great a blessing. He hoped those who were members of and had churches to go to would not occupy the seats in Cooper Union, but leave them for those who had no other place to worship. The work costs $10,000 a year.

The Rev. John S. Inskip is Suffering from a relapse. The journal of which he is editor makes the following announcement: "Brother Inskip is very ill at Ocean Grove. He, however, recognizes his friends. He extended a cordial greeting to Rev. Dr. Lowrey, who recently called upon him. There can be no doubt that matters have reached a very serious crisis in his condition. He seems happy and triumphant. He sends greeting to all, and his message to the Church is, 'All is well!'"

The Annual Meeting of the Association of Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State will be held at Buffalo, February 21–24. There are now about one hundred associations in this State, and from three to four hundred delegates are expected to be present. The Buffalo associations are making preparations to entertain all accredited delegates, and reduced rates will be secured on the railroads and at the hotels. A welcome social reception is to be given in the new building of the Buffalo association. The increasing interest in this work, the growth of the numerical as well as financial strength of these associations, make the annual gatherings increasingly valuable. Further information in regard to this meeting can be obtained by addressing Rev. George A. Hall, State Secretary Y. M. C. A., Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Aid for Mr. McAll's Paris Mission is Being obtained with considerable success in this country. At the annual meeting of the Brooklyn Auxiliary to the mission, held last week, it was stated that the collections of that auxiliary last year amounted to $1698.66. Dr. Chamberlain said that out of a population of 300,000,000 on the continent of Europe, 74,000,000 are now Protestants. The first station was established in January, 1872, in Paris, by Mr. McAll. Now there are eighty stations and thirteen thousand two hundred sittings. The expense of the entire work has been only $61,000. Miss Elizabeth R. Beach, one of the most devoted friends and advocates of the mission in this country, was one of the victims in the recent disaster of the City of Columbus.

A Suicide Averted. The Following Incident was related at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting last week: A young woman called at a minister's house, and being asked what led her to call, as she was an entire stranger, she told her history, and a sad one it was. Three years in prison, and now just released, with no money, no friends, no home, no character, and no bread, she was wandering toward the river with evil intent, when she saw the minister's name on the door, and by a mysterious influence rang the bell at the door, and was soon in his presence. The minister gladly pointed her to the Friend of the friendless, and showed something of the Saviour's love in his care for her. She was led as a sinner to the Redeemer, and is now giving evidence by her quiet, Godly life of a change within.

HIGH DOCTRINE AND BROAD DOCTRINE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.*

"All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." —JOHN 6: 37.

Two Great Truths — No Need to Reconcile Friends—Waiting for the Pilot—Two Jewels to be Worn Together—Night in the Highlands—I. The Eternal Purpose — The Hooks in the Fence—Some People will Surely Come—What is Done by the Father and the Son—Saved Because they Come—II. The Everlasting Gospel —Generous as to Character—No Limit—As to Time—An Aged Convert's Threat—The Personality—A Captain Surprised on the Amazon—Baskets Wanted for a Pear Tree.

THESE two sentences have been looked upon as representing two sides of Christian doctrine. They enable us to see it from two standpoints—the Godward and the manward. The first sentence contains what some call high doctrine. If by "high" they mean "glorious toward God," I fully agree with them; for it is a grand, God-honoring truth which our Lord Jesus declares in these words, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." Some have styled this side of truth Calvinistic; but while it is true that Calvin taught it, so also did Augustine, and Paul, and our Lord Himself, whose words these are. However, I will not quarrel with those who see in this sentence a statement of the great truth of predestinating grace.

The second sentence sets forth blessed, encouraging, evangelical doctrine, and is in effect a promise and an invitation, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." This is a statement without limitation of any kind; it has been thought to leave the free grace of God open to the free will of man, so that whosoever pleases may come and may be sure that he will not be refused. We have no permission to pare down either sentence, nor is there the slightest need to do so. The first sentence appears to me to say that God has chosen a people, and has given these people to Christ, and these people must and shall come to Christ, and so shall be saved. The second truth declares that every man who comes to Christ shall be saved, since he shall not be cast out, and that implies that he shall be received and accepted. These are let us carry them both with us, and they will balance each other.

I was once asked to reconcile these two statements, and I answered, "No, I never reconcile friends." These two passages never fell out; they are perfectly agreed. It is folly to imagine a difference, and then set about removing it. It is like making a man of straw, and then going out to fight with it. The grand declaration of the purpose of God that He will save His own is quite consistent with the widest declaration that whosoever will come to Christ shall be saved. The pity is that it ever should be thought difficult to hold both truths; or that, supposing there is a difficulty, we should have thought it our duty to remove it. Believe me, my dear hearers, the business of removing religious difficulties is the least remunerative labor under heaven. The truest way is to accept the difficulty wherever you find it in God's Word, and to exercise your faith upon it. It is unreasonable to suppose that faith is to be exempted from trials; all the other graces are exercised, and why should not faith be put to the test? I often feel a joy within my spirit in having to believe what I cannot understand; and sometimes when I have to say to myself, "How can it be?" I find a joy in replying that it is so written, and therefore it must be so. Instead of all reasoning stands the utterance of God. Our Father speaks, and doubts are silenced; His Spirit writes, and we believe.

I feel great pleasure in gliding down the river of revelation, upon a voyage of discovery, and

* Mr. Spurgeon having fully recovered from his recent illness has returned from Mentone, and preached in the Tabernacle last Sunday.

hour by hour obtaining fresh knowledge of divine truth; but where I come to an end of progress, and see my way blocked up by a sublimely awful difficulty, I find equal pleasure in casting anchor under the lee of the obstacle, and waiting till what next to do. When we cannot go through a truth, we may be led over it, or round it; and what matters? Let us not therefore run our heads against difficulties of our own invention, and certainly not against those which God has seen fit to leave for us.

Take, then, these two truths, and know that they are equally precious portions of one harmonious whole. Let us not quibble over them, or indulge a foolish favoritism for one and a prejudice against the other; but let us receive both with a candid, large-hearted love of truth, such as children of God should exhibit. We are not called upon to explain, but to accept. Let us believe if we cannot reconcile. Here are two jewels, let us wear them both. The two truths of my text are by no means inconsistent the one with the other; they are perfectly agreed. Happy is the man who can believe them both, whether he sees their agreement or does not see it

I was cruising one day

IN THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS.

It had been a splendid day, and the glorious scenery had made our journey like an excursion to Fairy Land; but it came to an end, for darkness and night asserted their primeval sovereignty. Right ahead was a vast headland of the isle of Arran. How it frowned against the evening sky! The mighty rock seemed to overhang the sea. Just at its base was a little bay, and into this we steamed, and there we lay at anchorage all night, safe from every wind that might happen to be seeking out its prey. In that calm loch we seemed to lie in the mountain's lap, while its broad shoulders screened us from the wind. Now, the first part of my text, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me," rises like a huge headland high into the heavens. Who shall scale its height? Upon some it seems to frown darkly. But here at the bottom lies the placid, glassy lake of infinite love and mercy: "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Steam into it, and be safe under the shadow of the great rock.

First, I shall bid you view that goodly mountain, and then we shall sail into that pleasant loch.

I. Consider, then, with reverential joy

THE ETERNAL PURPOSE.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, when He found that the mass of the people rejected Him, turned round upon them, and said, "Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep." He knew in His own heart, however, that if they refused Him all would not do so; a number would assuredly believe on Him. Therefore He boldly said, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." He threw this grand fact in the teeth of His fierce revilers. It was His own comfort, and their rebuke. Now, I do not want to throw it at anybody to-night; on the contrary, I desire to use it as a beckoning finger to any troubled heart that longs to come to Jesus and be saved.

I saw the other day, round a gentleman's park, a very strong and lofty palisade, and to complete the exclusive apparatus a superabundant number of tenter-hooks were nailed upon the top of the fence, and a liberal quantity halfway up. I somewhat jocosely observed upon the kindness of the proprietor, in placing so many nails for the boys to climb up by, and so many more for them to hold on by when once they were up. "Why," said my companion, "those tenter-hooks would tear fingers and clothes to pieces; they are no help to climbers." "No," I replied, "no more help to climbers than the remarks which your minister made upon the sovereignty of God could be considered to be a help to seekers of the Lord Jesus."

The good man set forth the truth in the most awkward and pernicious manner possible; not making thereof steps for earnest climbers, but tenter-hooks for unwelcome intruders. I never yet saw such a crowd desirous of salvation that there was the slightest call for fences and tenter-hooks to keep them out; but I do see so many tremblers needing encouragement, and so many doubters needing instruction, that I delight to turn every word, and promise, and doctrine of the Lord into sweet invitations to all around me to come and welcome to the great heart of the Crucified. I am not afraid that too many will come; my fears are all in the opposite direction. Oh, that I could hope that all my present hearers would come to Jesus at once!

First notice, carefully, that if all that the Father giveth to Christ shall come to Him, then to Christ; and why should not you be among them? Suppose there is a plague in the city, but there are some people predestinated to be healed. I should be glad to know of that fact. I should be almost glad of it if I was sure that I was not one of the favored ones, for I rejoice in the good of others; but I should be still more glad to press to the physician with this assurance upon my mind—Some must be healed; why should not I? There is a famine in the land. I hear that it is revealed by a sure prophet that a certain number never shall die of famine. Then why should not I outlive the dreadful days and be among them? Why not?

I hear one say, "Suppose I am not one of God's elect." To him I answer, "Suppose you are." Better still, suppose that you leave off supposing altogether, and just go to Jesus Christ and see. To go to Him is your wisdom; your immediate business, as laid down in His Word, therefore, delay not. Instead of shutting myself out, as some do, because it is written, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me;" I shut myself in, and say, "Then I will be among them." Why should I not? O Lord, if thou hast ordained that some shall come, then I see that to them no difficulties can be insuperable, and I will therefore come to Thee myself, and in Thy name enter in where every coming one is welcome.

In the next place I find that those that come to Christ, according to this text, come because of the Father and the Son. Read it. "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." That is, they come to Jesus. Why is it that they are made to come? Because the Father has given them to Christ. There never was a soul that really wanted to come to Jesus but what it could come and did come. There never was a pining, longing sinner that was long kept away from Christ. When he wanted Christ, Christ wanted him a hundred times as much. If thou hast the least desire or the faintest longing after the Lord Jesus Christ, then the cords of love are about thee, and His mighty hands are drawing home those cords. Yield to the sweet pressure and thou shalt come, not because of what thou art, or what thou ever hast been, but because of what the Father is doing, and because of what the Son is doing. It is written, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him;" but when He is drawing thou canst come.

Notice, thirdly, that these people are all of them to Christ. Observe the words—"All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." They are not saved otherwise than by coming to Christ. Here are certain people that are different from others, for the Father has given them to Christ. Yes, but it does not matter how different they are from others; they have to be saved in the same way as other people. There is no way of salvation specially prepared for these peculiar people; they must follow the King's highway. The one common way of salvation is by coming to Christ, and all that the Father has given to Christ must come in by this gate. This is the one door that God has opened; there is no other; there never shall be any other. Come; pluck up heart, my dear friend—thou that art bowing thy head like a bulrush—the best saint in heaven found his way thither by a simple trust in Jesus Christ. Why canst not thou get there in the same way?

SAVED BECAUSE THEY COME

"Oh," says one, "I sometimes wish that I knew whether I was one of God's elect." Why should you wish to know anything out of its turn, when you can learn every truth that you need by studying other truths which lead up to it? You come to Christ, and that you were given to Christ; for none come to Him but those who are His, and by their coming to Him they give the best evidence of their election. You know what the brother in Cornwall said to Malachi, who was rather a stout Calvinist. He said, "Now, Malachi, I owe you two pounds. Before I discharge the debt, I want you to tell me whether I am predestinated to pay you." Malachi opened wide his hand, and said, "Put the two pounds there, and I will tell you directly." Like most sensible folk, he preferred to prophesy after the event; and there are many advantages in keeping to that method. It is evidently the natural order of things for uninspired folk.

So much about that huge, overhanging mass of rock. Of that I am going to say no more; only under its lee I have anchored long ago, and at that anchorage I mean still to remain. This may be called old-fashioned doctrine, I care not what it is called, it is my life, and I dare rest my soul's weight upon it for time and for eternity.

II. Now we enter into smooth water; the mystery is opened, let us partake of the joy of it. We have, in the second place, to speak to you for a little time on —"Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." You may forget my first head if you like, especially if you are troubled by it, but I earnestly beseech you to recollect the second.

THE EVERLASTING GOSPEL

"Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." This is one of the most generous Gospel texts that I do remember to have met with between the covers of this book. Generous, first, as to the character to whom the promise is made. "Him that cometh to me;" that is the character. The man may have been guilty of an atrocious sin, too black for mention; but if he comes to Christ he shall not be cast out. To that atrocious sin he may have added many others, till the condemning list is full and long; but if he comes to Christ he shall not be cast out. He may have made himself as black as night—as black as hell; yet, if he shall come to Christ, the Lord will not cast him out. I cannot tell what kind of persons may have come into this hall to-night; but if burglars, murderers, and dynamite-men were here, I would still bid them come to Christ, for He will not cast them out. Backsliders! Are there some such here, who have almost forgotten the way to God's sanctuary, for whom the Sabbath-bell proclaims no Sabbath now? Come you to Jesus, and He will not cast you out.

The old man took the fair-haired child upon his knee, and threaded his fingers through its locks, and said, "Young child, God keep you from the sin into which I have plunged. My old life is full of evil. It is now almost over, and I am past hope. Would God I were a child again!" Lo, the angel of mercy whispers to any one in that condition, "You may be a child again!" The man a hundred years of age may yet be made a child; and he that is a graybeard in infamy may yet become a babe in innocence through the cleansing power of the water and the blood which flowed from the riven side of Jesus. Go ye, and write it athwart the brow of night; write it in new stars if you can—"Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." No limit is set to the extent of sin; any "him" in all the world—any blaspheming, devilish "him" that comes to Christ shall be welcomed. I use strong words that I may open wide the gate of mercy. Any "him" that comes to Christ—though he come from slum or tap-room, betting-ring or gambling-hell, prison or brothel—Jesus will in no wise cast out.

Further, this text is a very generous one because it gives

NO LIMIT TO THE COMING.

The only limit to the way of coming is that they do come to Christ. I have known some come to Christ running to Him—a willing, speedy, earnest pace. You read of that in the Gospels. They were so glad to hear of a Saviour that they flew to Him at once. Many young children and young people do this, and they are blessed in the deed. Come along with you, ye lively and tender spirits; He will not cast you out if you leap and rush to Him. If you run all on a sudden to Him to-night—if you make a dash for Christ—He will not cast you out.

Alas! a great many, when they come to Christ, advance very limpingly. They are burdened with a huge load of sin and fettered with doubts and fears, and so they make slow progress. They do not look to Jesus and live, all at once. They keep looking here and looking there, instead of looking to Him. They are a long while in coming, for they are afraid, and ignorant and dull. Never mind, brother. The snail got into the Ark; and if you come to Christ He will not cast you out though your pace be sadly sluggish. Oh, this is glorious truth to my mind; is it not so to yours? So long as we do but come to Him, our Saviour will not cast us away; I feel glad to be preaching this Gospel; are you not glad to hear it? If you are not

YOU ARE A SORRY SET.

Thirdly, there is no limit here as to time. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out" is a glorious, free utterance, compassing every age. There may be some little children here; indeed, I am glad to see boys and girls mingling with the congregation. Listen to me, my children! I am always glad to see you, and we preachers make a great mistake if we do not preach to you. Do not think that you have to wait till you are grown up before you may come to Jesus. We have baptized quite a number of boys and girls of ten, eleven, and twelve. I spoke the other day with a little boy nine years of age; and I tell you that he knew more about Christ than ever so many gray-headed men do; and he loved Jesus most heartily. You young children are like rosebuds; and you know everybody likes a rosebud better than a full-blown rose. My Lord Jesus will gladly receive you as rosebuds. Offer yourselves to Him, for He will not cast you away. I am sure He never will.

If any here are in the opposite

EXTREMITY OF LIFE,

I would remind them that "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out" applies to the aged as well as to the young. I heard it said by a minister—a very earnest man—that if persons were not converted before they were five and forty, he hardly believed that they would ever be converted afterward; and he gave it as a note of his observation that he had not seen any persons converted after five and forty. I wished that I had been in his pulpit. I should not have questioned his statements, but I would have overlaid them with others of another character. Surely this brother had been living in some minute hamlet or other; or else he had not preached the Gospel in its fulness to every creature. Perhaps he did not believe in the conversion of the aged, and consequently no aged persons were converted by his means. I have seen as many people converted of one age as another; that is to say, in proportion to the number of them, for there are not so many people in the world over fifty as there are under fifty; and consequently a large proportion of those persons who make up our congregations are young. We have baptized, upon profession of faith, men and women over eighty years of age, about whose conversion we had as firm a conviction as we had about the conversions of the little ones; neither more nor less.

Who shall dare to say that there is an age after which God's grace does not work? I challenge any one to bring a text which looks that way; furthermore, I challenge the truth of any observations which arrive at such a result. My own preaching has been such that young and old in equal proportions have attended it, and in equal proportions they have been saved. However old you may be, my Master bids me say to you, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Come along, come along, dear old friend, though you cannot come without your stick. Come along, though your eyes are failing; come in your spectacles.

Though you cannot do much for my Master, He can do everything for you. Though you have only a little time to live on earth, you will have all eternity in heaven through which you can praise Him. I am sure you will be one of the most eager at that work. I think you will be like an old woman of my acquaintance. When I spoke to her about her conversion at an advanced age, she said, "Sir, if the Lord Jesus Christ ever does save such a poor old sinner as I am, He shall never hear the last of it." That is just why I want Him to save you; for then He never will hear the last of it. You will praise Him forever and forever for what He has done for you. Will you not?

So I shall close here, dear friends, with just a word or two of further encouragement by noticing the personality of my text; for in this a part of the liberality consists. Do you observe that the first part of the text began with, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." Ay, but when Christ began to deal with sinners with broken hearts, He dropped the "all" and every form of general statement, and He came to the personal pronoun singular: "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." You alone; your servant alone; your child alone; but specially if you come to the Lord Jesus He will not cast you out. You cannot doubt this.

Faith is simply to trust Christ; and trusting Christ brings with it the new life, and salvation from sin. I sometimes put it in Watts's way—

"A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
On Christ's kind arms I fall."

But after I had once been preaching, a young man said to me, "Sir, I cannot fall." "Oh dear," I said, "then I do not know how to talk; for I meant not a thing you could do, but the cessation of all your efforts, just falling, or if you will see it better, just tumbling down—because you cannot stand upright; and that is it." Because I cannot save myself, I fall into Christ's arms. Ceasing to hold to anything of my own, I just drop upon Him. "Still," you say, "there must be something more than that." There is nothing more than that. If thou believest that Jesus is the Christ, thou art born of God.

Have you never read the story of the good ship that had been a long time at sea, and the captain had lost his reckoning; he drifted up the mouth of the great river Amazon, and, after he had been sailing for a long time up the river without knowing that he was in a river at all, they ran short of water. When another vessel was seen, they signalled her, and when they got near enough for speaking they cried, "Water! We are dying for water!" They were greatly surprised when the answer came back, "Dip it up! Dip it up! You are in a river. It is all around you." They had nothing to do but to fling the bucket overboard, and have as much water as ever they liked. And here are poor souls crying out, "Lord, what must I do to be saved?" when the great work is done, and all that remains to them is to receive the free gift of eternal life. What must you do? You have for you have undone yourself by your doing. That is not the question. It is, "Lord, what hast thou done?" And the answer is, "It is finished. I have done it all. Only come and trust me." Sinner, you are in a river of grace and mercy. Over with the bucket, man, and drink to the full; for you will never exhaust the stream of grace.

That river runs near to you to-night. Stoop down, you thirsty one, and drink and live. But you say, "I must feel different from what I do now." But you need not; come with your bad feelings. "Oh, I have not yet a broken heart," says one. Come to Christ, and He will break your heart. "But I do not feel my need as I ought." Come to Christ and He will help you to feel your need. "Oh, but I am nobody!" You are the very person that Christ delights in, for to you He will be everybody.

EMPTY BASKETS WANTED.

Do you see that beautiful tree in the orchard loaded with fruit? It is a pear tree. From top to bottom it is covered with fruit. I think I never saw such a sight; every branch is bowing down. Some boughs are ready to break with the luscious burden. As I listen to the creaking boughs, I can hear the tree speak. What does it say? It says, "Baskets, baskets, baskets! Bring baskets!" Now, then, who has a basket? "I have got one," cries yonder friend, "but it is of no use, for there is nothing in it." Bring it here, man; that is the very kind of basket the tree wants. A person over there says, "Oh, I have a basket—a splendid basket. It is just the thing. It is full from top to bottom." You may keep your basket to yourself. It is of no use to my loaded tree. Where is there an empty basket? Who has an empty basket? Come along with you; come and pick from the tree as long as you like. Bring all your baskets. Bring thousands and thousands of baskets, all empty, and fill them all! Do you notice as we fill the baskets that the fruit begins to multiply? There is more when we have filled the baskets than there was at first, for this inexhaustible tree produces more and more fruit, as fast as we pluck from it. What is wanted by the Lord Jesus is an empty soul to receive out of the fulness which God has treasured up in Him.

God bless every one of you, for His name's sake. Amen.

THE NEW STEAMER FOR THE CONGO.

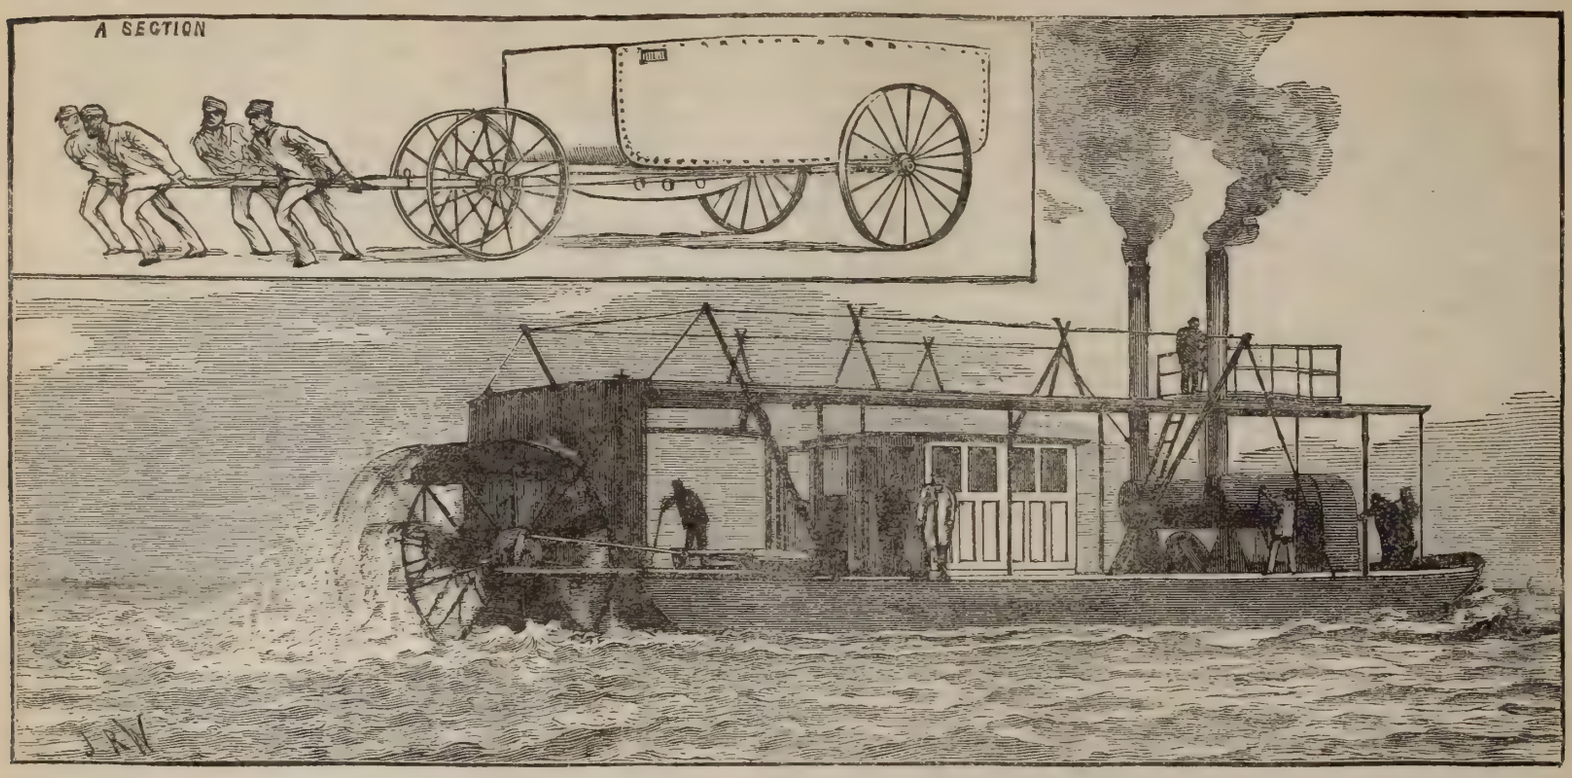
A VERY remarkable steamboat was recently dispatched to Africa. A sketch of it appears on the next page. It is intended for the use of Mr. H. M. Stanley in his explorations in Central Africa.

As was stated in these columns on October 18th, 1883, when a portrait of Mr. Stanley and a sketch of his life appeared, that eminent American explorer is now engaged in conducting an expedition organized by the King of the Belgians. Its object is to open up the region of the Congo to trade and civilization. When Mr. Stanley went on his search for the great missionary explorer, Dr. Livingstone, he had abundant opportunities for observing the character of the country and its people. During the weeks when he and Dr. Livingstone travelled together that knowledge was corrected and increased, and he conceived the idea of turning it to practical account. On his return he pointed out to the civilized world the splendid advantages to be reaped by any nation enterprising enough to proceed with the work Dr. Livingstone had left unfinished.

Eventually, the King of the Belgians took up the project, and the intrepid explorer returned to Africa abundantly supplied with means for continuing his explorations. No living man possesses so many qualifications for the arduous task of penetrating through that unknown region. It is an enterprise full of danger. Natural obstacles have to be encountered and overcome; perils from wild beasts have to be faced; the deadly climate must be endured, and savage tribes conciliated or overawed. All this Mr.



The New Steamer for Mr. H. M. Stanley's Expedition on the Congo.

Stanley realizes, and his experience has encouraged him to proceed. In order to assist him in his journey the new steamer has been built at the cost of the King of the Belgians. It was necessary to build it in sections, and send it out in that condition, as it will have to be carried overland at some points. The method in which that will be done is depicted in the picture, where the men may be seen dragging a section on a wheeled carriage.

The vessel is composed of six oblong pontoons of galvanized steel eighteen feet long by eight feet six inches wide and four feet deep. These pontoons, which form sections of the vessel, and each of which is watertight, and can float by itself, are placed side by side and fastened together, and to them is added a bow-piece and a stern-piece. The whole forms a hull seventy feet long by eighteen feet beam. The sections are so bolted together that they can be readily disunited at will and as readily put together again.

The ship is steered from a bridge placed forward, and about twelve feet above the water, giving the steersman a good view all round. Above the main deck, and completely covering it, will be a wooden awning deck, which in an African climate will be necessary to protect the passengers and crew from the sun. On the main deck is a small well-ventilated saloon. The draught of water, when unloaded, is only fourteen inches with the machinery on board, and six inches without it. The steamer has a speed of nine or ten miles an hour.

It is gratifying to know that Mr. Stanley's labors will not be beneficial to commerce alone. Closely following in his wake are the missionaries of the Gospel. There are tribes living in those wilds to whom the glad message has never been carried, and farther on in Central Africa there are vast tracts which the foot of the white man has never trodden. We have already from time to time described the operations of these devoted men. They are sent out in faith, and are supported entirely by the contributions of those whom God has inclined to give of their substance for His glory. Mr. and Mrs. Guinness were led to organize the Congo mission, and already many laborers have been equipped and sent out. Thus the brave American explorer is helping on the cause of Christ while laboring to advance the interests of commerce.

HOW GERTRUDE ELLIOTT WAS CURED OF ENNUI.

How to kill a morning was the problem a young lady was trying to solve, but apparently with little success. A few minutes at the piano, a few stitches of fancy work, an attempt to write a letter, and the perusal of a page of Harper's Magazine had altogether used up less than an hour, and there were yet several hours more to kill. Gertrude Elliott was clearly suffering from an aggravated attack of ennui, a complaint it was never expected that the Anglo-Saxon race would suffer from, or an Anglo-Saxon name would be provided for it, instead of forcing us to borrow a term from another language to describe it. But this was certainly ennui, and nothing else. Gertrude looked at the clock again, and yawned from sheer weariness and disgust.

A ring at the bell caught her ear, and she brightened, for even the dullest visitor would be welcome in her present mood. It was not a dull visitor, however, who entered.

"Mr. Leigh," said the lady, as a clergyman greeted her, "I believe a merciful Providence sent you here this morning. I am positively weary of my life. If you will only stay and talk for half an hour you will be doing an act of Christian charity. You may tease me, or scold me, or preach to me, if you will only stay and help me to pass the morning."

"Ah!" said the visitor, "do you find the hours so hard to kill? I am afraid if you and I could have our way with time, we should be sadly at issue. I would lengthen every minute of every hour if I could. There is so much to do and the time is so short."

"Oh, I have plenty to do, also, but it is so difficult to find an agreeable occupation, that is the difficulty. I am like a child, I think—I must be amused."

"And you do not find a child's amusements amusing now, I suppose? A doll and a set of Lilliputian furniture do not give the delight they did when you were seven years old. Your lot seems unfortunate; it is too bad to have a child's tastes and desires and yet no way of gratifying them. Be assured, Miss Elliott, I pity you."

"I am inclined to think, Mr. Leigh, that you are laughing at me rather than pitying me; but, indeed, I am miserable and discontented, and I am ashamed of being so, and would change if I could."

"Are you sure that you would do so? There are many ways of effecting the change. Even now I could supply you with a prescription which never fails, if I thought you were in earnest."

"I am, indeed, Mr. Leigh. Advise me. I will take your prescription cheerfully."

"You must take it, then, without question and with the same faith as if I were a physician and wrote you a few hieroglyphics and Latin abbreviations."

"I agree," said Miss Elliott.

"Then I will set you to work. Here is an address; you will easily find the place. Go there, and you will find plenty to do. The people are very poor; the mother, who is a widow, is ill, and her eldest daughter does not seem to know what should be done. Poor girl, she works in a factory and has little idea of how to make home comfortable. There are two or three little children, too, who need some attention."

"O Mr. Leigh, that is not fair. I do not know how to read and pray with sick people. I never did any district visiting. You must excuse me."

"On the contrary, Miss Elliott, I intend holding you to your bargain. That is my prescription. You want to get through your morning, and I prescribe your spending it in a certain room. I do not require you to read, or pray, or teach. Go there, and do what your heart prompts you."

"I will keep my promise, Mr. Leigh, but I shall not ask you to prescribe for me again."

"We shall see about that; but now, having prescribed for your trouble, I present my own need, which was my business in calling upon you and of which your difficulty took precedence. I am trying to buy a sewing-machine for a poor woman who is anxious to earn an honest livelihood. The dealers, not unreasonably, will only sell for money, and I have no money. If you will give me a dollar or two and I can persuade a few other friends to do the same, I shall be relieved of my trouble."

That was soon arranged, and Miss Elliott, having extracted a promise from Mr. Leigh to look in upon her later, started on her mission. She found the sick-room very comfortless. The sufferer, a poor, patient woman, lay in agony, while the eldest daughter, who was about Gertrude's age, was making some clumsy attempts at laundry work, the results of which hung on a line strung across the room. One little boy of six years old sat on a high chair whining miserably, his cheeks flushed and his eyes glistening.

"Mr. Leigh told me you were ill," said Gertrude, going up to the side of the bed on which the sick woman lay. "He thought, perhaps, I could do something for you."

"Bless you, young lady, for coming, and him for sending you. I am very ill, but I seem to suffer more from seeing everything neglected than from my pain. Mary does her best, but she hasn't been used to this work, and she does not know. If you could stay with me a few minutes while she goes to the drug store for the medicine it would be very kind. It's a poor place for the likes of you, though."

Mary was dispatched to the drug store, and then Gertrude looked about the room. A little "tidying-up" was soon done, while the widow looked on with approving eyes. The poor pillows were smoothed and the bed clothes re-arranged. The little boy, who had ceased his whining, was taken to kiss his mother, and Gertrude had noticed how hot his little hands were. By that time Mary had returned with the medicine, which Gertrude carefully poured out and administered. Then she dispatched the girl on another errand for lemons and tea and a few other things, putting the money into her hand from her own pocket-book. She soon came back, and Gertrude, having made some lemonade, took the child on her lap and watched him drink the cooling mixture with evident relish. He had just fallen back on her knee in sheer weakness, and was looking gratefully into Gertrude's eyes, when the door opened and Mr. Leigh entered. He noticed instantly the changes effected in the room, and saw from the bright look on Gertrude's face that his prescription had taken the desired effect. He remained but a few minutes, uttering a few words of consolation to the invalid, and then hurried away. But as he passed the chair in which Gertrude was sitting, he said, "It is five o'clock, Miss Elliott."

A quiet "Thank you" was the only answer, but Mr. Leigh understood that he was being thanked for something other than that information.

Miss Elliott had learned that in visiting the fatherless and the widow in their affliction there were rewards to be enjoyed even in the doing of it. And as she wended her way homeward in the evening, contrasting her feelings with those of the morning, and with the tones of the grateful widow's thanks in her ears, she acknowledged that she had learned a valuable lesson in the art of curing ennui. It was a lesson she never forgot, for she thereafter practised it regularly.

Gertrude Elliott's Ministry.

BOOK DISTRIBUTION ON THE NILE.

MISS M. L. WHATELY, whose Christian work in Egypt has been described in these columns, has written the following account of her recent operations:

"Some of your readers may be interested in a few brief notes of mine about book distributing on the Nile. During the last three days of the old and the first three of the new year, I was on the river in a Nile boat, with a little party from the mission, with the special view of bringing some Bibles and Scripture portions to several villages we had visited last year, chiefly occupied by Mohammedan peasants.

"Owing to bad weather we could not go to some that we greatly desired to see again, but at those within reach, especially at two rather large and densely populated villages, we had great success. One (to which I walked, escorted by a boatman, as it was a mile inland) had a small daily market, which was the resort of peasants from other smaller villages in the neighborhood. The doctor of the mission joined me here, after having seen several poor patients on board our boat; and such was the eagerness of the men for books when they found we had brought a bagful of them, that the doctor nearly had his coat pulled off by the vehement hands which dragged him on opposite sides, exclaiming, 'One for me, sir! a book for me. I read well, and I want a Gospel.' 'No, give it me, sir; I had one last year, and the children tore it. Do give a Gospel.' 'Sir,' exclaimed a third, 'I am a Copt, a Christian; ought not I to have one?' 'The effendi says they are good for all of us, and I want one!' cries another, and so on till the bag is empty.

"I had meantime got out of the crowd, and was speaking to a respectable man who kept a very small shop on the market-place. 'You have books,' said he; 'please let me see one. Ah!' turning over the leaves, with a nod of either interest or approbation, and he begins to read aloud, "'In the beginning was the word,' and 'Yes, yes, that is good.' He reads about a page, and pauses to ask me questions, which I reply to as suits the occasion, calling his attention especially to the words at which he had paused, 'The law came by Moses, but grace and truth by Jesus Christ,' and explaining them as well as I could. Presently he says, 'What's the price of this little book? I want to buy it.' 'I will give it to you with pleasure.' 'Nay, I will buy it willingly.' (It was a Gospel of St. John.) I persisted in giving it free, however, and he cordially thanked me, as I told him I prayed God to bless it to his soul.

"When all our store was finished, we returned to the boat, and the same afternoon a poor man came from the village to ask for a book for his lame son—a young man whose chief delight was in reading, he said, and who only heard after our departure, from the neighbors, that some books were being given away. He knew nothing apparently of the contents, but I talked to the father before giving him two Gospels for the poor fellow. In another village the people sat listening while we read at intervals for hours to them; and many carried away books, having earnestly begged for them. One, a poor Albino, received a whole Bible, he being a good scholar and full of intelligence. Some appeared very bigoted Moslems, but yet willing to read God's Word, this not being prohibited in their Koran. Others had more enlightened views, and allowed the need of an atoning Saviour, but these were persons we had read and talked to before.

"I could mention many other very interesting visits, showing that the seed is being sown at all events; even a few days of earnest work is not lost, and in several of these villages among the palm groves on the river-shore the mission party are known and welcomed as 'the people of the book.'"

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Remonstrance.

"LOOK at me, little Hetty!" said Rose, "just look at me. Do I look as if I could ever be cross or unkind? I'm not an old dragon of a stepmother. I shall want somebody to play with me, and your papa is years and years too old to play; but you and I will have fine games together. Oh, I am sure you will love me."

Hester gazed into the blue eyes of the girl with the deep, full, unconscious scrutiny of a child. The color came and went upon Rose's cheeks, and her lips pouted under this inspection. At last Hester half held out her small hand to her future stepmother, but checked herself, looking up to her father.

"Will it make you happy?" she asked with a grave air.

"Happier than I could tell you," answered John Morley passionately.

"I like you," she said, turning to Rose, "and we shall all be very happy—at first."

"No! no! no! Not at first; but always," cried the girl, pressing kiss after kiss upon Hester's mouth, "we will love one another very dearly. You will be very glad to have me for your mamma?"

"Yes," answered Hester, still regarding her wistfully.

"And you promise me to be like my own daughter," continued Rose, half playfully, "forever and ever? You will love, honor and succor me—those are the words, I think—as if I were your mother? When I am old and ugly, and nobody cares for me, you will care for me and never forsake me. Let me whisper a little secret, Hester. Your father will grow tired of my by and by, and we shall quarrel sometimes, and he will be very angry, and dreadfully cross; oh! so cross! But you must never get tired or cross with me. You must try to be exactly, just exactly, the same, as if you were born my own little girl. Will you promise me this, Hetty?"

She had spoken quite as much to John Morley as to Hester, with little coquettish charms and prettinesses which infatuated him. Hester's small, serious countenance deepened with thought, as she deliberated for a minute or two, gazing into her father's beaming face.

"Ought I to promise, father?" she asked at last.

"Certainly," answered John Morley; "she is to be your mother. You cannot be too good a child to her."

"God hears me promise," said the little girl, with simple solemnity; "I promise that I will be the same as if I had been born your daughter. I do promise it."

The gloomy room was silent again as Hester's childish voice ceased speaking; and the girl, who still knelt before her, grew pale, and the tears sprang into her eyes. John Morley also felt a passing chill and shadow of doubt crossing the brightness of his new joy. It was a gloomy niche in a gloomy household, which he was about to fill up with this gay and girlish creature. She glanced round the room with its dingy rows of books, and peeped up into John Morley's face, already marked with austere lines; and an involuntary shudder ran through her. But the next moment she laughed merrily. She embraced Hester with warmth, and held out her hand for John Morley to assist her in rising from her knees. It was one of her charming ways to seem to require help upon the slightest occasions.

"Thank you," she said, giving him a smile which made his heart beat quickly again with delight; "this is a queer child! She made me feel, I can't tell you how solemn! It was almost like being married, and hearing you vow all you will have to vow, you know. Are you quite sure you will be as much in earnest?"

John Morley murmured a reply which could not reach Hester's ears.

"Well! I must go now," she said. "I ought to be back already at that wretched school. Oh, I am tired to death of it; I long to get away from it. I believe I am only marrying you to be sure of never going back to it. There, now! It is such a shame for a pretty girl like me, and I am a pretty girl you know, to be chained to a long table, hearing stupid dolts repeat stupid lessons. You will save my life, sir; and I thank you a thousand times for it."

She courtesied to him playfully, kissed Hester, and tripped away lightly out of the dark room, which seemed darker than ever after she had left it.

When John Morley returned to the sitting-room, he busied himself for some minutes in lighting the lamp, and setting everything into unbroken order, without once venturing to meet the eyes of his little girl, who still kept her station upon the hearth, watching him timidly but steadily. There was an undefined shyness and disquietude in his feelings toward her, which he could not well have explained to himself. He was accustomed to perform these small feminine duties of setting his room in order; but to-night he found himself embarrassed and awkward, with Hester's eyes upon him. After completing his methodical arrangements, he reached down a thick old volume from the bookshelves, and appeared to absorb himself in its contents.

But he was not reading. Hester was not to be deceived by the transparent artifice; and he felt it uneasily, and moved restlessly in his arm-chair, shading his eyes with his thin and scholarly hand. But all his features were kindled with a sunshine from within, brighter and stronger than a smile. For he would not smile; though he could not dim the light in his eyes, or make harsh again the strange softness which was smoothing away the rigid lines upon his face. Hester comprehended, but vaguely and as a child only, that a sad life, solitary and unnatural, was coming to an end, and that already the light shone upon him from afar off. Her young heart was full of sympathy for him; but for some time she kept silence. Her short life had been full of lessons of reserve and taciturnity.

"Father," she said after a long while—and he put down his hand, and looked across to her, where she sat in a large, deep, old arm-chair which had always been her mother's seat—"I am not at all sorry to have a step-mother."

The child's approbation had something quaint about it, but its oddity did not seem to strike her father; though he allowed a vivid smile to flit across his face as he heard it.

"Will it be long before you are tired of my stepmother?" inquired Hester.

"I shall never be tired of her!" he answered.

"But you are tired of me," she continued, "and you are tired of my mother, or else you would not want to marry another wife. So I thought you would get tired of Rose Mary some day."

"Hester," said John Morley, his face overclouded again, "I should never have been tired of your mother if she had lived."

"But you tell me she does live," persisted the child, "and Lawson says she comes back sometimes and walks about the house, though I cannot see her. Sometimes I think I can feel her kissing me very softly. Perhaps she is here this evening, and heard me promise to be like a daughter to my stepmother. Do you think she would like it, father?"

It was seldom that Hester spoke so freely and fluently; but this evening she was excited, her cheeks were crimson, and her large gray eyes were lit up. John Morley lowered his voice, and looked stealthily round the room as he answered her.

"My love, if your poor mother, who was very dear to me—dearer than you can think—could know of this, I am sure she would rejoice for your sake as well as mine. I am doing what I believe to be good for you as well as for myself. You need some woman to stand in a close relationship to you; and you will need it more as you grow older. Rose will be a second mother to you."

"You are quite sure?" said Hester, with a childish love of reiterated and positive assurance.

"Quite sure," he answered.

Perhaps he had had but little thought of his child till this evening, but now he began to believe that she had been his chief consideration; and as he turned back to his book, he said to himself several times, "Certainly, Rose will be a second mother to her."

The silence which followed seemed scarcely like a silence to him; while the eager face of Hester was bent forward out of her great arm-chair, and her speaking eyes were fastened upon him. But he would give no attention to her eloquent looks; and in a few minutes she seemed aware of this, for she nestled down into her mother's chair, as she might have nestled into her mother's lap, and produced a book which she had kept wrapped up in her pinafore since the first interruption of her evening's reading. John Morley and his daughter sat thus for half an hour, no sound reaching them from without; when the sharp tinkle of the shop-bell broke upon the stillness.

The persons who entered were two men, one old, the other elderly; unlike in feature, yet possessing an undefinable and subtle resemblance, which linked them together, and seemed also to link them to John Morley. It might have been that the order of their thoughts, and the convictions and conclusions at which they had arrived, had been the same; for the brain works out its own family likenesses. It was evident that in some way or other they belonged to one class; though John Morley, a handsomer man than either of the others, had also most the look of a scholar. The smallest, meekest, and eldest of the three men was distinguished as a minister by his dress, and the spotless whiteness of a large neckcloth, which served to withdraw the eye from dwelling upon his somewhat feeble features. The third was a robust, thick-set, elderly man, with a square and massive face, and with the air of one not much accustomed to be gainsaid, yet who would not altogether dislike to meet with a worthy antagonist.

"Brother Morley, we come as friends," said the minister.

With a courteous but formal bow John Morley ushered his guests into his sitting-room, and set chairs for them at the table, as if they were about to sit in committee. The minister alone took any notice of Hester, who slipped down from her high seat upon their entrance, to offer them a shy welcome. She was used to listen earnestly to the discussions and controversies often held in her father's parlor.

This evening, however, there was some difficulty in introducing the subject of conversation, and when the minister broke silence it was in a faltering, apologetic voice.

"Brother Morley," he said, "cannot you divine the purport of our visit to-night?"

Over John Morley's face closed again much of the old gloom and austerity, as he looked from one to the other of his visitors; gazing longest and hardest into the square, set face of the younger man; who regarded him, in his turn, with an unflinching judicial eye. The three men were three brothers doubtless, though the weakness and mercifulness of age were creeping over the eldest.

"We are come," he continued, deprecatingly, "because certain rumors have reached the ears of the church—"

"The church has many ears," interrupted John Morley, with a grim smile, "but no doubt it has heard correctly. I apprehend the purport of these rumors."

"But, brother," pursued the minister, in his most soothing accents, "it is not as if you were one of the unknown and inconsiderable members of the church. You are one of our chief men. We come only to expostulate and beseech. It is written in the Scriptures, 'Thou shalt rebuke thy brother, and not suffer sin upon him.'"

The minister gazed at John Morley with mingled entreaty and sadness; but his companion, who was eager to pursue the assault with greater vigor, quickly broke the reverential pause which followed his quotation from the Bible.

"Come, Brother Morley," he said, speaking as if he were a brother very far removed, "there's no need to beat longer about the bush. You are thinking of taking a second wife."

"That is essentially a domestic arrangement, Mr. Waldron," said John Morley, girding himself willingly for the contest; "the church has nothing to do with it. If it were a question of moral discipline the church must needs take note of it. But it has no voice in this matter; neither of assent nor veto."

"Tush, brother!" answered Mr. Waldron, sharply; "we come but semi-officially. As your brethren, we are bound to watch your conduct; and if your choice had fallen upon a godly woman, not a word would have been said. But when we see one of ourselves about to form an ensnaring union, our constitution as a pure church gives us the right, and lays it upon us as a duty, to warn, rebuke, and protest. This marriage ought not to be."

"Yes, dear brother," said the minister, emboldened by Mr. Waldron's words, and pressing into the breach he had made, "the rule of the apostle is simple: 'Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers.'"

"The unbeliever," replied John Morley slowly, "signified to the early Church the heathen and idolater. My future wife cannot be called an unbeliever in that sense. But there is another saying of the apostle: 'The unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband.' I trust that this marriage may prove the entrance into a purer faith and truer creed for my wife."

There was a short silence again, while Mr. Waldron drew a well-worn Bible out of his pocket, and turned over its pages impatiently.

"Listen then, John Morley," he said; "in the thirteenth chapter of Nehemiah, beginning at the twenty-third verse, it is thus written:

"'In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab. And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people.

"'And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves.

"'Did not Solomon King of Israel sin by these things? yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless, even him did outlandish women cause to sin.

"'Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God in marrying strange wives?'"

Mr. Waldron read the passage with an evidently keen sympathy with the indignant governor; and he looked hard into John Morley's rigid face. The latter was not a man to yield quietly to arbitrary rule; and he met the judicial frown bent upon him with cool composure.

Just then there came a gentle tap at the door, and it was opened from without before John Morley could reach it. Rose, the subject of the good men's warning, appeared in the doorway.

TRUTH RECEIVED AND REJECTED.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 24, Acts 17: 1–15. Golden Text, 1 Thess. 5: 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul's Yearning for the Conversion of his Race—Living his Prayers—Practical Effects of his Preaching—Neutrality Impossible—Gentiles Less Hindered than Jews—Envious Preachers—Their Colleagues—A Testimony from the Enemy—Avoiding Persecution—Receptive People—The Women Foremost—The Uses of Persecution.

PAUL and his two followers on leaving Philippi went through Amphipolis and Apollonia [both cities of Macedonia] on their way to Thessalonica. Here Paul found a synagogue of the Jews. This was no uncommon thing; in many of the Roman and Grecian colonies Jews who possessed commercial enterprise, and who were oppressed by the Roman yoke in Palestine, had settled and carried their religion with them, and thus it came to pass that synagogues were scattered all over the then civilized world. Paul's heart always yearned for the salvation of his own people. In writing to the Romans (chap. 10: 1), he says: "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved." And he

thus we find, Paul, "as his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, opening and alleging, that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead; and that this Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is Christ."

Paul was led of the Holy Ghost in all his work; here he was guided to appeal to the Scriptures with which these Jews were necessarily acquainted, and parts of which they were bound to learn by heart; and he grounded all. which he had to teach them on that which they already knew. It is very possible that many an evangelist may do the same thing, and find it eminently successful in some instances, but that in other instances it does not answer at all. How is this? Just that the Holy Ghost, who is the real Agent in all evangelizing work, cannot be reduced to system; "the wind bloweth where it listeth." If we are led by the Spirit to reason out of the Scriptures, the reasoning will be divine and convincing, because the Spirit of God will open hearts to receive it, thus making His work through the teacher answer to His work in the learner. At Lydda and Saron He used the healing of Æneas to awaken and convert souls; at Philippi, the earthquake was the chief instrument. How often have we heard a preacher, full of the soundest scriptural arguments, preaching Sunday after Sunday, and yet no conversions taking place, because the Holy Ghost was not using him. He was relying on his own understanding of, and power in handling, the Scriptures, instead of being the pliable instrument of the Holy Ghost, willing to be wise or foolish as best suited His purpose.

The preaching of the Holy Ghost, through Paul, was of such a character that neutrality was impossible; if this Jesus of Nazareth were indeed the Christ of God, it was the bounden duty of these Thessalonians to believe on Him, yield themselves up to Him, leave all for Him, and proclaim Him everywhere. "Some of them believed," for the Gospel came not unto them "in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" (1 Thess. 1: 5). They became out-and-out disciples at once, "and consorted with Paul and Silas," not afraid to show their colors. Of these many were not born Jews, but Greeks who who had come under Jewish influence. This was natural, for the Greeks had nothing to lose, but the Jews had to brook the displeasure of the priests and of the members of their own families. To the Greeks, this truth was only a glorious quickening into blessed experience of that which they already knew of God. They had already made the step out of heathenism in holding Jewish ideas; so they lost nothing and gained everything in becoming Christians. But every Jew had to lose his in becoming a Christian; he had to sink in the eyes of those whom he most valued, and to be looked upon as almost worse than an infidel. Thus the chief converts to Christianity were Greeks, and not a few of the chief women—perhaps both Jewish women and Greek. The truth was taking root, and getting a hold upon the people; and Satan was at no loss for instruments to disturb this progress of the Gospel. The Jews which believed not were moved to envy. They had been preaching in this synagogue for years past, and had never attracted such congregations as came to hear Paul; they had brought people from time to time under serious impressions, but this wonderful change in men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God—this turning of sinners from their sins, of money-lovers from their gains, of pleasure-seekers from their pleasures—this was an effect which they had never produced; and instead of being humbled they were moved to envy. It is the old story, and oft-repeated, how those who have no spiritual power themselves hate, because they envy, those who have, and do all in their power to prove that spirituality is to be suspected.

These Jews, finding no better colleagues, "took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort" (the of those days), "and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people." In every city, and in every age, there are a number of unhappy men, ready for any tumult, any disaffection. The mob was disappointed at not finding the objects of their search in the house of Jason, so they drew him and "certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also." A glorious testimony to the power of the Gospel, coming, as it did, from an enemy. Thank God the victory that overcometh the world is our faith (1 John 5: 4).

The Jews lodged an accusation against Jason—that he had been guilty of receiving the disciples of Christ, and that "these all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another King, one Jesus." It is marvellous how much of ingenuity the opponents of the Gospel possess. It is most true that these men of God taught, "There is another King, one Jesus," but it was just as untrue to say that they defied the authority of Cæsar. In all probability, none kept the laws with the same conscientiousness as these Christians. It is one of the privileges of Christ's followers that all manner of evil shall be spoken against them falsely for Christ's sake, giving them the joy of leaving their reputation in the hands of Him who knoweth all things. The people and the rulers of the city were very naturally more inclined to trust their own citizens than a few foreigners who had recently come among them; and they were troubled about these accusations; but they "took security of Jason and of the other, and let them go." It does not appear who this "other" was.

"When they persecute you in this city, flee into another" (Matt. 10: 23). The brethren, finding the place too hot for their beloved teachers, "sent them away by night unto Berea." But they were

NOT CURED OF PREACHING THE GOSPEL.

They knew that their presence in every city to which they came was no accident, but was watched over by God, and was part of that which must serve His purpose. They knew that He was responsible, not they, for all which should take place while they were there, and consequently they took the first opportunity to enter into the synagogue, and there preach the Gospel. The Jews in this place were in a more prepared state; they "received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so. Therefore many of them believed." Every convert in Thessalonica had much against him; he became a follower of the believers and of the Lord, having received the Word "in much affliction," but, thank God, "with joy of the Holy Ghost" (1 Thess. 1: 6) they heard the much contention (1 Thess. 2: 2) with which the Gospel was preached, whereas in Berea there was, at first, no opposition whatever.

All evangelists know what a difference it makes when the people are receptive; after Paul's experience at Thessalonica he must have prayed the prayer of faith about Berea, and claimed from God a people ready to receive the Word of truth. In Berea, as in the two former cities, Philippi and Thessalonica, the among the converts, and especially the "honorable women" or "chief women." A prosperous little church was forming, and all seemed to be doing well, when the Thessalonian Jews heard that the Word of God was preached at Berea, and they "came thither also and stirred up the people." Why did not God prevent them? some would say, "Why did not Paul pray, and claim in answer that such a blessed work should not be hindered? Is not God mightier than the devil or men?" Yes, truly; but the trial of our faith is more precious than of gold which perisheth, and the reality of faith in God must be put to the test. These infant churches must be weaned from Paul and his companions, and brought to trust in the Lord alone. Therefore, He permitted the wickedness of men to work out His purposes.

The Berean brethren sent away Paul, the chief object of the wrath of these Jews, but Silas and Timothy remained behind, as Luke had done at Philippi, to strengthen the brethren. Thessalonica was not uncared for. A little later in the same year, Paul sent Timothy there (1 Thess. 3: 2), after he had himself written from Athens the two epistles to the Thessalonians, to ground them in their faith, and put them right about the coming of the Lord.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Baker Pacha, the English Colonel who Commanded the expedition against the False Prophet of the Soudan, has been utterly defeated near Tokar. The telegram announcing the disaster states that he was attacked by about a thousand troops. At the first onset the Egyptian officers and men bolted. Colonel Sartorius, one of the English officers, tried hard to rally them, but without success. The Europeans fought well, but were outnumbered, and Colonel Sartorius narrowly escaped with his life. The enemy pursued almost into Trinkitat. The Europeans, police and Turkish infantry were cut to pieces. Fourteen European and three native officers are missing. The fight was begun by a few Arab horsemen attacking Baker Pacha's cavalry, which fled. Baker then formed a square, which the enemy surrounded. The rest of the Egyptians then fled in confusion and the gunners deserted their guns. Baker Pacha was several times surrounded by the enemy, but with his staff managed to cut his way through. He is now at Suakim, to which place re-enforcements have been sent. News has also been received that Tewfik Bey, one of the Khédive's bravest officers, has been killed with four hundred soldiers, and Sinkat, an important city, has been captured.

General Stone, whose Knowledge of Egyptian affairs is more intimate than that of any other American, remarked, on hearing of these victories of El Mahdi: "The moral effect of the disasters will be very great, not only in the Soudan but also in Egypt proper and in all Moslem countries. This unbroken series of victories, due to the want of foresight and prompt action on the part of the British authorities, will make tens of thousands of Mussalmans believe that Mohammed Ahmed is really the Mahdi, and it will be more than ever difficult to make Mussulmans fight against him. It would be surprising if the news of these late victories does not cause serious agitation in Arabia as well as on the frontiers of Egypt, and General Gordon's position is by these same victories of the rebels rendered vastly more precarious. The logical result will be almost certainly the uprising of more Bedouin tribes in the Egyptian dependencies, and possibly the uprising of Bedouins in Arabia, Syria and Palestine. It would not be surprising at all should it also create serious trouble in Tripoli, Tunis and Algiers. Each man who comes to believe that Mohammed Ahmed is the Mahdi believes also that he is certain to conquer the whole world."

M. Rouher, the Trusted Minister of the Late Emperor Napoleon III., died in Paris on February 3d. M. Rouher was Minister of State under the Empire, and after the dethronement of Napoleon he was the leader of the Bonapartists and the faithful and confidential friend of the Emperor's family. M. Rouher was seventy-one years of age, and had been prominent in public life since 1848. He has been suffering from a severe malady for more than three years. Six months ago he had an attack of paralysis, and since that time he has been subject to fits of derangement.

The British Parliament was Opened on February 5th. The Queen's speech, which is really the production of the Cabinet and is accepted as the government programme, was delivered by commissioners and not by the Queen in person. The chief interest in it this year centred in the Egyptian question. On this subject it contained the following declaration: "Having had every reason to be satisfied with the tranquillity of Egypt and the progress made in the establishment of orderly institutions, I gave, during the autumn, instructions for the evacuation of Cairo, the further reduction of my military forces and their concentration mainly in Alexandria; but in November the Egyptian army appointed to maintain the rule of the Khédive in the Soudan was defeated and broken up with heavy loss. Upon the occurrence of this defeat I deemed it wise to recall the order I had given. While unforeseen and calamitous necessity has thus required me to suspend the measure I had adopted, the aim of my occupation, which has been explained to you at former times, continues without change. I have offered to the Egyptian Government such counsel as appeared to be required by a prudent regard to the amount of its resources and to the social condition of the country." The speech also promises the introduction of the bill to extend the franchise to citizens not now possessing it who live outside the cities, the bill for the protection of sailors from unscrupulous shipowners, and several minor measures.

Considerable Dissatisfaction Prevails in England with the Cabinet in respect to their policy in Egypt. The opposition has moved a resolution in both houses censuring the Cabinet, and which is practically an expression of a want of confidence in them. It is expected that it will be passed by the House of Lords, but rejected by the House of Commons. Mr. Smalley cables to his journal a vivid description of the state of public opinion in the country. He says: "People cannot understand a policy of indifference to massacres in a country where England rules, and of indifference likewise to the defeats of armies which Englishmen officer. All the ordinary signs of rapidly growing agitation abound. Two London journals, which endeavor to reflect the opinion of the majority of Englishmen, vigorously denounce the Ministry. Liberal journals outside London, which usually support Mr. Gladstone, while opposing the vote of censure, plainly declare their dissatisfaction with the Ministerial policy. Letters from constituents pour in upon members insisting that something must be done." Nevertheless, the Premier appears resolved to persevere in his policy with respect to Egypt.

The Alarm in Austria Caused by the Discoveries of Nihilism has not subsided. The Vienna correspondent of the New York Herald cables that the city is passing through a crisis of anxiety and alarm. The government is in possession of what it believes to be most trustworthy evidence of a plot to assassinate the Emperor. Dynamite cartridges were found near his box in the opera house exactly similar to those found near the body of the detective who was recently assassinated. On February 4th eight battalions of infantry were kept standing in their barracks under arms, prepared for an immediate movement. During the whole night no officer was allowed to leave the barracks, even for a moment. Ball cartridges had been distributed to the troops. A regiment of cavalry was also held in readiness during the night, and their horses were saddled. The government considers the situation most critical. Peaceful citizens are in constant dread of two terrible and detested extremes—the police on the one hand and the anarchists on the other. Among the list of persons proscribed for sentence to death by the anarchists are the Emperor and Empress, the Crown Prince Rudolph, and the Crown Princess Stephanie.

The Symptoms of Discontent in Jamaica Grow more ominous daily. A leading Jamaica journal, criticising the recent concessions made by the British Government, declares them to be utterly inadequate and unsatisfactory. It urges the people "to spurn them with contempt." It says: "The people of Jamaica have been downtrodden and tyrannized over for a number of years, and have had the spirit of manhood almost ground out of them by repeated oppression, heaped upon them by irresponsible officials sent here from abroad to rule them as if they were a lot of half savages, but the time for that sort of business has terminated." Residents of Jamaica now visiting New York inform us that the people are practically excluded from the government of the island. Men who have been in the civil service for twenty years and more are not allowed to advance beyond the lower grades. When a vacancy occurs in the better-paid offices a man is sent from England to fill it. Sometimes he is willing to be taught his duties or to permit his subordinate to perform them while he draws the salary. In that case the island benefits; but when he insists on performing the duties of his office his ignorance of the country and people generally involves trouble for all concerned.

Rijutei, the Converted Corean Nobleman, whose portrait was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 25th, 1883, has sent to American Christians an earnest appeal for missionaries. He writes: "Tens of thousands of people in our country are still ignorant of the way of the true God and live as heathen. In this day of the propagation of the Gospel, our country is unfortunately situated in an obscure corner of the globe where it has not enjoyed the blessings of Christianity. Therefore, I am translating the Bible into the Corean language in order to make it a means of extending the Gospel. Five of my countrymen are of the same mind with me. They have been baptized already. There are many more who receive the teachings of the Bible gladly, and the number of those whom we expect to become Christians increases daily. At present the government has opened the country to foreign intercourse, and is trying hard to improve the condition of the people. Consequently it is more lenient toward the Christian religion; and although it has not permitted it openly, it does not seek to persecute Christians. Although I am a man of no influence, I will do my utmost to aid such missionaries as you may send. I beg most earnestly that you will send some one to Japan at once who can consult with those who are laboring here and prepare himself for the work. This, I think, is the best and safest plan. I beseech you to give a careful consideration to these words of mine, and if my request is granted my joy will be unbounded."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE sad circumstances attending the death of Mr. M'All's chief helper in his Paris mission are doubtless fresh in the recollection of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Dodds had endeared himself to many Christian hearts here during his three months' tour through the States in 1880. His earnestness, his eloquence, and his modest, unassuming demeanor won the regard of all with whom he came in contact. When, too, it was realized that the cultured scholar and the brilliant orator, who might have been enjoying the comforts of home life and receiving a large salary as pastor of a regular church, had voluntarily relinquished all those advantages to do the laborious and often thankless work of an evangelist in the slums of the French capital, it was impossible to withhold admiration of his self-sacrificing spirit. He was a noble fellow, and, though our acquaintance with him was brief, we loved him. Two years later came the melancholy intelligence of his death, accompanied by Dr. Hitchcock's warm eulogium of his life and services. This week we are enabled to publish his portrait and a brief notice of his life and work, compiled from the interesting memoir of him recently written by his eminent father-in-law, Dr. Horatius Bonar, whose expositions of unfulfilled prophecy have frequently appeared in these columns.

George Theophilus Dodds was born at Lochee, a suburb of Dundee, Scotland, on June 2d, 1850, and died on September 9th, 1882, at the early age of thirty-two. His father is the minister of the Free Church at Dundee, and his mother, who died only a few months after her son, was the daughter of the Rev. John Dickson, missionary for some time at Astrakhan, in southern Russia.

From his very birth, Mr. Dodds was consecrated by his mother to the Lord, and she desired that Theophilus should be one of his names, asking for him that he might early love the Lord. In childhood he was cheerful and buoyant; full of energy and vivacity; always studious, and desirous of gleaning information on all subjects, wherever he might be. Uprightness and steady conscientiousness were his characteristics, even from childhood. It was remarked of him that "he always seemed to know what was right." And what he knew, he did.

HIS MOTHER'S INFLUENCE

upon him was powerful and beneficial. She was a marvellously gifted woman, and her attainments were far beyond the average of ladies even in the most cultured circles. She had a deep sense of her responsibility as a mother, and earnestly endeavored to cultivate the mind of her boy as well as to lead him to the Saviour. In her walks with him in childhood she taught him botany and the rudiments of other departments of natural history. Being also a linguist, and knowing several modern languages, including Italian, Russian, and Tartar, the two latter of which she had acquired while residing with her father in his mission field in Russia, she gave an early impulse to her son's desire for the acquisition of foreign tongues. Above all, as the daughter of a missionary of Christ's Gospel, she filled his young mind with missionary yearnings which never left him, though the extent of his missionary ideas then was that "he would go and preach to the heathen somewhere."

Dr. H. Bonar quotes the statement that "from infancy he" (Mr. Dodds) "had a DESIRE TO BE A MISSIONARY."

How profoundly his mother's spirit and teaching had affected the child may be inferred from an interesting scene which occurred when he was only six years old. His mother occasionally found him at that time crying bitterly in his bed, and on asking the cause of his grief he would sob out in reply, "I'm afraid I'll never be good enough to be a missionary of Christ." (See frontispiece.)

His entrance on the "narrow way which leads to eternal life" had nothing about it sudden or marked. Like many persons whose childhood is passed in the society and under the influence of a deeply religious mother his conversion was a gradual process, a growing into divine knowledge rather than an abrupt and startling revelation of the truth. He had saving faith while yet a child, and a passionate desire to preach Jesus to the world, but it was not until a later period that he attained the fuller knowledge and experience of Christian life.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

He received his preliminary education at the Lochee Free Church School, and in 1861 entered the High School of Dundee, where he proved his diligence as a student, and the thoroughness of his mind. He was noted among his associates for his earnestness in that particular; nothing short of unqualified success satisfied him in anything which he undertook. As relaxation from sterner occupations, he cultivated music and the arts, in which he delighted, and undertook numerous country rambles in which he fed and fostered his love of natural science, and added to the knowledge of botany which he had gained from his mother.

In November, 1866, he entered the University of St. Andrew's, and remained there during the greater part of the four years' course; exhibiting proficiency in all his classes, but especially in languages and moral philosophy. But the love of Christ's Gospel and the desire to preach it to his fellow-men, far off or near, soon absorbed all other longings and aspirations, and he became a leading spirit in the Students' Missionary Society. Unwisely, however, he studied so closely and continuously that his health was seriously impaired, and the completion of his course of study was retarded by nearly two years.

A STUDENT OF THEOLOGY.

Mr. Dodds now accepted a tutorship near Liverpool, in the family of R. P. Wood, Esq., moving about with his pupils, sometimes to Yarrow and sometimes to Edinburgh. His affection for, and interest in his pupils appeared to be almost paternal in character and depth, and the period was one of profitable quiet and of great enjoyment to himself. In 1871 he commenced his career as a student of theology at New College, Edinburgh. He went expectingly to his classes, and always with prayer. He returned to his apartments to digest and to pray over what he had learned.

HOME-MISSION WORK.

In 1875, the last of his college years, while yet attending classes, he was appointed missionary to a district, in connection with the church over which Dr. Horatius Bonar presides. On his work there he entered with energy and zeal, though it was only temporary—a preparation for more permanent duty elsewhere. This home-missionary work was most congenial. He threw himself into it with his whole heart. He forgot no one, however poor and wretched; and his patient way of treating them showed how carefully he had studied each case, and when the good seed began to spring up, he rejoiced with great heartiness.

FIRST VISIT TO PARIS.

In August, 1876, he married Mary, the daughter of Dr. Horatius Bonar, and in the following month went on his wedding tour up the Rhine, returning through Paris. His passing visit to that city was to be the link between it and himself, and to determine his great though brief life-work for the working-people there. He was prevailed upon to give a short Gospel address at one of the halls which he visited, and writing about it to his brother, he said: "They asked me to address a meeting; and I began with an interpreter; but finding that slow work I dropped it, and made a desperate plunge at French, and succeeded. The people were most attentive, eager listeners." Only two months before his marriage he had completed his student-life in Edinburgh, and on June 14th was "licensed" as a preacher by the Dundee Presbytery, and to the grand work of preaching the Gospel of Christ he most deliberately and solemnly consecrated without reservation the remainder of his days.

MR. M'ALL'S COLLEAGUE.

The following is from a letter to his father and mother regarding Paris. It is dated February 9th, 1877: "Since we were in Paris I have never ceased to be deeply interested in the work there among the Communists. Miss Howard, whom I have often met there, has often asked me if I would not think of Paris, but I always refused. Lately, however, I have had my thoughts turned there more than ever, and wrote to Mr. M'All asking for information. He writes—to our surprise—entreating us to think of the work, and says that he and his wife have long wished for a helper. He says that the want is very great, that they could do much more if they had more workers."

The prospect of being able at once to enter on the work, without a preliminary year, or two years, of language-learning, was an inviting one. He was already well equipped for the service of Christ there, and his past studies and training seemed to be of exactly the kind needed. The matter having been laid before the Lord in prayer, His will seemed to be clearly revealed, and in a short time all arrangements were made by Mr. Dodds and his wife for going to the sphere of their future labors. A house was taken for them at Belleville, and crime; and in the beginning of November, 1877, with his wife and first-born son, the missionary, now twenty-seven years of age, started for his destination. Mr. M'All received him with cordiality and affection, and from that day their mutual regard continued to increase.

THE CENTRE OF PARISIAN POVERTY

The rugged natures which he had now daily to encounter did not in the least daunt him. What their natures and dispositions are, the world learned in those days when Paris was dominated by the men of Belleville, who slew the Archbishop of Paris and other eminent men, and burned the Tuileries and other noted buildings. The men, many of them atheistical and desperate, spoke to him without reserve, and so did he to them. They soon found out that he was no "clerical," no "Jesuit," no spy, but one who had come from another land to speak to them about a religion of love and peace, and that he was in earnest. The words of grace which fell from his lips were words the like of which they had never heard before.

ATHEISM AND COMMUNISM,

open and undisguised, met Mr. Dodds on every side; but with singular tact and Christian kindness he encountered and disarmed both; nor had he ever to complain of rudeness or unkindness. Boldly, but kindly, he went to the worst with his divine Master's message of "salvation even to the uttermost," and was never repulsed. "It was touching, sometimes, to notice the infidel listening to the voice of entreaty, to see the rude man softening, to watch the hardened melting into tears, to witness the respectful bow, or the cordial shake of the hand, or the kind welcome from the grateful ouvrier."

GROWTH OF THE PARIS MISSION.

But though Belleville was Mr. Dodds's home for the first eighteen months, his work went far beyond that remarkable faubourg; and the mission gradually crept round the whole city, and permeated through its streets. On foot, in hacks, in omnibuses, on tramways, in boats, he went forth on his missionary errand of preaching or visiting. He was not confined within any limit or locality. All Paris was his district; afterward all France. Even before his arrival, Mr. M'All, with apostolic enthusiasm, had opened twenty-one stations, all craving help from the new missionary, and each year continued to add to their number.

Tourists have seldom troubled themselves about missionary work in Paris. Even most Christian people have hitherto overlooked it. They have visited the Louvre, the Madeleine, Notre Dame, the Arc de Triomphe, the Place de la Concorde, and the Champs Elysées; but the grandest sights of all—the Salles, with their ouvrier gatherings—they have not inquired for. They have "done" Paris, and wearied themselves in body and soul; but they have rushed past these interesting halls which angels might "desire to look into," without even stopping to listen to the happy songs, or the good news, or the invitations of divine love to the passing crowds.

THE TRUE SIGHTS OF PARIS

are not those the gay crowd flocks to, or those the paid commissionaire points out, or those that form the subject of conversation at the table d'hôte, or those the handbook enumerates, but those in which humble Christ-loving men and women are gathering in the refuse of Parisian society, the furthest sunk of the waifs of humanity. The real "spectacles" of the French capital are the nightly gatherings of the poor ouvriers listening to the "new religion" with happy eagerness, and singing with all their strength, both old and young, not the "Marseillaise" or the lewd song, but the "Cantiques Populaires," the hymns of everlasting life.

A SUMMARY OF WORK.

An idea of the extent of the work in Paris during the first year of Mr. Dodds's entrance upon it, may be obtained from the following figures from the Summary of the Mission for 1878: French meetings for adults, 2788; German ditto, 250; adult Bible classes, 249; French prayer-meetings, 151; Sunday-school meetings, 800; children's week day services, 145; young people's meetings and juvenile Bible classes, 469; psalmody meetings, 250; to say nothing of domiciliary visits, distribution of tracts and sale of Bibles and New Testaments, industrial schools for girls, special meetings and arrangements for women, etc., etc. Two incidents in illustration of the good done by these arduous and multifarious evangelistic agencies are selected from among many similar ones enumerated in the summary. The first is that of Eugene Petit, long employed in one of the large sugar factories of Paris. His health suffered, like that of many, from the exhausting heat he was obliged to endure in his work, and for years he was gradually sinking in consumption, sometimes in hospital, sometimes resuming work, at last confined to his lonely garret in one of the dark, densely-peopled tenements of Gare d'Ivry. There Mr. Dodds often visited him, and showed him the way of salvation. Many would have regarded the density of the man's ignorance as a hopeless obstacle to conversion, but Mr. Dodds never wavered, and after a time he had the satisfaction of seeing the sick man accept the Lord Jesus Christ in all His fulness as his Saviour and Friend, and witnessed his triumphant death.

A BELGIAN WORKMAN,

RESCUE OF MARIE.

In Mr. Dodds's journal, under date July 5th, 1878, there is this brief entry—"Grenelle: la porte étroite;' poor girl stood at the end weeping bitterly for sin; had dropped in from a hall; leading a sinful life; took her home with us." This poor girl had once been a domestic servant in a Christian family, but she had left the occupation to enter upon a vicious career. Her mistress's prayers had followed her during her wild life, and her dying words had been a prayer that poor Marie might still be found. Thus she had a knowledge of the Bible and of the sinfulness of her ways beyond most; and stumbling into the meeting accidentally, not knowing where she was going, some words, made powerful by the Holy Spirit, roused her sleeping conscience to agony; and when the meeting was over, she grovelled on the floor in her spiritual anguish, asking if she could be saved. (See frontispiece.) A happy home was subsequently found for her, and she became "a new creature in Christ Jesus," and is now industriously employed in winning others to the knowledge of His power and willingness to save.

In November, 1878, Mr. M'All went to Lyons, a city of 350,000, a home of early martyrdom, now a seat of extreme Popery, unblushing infidelity, and blatant communism. Here he opened four mission stations, and upon his return to Paris he induced Mr. Dodds to develop the work, and he accordingly labored there for two months. At the end of this time, however, failure of health, the effect of the moist climate of Lyons, made him glad to return to the more salubrious atmosphere of Paris.

A "MISSION JOURNEY."

Next year, 1879, Mr. Dodds went on a "mission journey" to England, and also to receive ordination from the Free Church. On May 9th he addressed a large meeting in Exeter Hall, London, and on the 15th the Free Presbytery of Edinburgh met in the Grange Church for his ordination, when a most solemn sermon was preached by his father-in-law, Dr. Bonar. For the next few days he spoke at a large number of meetings, and on June 5th crossed over to Ireland, preaching and speaking wherever he went on France and her readiness to accept the Gospel of Christ. He returned to Paris on the 15th, and recommenced work again immediately, paying frequent visits to Bordeaux, Boulogne, and other towns and villages, declaring the glad tidings of salvation, and everywhere conscious of the approval and benediction of the Lord.

VISIT TO AMERICA.

In September, 1880, the three great French religious societies—Société Centrale d'Evangelization, Société Evangelique de France, and Mission Intérieure—resolved to send representatives to the American churches, and Mr. Dodds was chosen to accompany the eloquent and accomplished M. Réveillaud as companion and interpreter, and they sailed, on September, 18th, from Havre for New York, where they arrived on the 30th, and were received by M. Elie Charlier.

Three months were spent in visiting different cities in the United States, among them being St. Louis. There M. Réveillaud was seized with sore throat, and Mr. Dodds proceeded alone to Cincinnati and Indianapolis, where he held a series of meetings on behalf of the French mission. In one of these cities he experienced one of the purest joys of his journey.

CHINESE LAUNDRYMEN.

A little community of Chinese—laundrymen by trade—had been converted to the Christ proclaimed in the Gospel. On hearing Mr. Dodds eloquently speak of the needs of France, these converts felt pressed in their hearts to contribute their part to the work, and at the close of his meeting they brought him a round sum of thirty dollars, which they had saved from their wages, and begged his kind acceptance of their gift. The incident is illustrated in the frontispiece. The tangible results of the visit of M. Réveillaud and Mr. Dodds amounted to about 30,000 dollars, which was divided among the French evangelistic societies, and, as we have had occasion to remark, they so thoroughly impressed the Christian churches among us with the needs and deserts of the French mission that large sums of money are still being collected for the support of the mission.

Mr. Dodds passed through America in haste, just as he passed through life. Yet, not in vain. He has left traces behind him, and many American hearts warm at the mention of his name.

After three months' absence he returned to Paris, and resumed his beloved though arduous work with untiring loyalty and deepening devotion. Had he a premonition that his time for earthly service would be but short? We know not. But he continued to labor on, and in May, 1882, when Dr. H. Bonar paid him a visit, he found him "thin, and not altogether like his former self; jaded and harassed as if his strength had been overstrained, and his placidity taxed to the uttermost. His appetite was giving way, his headaches were more frequent, and his general health by no means vigorous."

A REST.

The beginning of the end had already come, though Mr. Dodds thought himself "well though weary," and shut his eyes to the enfeeblement of his system. For a long time he had been working by forestalling his strength, and the heavy strain was now telling upon him. Having been prevailed upon to take a little rest, at last he consented, though reluctantly, and on August 27th, 1882, started with his wife and family for Le Buisson Luzas, a quiet little place, on the edge of a barren moor, about seventy-five miles south of Paris. But he seemed very weary when the journey was over, and for days afterward, and his racking headache showed no signs of yielding. He grew worse and worse, and on the sunny afternoon of Saturday, September 9th, 1882, he died.

FRUIT AFTER DEATH.

His remains were taken to Paris about the time of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's visit to that city, and it was in the old church of the Oratoire that the funeral service was conducted by M. Monod. On the platform where the coffin rested, the choir which assisted Messrs. Moody and Sankey stood and sang praise during their meetings, and there the anxious ones came forward to be spoken to. One day two sisters, well dressed, were seen sitting on the step weeping bitterly. "Are you weeping for your sins?" said a worker. "Oh, no, they are pardoned. We are weeping at the thought of dear Mr. Dodds." "Was it by his means you were brought to Christ?" "We have attended the Grenelle meetings regularly, and helped the singing ever since he used to go there, but it was his death that brought us to Christ." (See frontispiece.)

Mr. Dodds's mortal remains were buried in the beautiful Passy Cemetery, Paris, where an upright head-stone, with an appropriate inscription, marks the spot where his body lies awaiting reunion with the soul, which has passed into the presence of Him whom he so deeply loved and so faithfully served.

An Assembly of Medical Students Received a severe rebuke recently in Philadelphia. While waiting for the arrival of the professor who was to deliver a clinical lecture, they amused themselves by bantering three lady students present. When the mirth was at its height one of the ladies rose and addressed them. She said: "Gentlemen, I have been for eighteen years a missionary in China. The Chinese have no medical science, and superstitious rites are chiefly relied on in the treatment of disease. All the people are in need of medical aid, but the women are the neediest. A Chinese woman would under no circumstances go to a male physician for the treatment of any disease peculiar to her sex. She would be prevented by her own womanly delicacy and by all the notions of modesty held by those around her. She would suffer lifelong agony rather than violate her sense of propriety. Full of sorrow for the sufferings of these women, I have been looking in Christian America to see what hope of help for them might be here. I have been glad to find that in some of our great medical schools earnest and self-sacrificing women are fitting themselves for a work of mercy in Asia and other lands. Unless such women learn to do such work well there is no physical salvation for those afflicted ones. And, in behalf of those women, who have no medical care while they so sorely need it, I ask from you the courtesy of gentlemen toward ladies who are studying medicine in Philadelphia." The speaker was Miss A. M. Field, and it is gratifying to learn that her courageous address was heard with attention and elicited an apology from the male students.

THE GREAT FRESHETS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 17, 1884.

"The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice."—PSALM 93 : 3.

The Marriage of the Rivers—The Ohio their Magnificent Offspring—Possessed by a Demon—Its Revel of Death and Darkness—The Mercilessness of Natural Forces—The Dead Failure of Natural Religion—The Voices of the Floods—They have no Pity—Religions Dear at a Nickel—Advantages Turning to Disasters—Rivers of Prosperity—Disaster not a Sign of Divine Displeasure—Repetitious Misfortunes Hard to Bear—Walter Scott's Series of Trials—Job's Calamities—A Divine Insurance.

A CRY of anguish has rung across the land, and pulpits that are not icebergs of abstraction must sympathize with the national calamity. The rivers of America are its pride and wealth. The glory of New York is its Hudson, of New England is its Connecticut, of Canada is its St. Lawrence, of Virginia is its James, of Pennsylvania is its Susquehanna, of the continent its Ohio and Mississippi.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE RIVERS.

Far back in the geological ages the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers were married. What shaggy old prophet of the mountain proclaimed the banns and from what clusters of wild grape and bushes of whortleberry the wines were pressed for the nuptial festival we know not, but all the world knows they were married. Their one child was the Ohio, which soon outgrew its parentage and marched across the vast reach of this continent, and has had supreme mastery of much of its fertility and wealth. The rivers have paid it obeisance and poured their waters into its lap, for on its banks every day you may see kneeling the Muskingum, the Miami, the Wabash, the Sandy, the Licking, the Kentucky, the Cumberland, the Green, and the Tennessee. The area of the drainage of the Ohio and its branches 214,000 square miles.

Grand and majestic and stupendous Ohio! Farms and vineyards on this bank, coal and iron mines on the other bank. Vast commerce of many States floating this way and that on its surface. Great cities standing on its mighty terraces. Its topography bewildering for beauty and magnificence. Yet ordinarily one of the gentlest of rivers, excepting only about three miles of its long way, without rapids or precipice or sudden break. By day and night it pronounces its almost silent benediction upon the whole continent. But some demon of devastation now, as last year, seems to have possessed it. The luxuriant farms that it invited to look down into its mirror it seems determined to obliterate. With hands besoiled and wrathful it clutches for the vineyards. "Come with me," it cries to the mills, and the homes, and the churches, and the villages, and the cities, "come with me in my midnight revels and dance with and woe!" The voices of lullaby and the voices of good cheer of other days have been turned into voices of terror, voices of destruction, voices of fury, voices diabolic, till the whole land hears the wailing and the shriek, and with all the emphasis of the psalmist in the text we can appropriately cry, "The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice."

My first lesson is the mercilessness of natural forces and the dead failure of natural religion. Men in our times say nature is enough. The sunshine and the refreshing flower and the beautiful flora of garden and field are all they want for a religion. They learn from the natural world God is love. The volume of nature is all they need for divine revelation. But what of the Ohio floods? How can the naturalist find any mercy in them. They whelm a human life with no more commiseration than they feel when they float the log of a saw-mill. They have no more pity for a drowned man or woman or child than for a muskrat. They look at the bereavement of a household with no more emotion than they would at seeing two planks parted. According to my text but no one of the drops of the overflowing torrents has a tear in it save the tear of human anguish.

Poetically we speak of the rain as the weeping of the clouds and the wind among the tree branches as a sigh of sympathy and the heavens as veiled in mourning at some great disaster, but it is only a poetical figure. The clouds thunder and strike, but they never weep. The winds howl, but they never give sympathetic sigh. The sun will shine as brightly along the Ohio on the wrecked homesteads and the graves of this terrible casualty as though there had been no dirge and no heartbreak along all the swollen waters. Nature can smite as with lightning, can rend apart as by earthquake, can eat up as by locusts, can prostrate as by malarial sickness, can blind the eye as by explosion, can cripple the limb as by falling rock, can dethrone the reason as by a blow on the brain, but it cannot pity. It can blast, it can cut, it can scorch, it can grind, it can lacerate, it can consume, it can drown, but

IT CANNOT PITY.

If all those sufferers for the last week on the banks of the Ohio had knelt in the mud and slush, and prayed, saying, "O ye clouds, stop raining! O ye February floods, hush your voices! Stand back from my homestead! Spare my hard-earned fortune! Save my drowning wife and child!" the only answer would have been continued plash of rain, continued gurgle of waters, continued crash of falling farm-houses, continued bleat and bellowing of perishing flocks and herds. O my hearer, the world wants more than a religion of flowers, a religion of sunshine, a religion of art, for such religions fail when the floods of disaster lift up their voices.

I know of only one religion that comes in and offers better riches than the floods capture, better life than that which expired under the rily waters, and a future explanation, grand, glorious, and satisfactory of things we cannot understand now.

THIS OLD RELIGION,

old but not superannuated, old but not emeritus, it works to-day as well along the banks of the Ohio and the East River as it ever worked along the Jordan and the Euphrates. It is revealed religion that comes in to fill up the awful gap in natural religion.

Natural religion is a good foundation on which to build revealed religion, but it is only a bare foundation. When the floods come, what a poor shelter is a mere foundation! You want then a home such as God builds in the Gospel, its corner-stone the rock of ages, its chief pillar made out of the Calvarean cross, its altar of one great sacrifice, its dome catching and pouring down illumination celestial. What I say through these words to the penniless and bereft thousands of the West I say to you who, not suffering from the freshets of breaking-up winter, nevertheless have been swept again and again by floods of sorrow and calamity.

Take for yourselves that religion which has its mightiest triumphs when your earthly prospects are inundated. It did most for David when his son went into wickedness and rebellion, most for Mrs. Sigourney when her home was desolated, most for John Bunyan when the prison doors shut against him, most for the martyrs when the fires were kindled around them or the horses were fastened to draw their limbs apart or the hot lead was poured down their throat, and most for those children of God who in these dreadful days have been turned out from their homesteads under the dashing clouds and bounded, on north and south and east and west by the floods that have lifted up their voices.

You can have your religion of sunshine, but give me the religion for all weathers. You can have your religion of daisies and buttercups and daffodils and morning larks and robin redbreasts, but give me a religion that, while full appreciative of the brightness of this world shows its mightiest power when the lights o Cincinnati have gone out by the submergence o the gas-houses and whole villages are inundated and that can plant its foot on an all-sweepin inundation, crying, "The Lord sitteth upon th flood, the Lord is mightier than many waters an ever-present help, though the waters there of roar and be troubled, though the mountain shake by the swelling thereof."

I would not give a five-cent nickel for all th comfort of all the religions that were eve hatched out of the human skull or came up a malaria from the pit. I want a religion that ca sail not only a smooth river at noon when all th paddle-wheels drop opals and emeralds and sap phires, and all the sails are white as wings o sea-gull, but a religion that can calmly ride midnight freshet. Hear it, brothers and sisters Paul's religion of the dungeon, John's religio of tempest-lashed Patmos, Daniel's religion o the lockjawed lions.

ADVANTAGE TURNING TO DISASTER.

Another lesson of the Ohio overflow is that our advantages may turn out to be our disaster. Lands are more valuable near the rivers. There is nothing in fertility like the alluvium. Transportation is easier. The prospect is finer. How many retired merchants select building sites in landscapes irradiated by rivers. Nothing can take the place of water scenery. How often we see it advertised as a special advantage that property has river front. Many of the highest cultured farms and many of the wealthiest agriculturists are on the banks of the Ohio, but the reports say that some of these farms are thirty feet under water, and in many places only the chimneys of the farm-houses are visible. So our advantages may become our disaster. There are great on the banks of which men build expecting to stay forever. But some day the overflow comes in dissipated habits, which sweep to ruin a whole family. The land is strewn with the wrecks of men whose overflowing success swamped them forever. As long as the Ohio and Mississippi stay within their banks they are the highways of national blessing. When they overleap their usual channels they whelm the land with destruction. As long as our worldly successes are kept within bounds they are of advantage to us and to the world; but half of the United States to-day is inundated with monopolistic freshet. When small brooks get out of their usual bed they may damage a mill-pond or destroy a few haystacks or gully a road, but when these vast rivers of worldly gain break embankments a nation suffers.

Let us not through an overbearing disposition or our lack of self-control make the blessings of our life agencies of devastation to ourselves or others. The business of the Ohio River is to stay at home and carry lumber rafts and steamboats from Pittsburg and Wheeling to Louisville and Cincinnati. Instead of that it has gone to hunting down inoffensive farmers and their families, and take roughly by the bit great national industries, for there is not a great commercial house in New York to-day which does not directly or indirectly feel the effect of this business stoppage.

Go home, you red-mouthed torrent! Get back to your place, you vaulting monstrosity! Your father and mother, the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers, never sent you forth for such AN ACCURSED MISSION.

So there are men now swallowing up everything they can reach, gathering up all the tributaries of wealth, great Wabashes and Muskingums and Miamis of resource, and are waiting for more, hoping there will be other fortunes that will melt and pour into their fortune and other providential skies will rain emoluments upon them, and they cry to earth and heaven and hell, "Give! Give! Give! And after awhile they begin to swell, and they go too far out on this side, and they keep on swelling till they are too far out on the other side, and they gulp down these creditors who cannot pay, and these arms by foreclosure, and they swallow the result of this Wall Street panic and the result of that Chicago corner in wheat and the result of the watering of this railroad stock, and swallow and swallow and swallow and swell and swell and swell till they are great rivers of social and moral and financial damnation rolling through the land. Whether we may have on a small scale or on a large scale, let us keep within our proper channels, and not turn our capacity to help carry the world's burdens into destructive inundation. Let mountain stream and meadow rivulet, as well as every Ohio, keep its proper course.

Another lesson of this hour is that great calamities are in our time

NO SIGN OF DIVINE DISPLEASURE.

There are no more moral people on earth than many of those put out of fortune or life by this Ohioan submergence. Cattletsburg and Maysville, Kentucky, Huntington, West Virginia, Manchester and Gallipolis, Ohio, partly or entirely gone under this flood, are as moral villages as can be found on the continent. Moreover, the churches went under as well as the warehouses, the homes of Christian people as well as the homes of un-Christian. It is no evidence of divine displeasure with any locality that it suffers. There are men very liberal with divine judgments, and when tongues of fire lick up half a Chicago, some people say that is because Chicago is so wicked, and when tongues of fire lick up a large part of Boston, some say that is because Boston is so conceited. And now some might call this affliction of the South-west a divine judgment. That will not do.

There are hundreds of places by their iniquity inviting the divine judgments who were never struck with lightning or washed under inexorable wave. If Brooklyn and New York had been punished for all their sins, the Hudson and the East River would now stand higher than the piers of the East River Bridge, and bluefish, which our sportsmen have not been able to catch, would be holding carnival in our dining-halls and pantries. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth" is a precept we apply to bereft individuals, and why not to afflicted neighborhoods?

States and nations, as well as individuals, may be scourged in mercy. Who knows but that God means for these afflicted regions in time to come harvests that shall more than make up for the present despoliation? Who knows but there shall come to them moral and religious advantages that shall turn this awful ravage of the elements into highest blessing? God is rich, and He can pour into these valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi a tide of mercy deeper, broader, mightier than these awful surges of doom. Because as individuals, or as neighborhoods, or as a nation you are called to suffer, do not conclude that you are under the divine displeasure. Reaching under all those raging Ohios of grief there are alluviums for whole gardens of grace. Every river of suffering has on both sides foliaged terraces reaching on up to the hanging gardens of the heavenly paradise.

Another lesson of this destruction is that is hardest to bear. Last year and now this year! They had just got their houses and barns rebuilt. They had just got their fences restored. They had just purchased their stock for their farms. They had mortgaged the lands that they might start again, and now all is gone. In the three cities of Cincinnati, Covington, and Newport 30,000 people are to-day reported homeless, and 20,000 laborers without work. We thought that last year was enough, but now comes the duplicate of wretchedness. Scores of thousands of good people are at their wit's ends. Repetitious misfortune is hard to bear, as some of you know. In one man's life comes despondency, then comes bankruptcy, then comes sickness, then comes bereavement. Loss after loss, trouble after trouble, floods chasing floods.

Eighteen hundred and fourteen was the year of Walter Scott's greatest prosperity. Fortunes and sceptres and crowns at his feet. In 1824 Constable & Co., the publishing house, failed, and crippled

WALTER SCOTT'S FORTUNE.

Soon after, Ballantine & Co., the publishing house in which Walter Scott was secretly a partner, failed, and the two failures threw him over $600,000 in debt. With his magician's pen he went to work to pay it. But then his wife died. A little while after came paralysis. A little while after that came apoplexy. A little while after that came the cold shoulder of the world. A little while after that, lying in his invalid chair, he asks his daughter to put his pen in his hand, and that hand which had given to the world "Ivanhoe," and "Heart of Midlothian," and "Rob Roy," and "Guy Mannering," and "Maid of Perth," and "Kenilworth," could not write his own name. You would say bankruptcy was enough, you would say the neglect of the world was enough, you would say sickness was enough, but it was flood after flood.

Behold Job. First came the destruction of his servants and of his oxen. Next came the destruction of his sheep. Next came the destruction of his camels. Next came the death of his children. Next came the cluster of carbuncles. Next came the impertinent philosophizing of Zophar and Bildad and Eliphaz. Next came the clatter of his termagant spouse. Trouble after trouble. Flood of 1884 annex to 1883. Joel in his prophecy describes what figuratively has come upon some of you, when he says, "That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten, and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten, and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten."

Blessed be God, great and repetitious misfortune has great and repetitious mercy. The floods that rise over the top of the highest mountains have on the top of them an ark. The blackest storm clouds are buttresses for the brightest bridge of rainbow. But do not let us be unsympathetic with repetitious misfortune. Through all the channels that open before you, by the Mayor of this city and other cities, and through committees of relief, and by direct telegram to western cities, show your generosity. Do not say, "God bless them." Let us bless them ourselves before we say "God bless them." The meanest people I have ever known are full of "God bless you's."

Surely no man who has a full loaf of bread in his house will consent to eat it till he has done something to appease this woe. Some thoughtless people say: "Why don't those inhabitants get out of those places and prepare farms and homes elsewhere?" To this idiotic suggestion I oppose the remark that a calamity may not come there again in ten generations. Because two years have been scourged, it is no reason to believe that any other will be scourged. Beside that, it is impossible for vast multitudes of them to remove to other places. Beside that, all rivers are liable to overflow. Do you say, "Go, then, away from all the rivers and seek the uplands?" I reply then the farm may be scourged with drought or eaten up of grasshoppers. Better not build a barn anywhere, because it might be struck with lightning. Better not build a house anywhere lest it be unroofed of a hurricane. There is no better or safer place on earth to live than on the banks of the Ohio. Let the people stay there, and let us by outrushing charities from all parts of the land make it possible for them to stay there. "But," you say, "I helped them last year, and I can't always be helping them." So God fed you last year, and the year before, and the year before that, and if the Lord should drop you next year because He helped you this year, your earthly residence would be very much abbreviated.

Beside that, it would be well to get

for ourselves. You know the Tontine plan in many of the insurance companies by which, in consideration of the payment of a certain amount of premium annually, at the end of ten, fifteen, or twenty years the amount of the policy is paid back to the man himself, and so it differs from ordinary insurance, which pays the amount after death to one's survivors. But I have a divine insurance policy on an improved Tontine plan, which makes that which you pay in charity a premium to be returned to you at any time you need it. Psalms 41 : 1 : "Blessed is he that considereth the poor, the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble."

How soon we may need that Tontine policy paid to us I know not. People who have lived in larger houses than we live in have, through the misfortunes of life, come to be homeless, and I have known men who were puzzled about what investments they should make after a while not able to get fifteen cents for a dinner in a cheap restaurant. All other insurance companies, with their millions of capital, might give way, but God will never become poor, and the banks of heaven will never suspend payment, and an insurance backed up by all the resources of the universe and all infinity will never fail to meet its obligation.

The floods may whelm thousands of millions of property, the farms and the cities, but concerning the love of God we are assured, "Many waters cannot quench, many floods cannot drown it." And the tides of destruction shall stand back at the promise, "Surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him." All the forces of nature shall become our coadjutors, and the wild waters instead of crying out in objurgation against us will, at God's behest, help celebrate our victory as He commands: "Let the sea roar and the fulness thereof, and let the floods clap their hand."

A Letter Worth $44,000 was Recently Produced in a Maryland court. The recipient of the letter was the plaintiff in a suit which has been decided in the Court of Appeals at Westminster, Md. Mrs. Eliza Ann Byers claimed $40,000 from the estate of the late J. Henry Hoppe, which the executors refused. Her claim was based on a letter from Mr. Hoppe, by whom she had been reared from childhood, which terminated with the words, "And, Ann, after my death you are to have $40,000. This you are to have, will or no will. Take care of this letter until my death." The claimant will now have two years' interest on her legacy, so that the letter is worth just $44,800 to her. The lady showed her prudence in attending to the injunctions of the gentleman, whose adopted child she was. Those who trust in God's Word will receive a still more precious and enduring inheritance, and they will not have to sue for it. God will honor His own promise (Heb. 10 : 23).

An Undesirable Immigrant from Ireland was last week returned to that country. His name was Hugh Wallace, his age forty-five, and he arrived on February 10th by the White Star Steamship Republic. He informed the Immigration Commissioners that he was an inmate of the Union Work-house at Cootehill, County Cavan, for about twenty years. A government official named Dooly told him that he would have to go to America, and gave him a passage ticket and ten shillings. Wallace is totally blind in one eye, and can see but little with the other, and is unable to maintain himself. As the man was likely to be a public burden, he was sent back to his native land. That course was in conformity with our arrangements with the British Government, which has no right to pay the expenses here of people unable to maintain themselves. The would-be immigrant is thus placed in a humiliating position between the government anxious to be rid of him and the government refusing to receive him. Happily for him and others he need not be in such a position in reference to his eternal future. It is the boast of the Christian religion that even the vilest and the most helpless are welcome, if they repent and believe (Luke 14 : 21).

THE FUTURE ANTICHRIST.

By Frederick Brodie.

IN Daniel 9 : 27, a portion of Israel make a covenant with the Antichrist, and things go on fairly enough under it until the middle of the week, when he seems to break through it with violence, and cause all to worship him, and then it would seem that persecutions and martyrdoms begin to take place.

The Apostle John in Revelation 13 sees a wild beast rise from the sea, a very different word to that translated beast in chapter 4, and here especially meaning a beast of prey. It comes up from the sea, that symbol for all anarchy and confusion of men. Out of such a tumultuous concourse comes Antichrist.

So confident are they who make a covenant with him that they even defy God, and, as seen in chapter 17 : 14, are overcome. He has power to continue or make war, or as the Sinaitic version has it, to do what he will, as it is written in Dan. 11 : 36, for forty-two months or three years and a half; these are the last three years and a half of the Tribulation. He rises up at the very commencement of it, for he makes a seven years' covenant with the tribes in Jerusalem, but only when he gets this supreme Satanic power has he power to kill the two witnesses in chapter 11 : 7. The reason why he blasphemes God and them that dwell in heaven is shown in II Thess. 2 : 4, for there we read that this one "opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God," and that he "sitteth in the Temple of God, showing himself that he is God." The dwellers on the earth (or in the land) are seen now to worship the Antichrist, all except the sealed ones whose names are written in the book of life. This book is referred to in Dan. 12 : 1, where speaking of the great tribulation it is written, "at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." This power of the Antichrist continues a time, times and a half, or 1260 days, as in the following verse 7, which further states, that then the Lord "will have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people," as also is written in Deut. 22 : 36, and when this takes place the Lord will Himself descend and restore His ancient people to a power and position that they never have before experienced.

The second wild beast of Rev. 13 seems to be the Satanic imitation of the Holy Ghost, leading souls of men to worship the first wild beast, and therefore to rank idolatry. It is seen "to come up out of the earth" as though this would indicate that its origin was from the more organized or most probably from the ecclesiastical authorities on the earth, and not from democratic anarchy. This wild-beast must be looked upon not so much as a person as a spiritual influence, and this is borne out by chapter 17 : 13, where the ten kingly powers have one mind to give their power and strength to this second wild beast, or their whole influence. These kingly powers are seen on the head of the first beast as crowned horns. They are doubtless the resuscitation of the old Roman Empire under the leadership of Antichrist, which is seen in chapter 17 fully symbolized, and is now in spirit on the earth in the shape of the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. This great masterpiece of the devil still remains up to this period, and is carried on by the Antichrist himself, until he breaks the covenant with the Jew in the midst of the week, and then is worshipped himself as God, and all ecclesiasticism is forever abolished.

The Third Vial of Revelation 16, results in bloodshed instead of wormwood bitterness as under the Third Trumpet. This is evidently the judgment of that ecclesiastical portion of Babylon of chapter 17 : 16, when the idolatry of the Antichrist is set up, and that which up to this time had retained a certain form of godliness is forever cast down. Babylon in fact tramples upon its own Babylonian worship, and idolatry commences. The reference of verse 6, "for they have shed the blood of saints," has evident allusion to chapter 17 : 6, and Isa. 49 : 26, and now the righteous judgment of God will "reward her double, unto her double according to her works."

Antichristian dominancy lasts until the end, and is only extinguished by the destruction of Antichrist by the Lamb, whose title in Rev. 17 is also mentioned in Deut. 10 : 17. The war there mentioned is that of chapter 19 : 19, where the Lord and His armies come down from heaven; it is also the same as the Armageddon battle, which is spoken of in the identifying terms, of "the battle of that great day of God Almighty."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Actor's Confession.—Mr. Maughan, an Indefatigable town missionary in Glasgow, said at a recent meeting: "An actor once told me that since his conversion to Christ, nine years before, he had never entered a theatre. One of his old friends asked him, 'Why! do you never visit the theatre?' 'No,' he answered, 'and never will. I thank God that I am changed, "old things have passed away, all things have become new." With my altered views of things, it would be impossible for me to be a Christian and an actor.' This declaration should be a sufficient reply to those Christians who ask, 'Is it right to go to the theatre?' How would they like to die in a theatre?"

A Graduate of the Billiard-Room.—Mr. Oatts related: "Some terribly real tragedies are being enacted daily in our midst. A lady called upon me yesterday about her son. He was in a situation where his master gave him great liberty. He spent sometimes as many as two or three hours during the day in a billiard-room, and every night he was there till between twelve and one o'clock. The mother, with a breaking heart, told me this, and asked if I could do anything to find out where he now was, as he had gone from home, and she had not heard from him for more than a year, and is in an agony of suspense about him, fearing the worst. Her heart is like David's when he bemoaned the awful fate of Absalom." Employers should look after their servants, and not leave them without friendly counsel and help. More especially is it the duty of Christian employers to inquire into the habits of their young men and to encourage them in every good thing.

The Value of Good Friendships.—Mr. Oatts, speaking on the great benefit which fellowship-meetings are to young men, recently said: "If it had not been for the influence of one of these meetings, more than twenty years ago, it is not probable, according to human calculation, that I would have been engaged in Christian work today. I had a letter from a gentleman in Colombo, last Monday, in which he says that when he came to Glasgow, a Christian worker took him by the hand, and introduced him to a fellowship-meeting, where he formed friendships which resulted in his finding Jesus, the best of friends, and moulded his life into the paths of Christian usefulness. Business called him to Colombo, and there he has started a 'Young Men's Christian Association,' which has become so strong that it has begun to publish a paper for young men. The first number came to hand by the last mail, and it certainly gives much promise of being very useful."

A Memorable Watchnight.—Mr. Mathews said: "The Wesleyans have held for many years a Watchnight service to bring in the new year. A Jew who had confessed Christ joined that body, and thought he would like to go to the Watchnight meeting. His wife, being a Jewess, was against his going; but he went, and stayed till half-past twelve, and got home early in the morning. The wife was angry, and said, 'Where have you been till this hour? if you were a good Christian you would have been home like a good husband long before this.' He replied, 'I have been at the Watchnight meeting.' 'Watch meeting! What have you been watching?' 'I can't explain it to you, but when God gives you light you will understand it. It is a good many years since we were married, but we have never had family-worship. Let us begin the New Year with prayer.' He at once fell on his knees. She did not kneel with him, but as he went on in prayer she knelt, and when he rose she still remained in the position of a suppliant. The wife had there and then surrendered herself to the Lord as her Saviour, and lived to testify for Him."

A Victim of Dishonest Greed.—Mr. Garrioch related: "Some years ago a magnificent East Indiaman was wrecked on the British coast, but all the crew were saved with the exception of one sailor. This man knew that one of the ship's mates had about three hundred gold sovereigns stowed away in his chest, and as the vessel was fast settling down, he thought, 'If I can get these sovereigns they are mine.' He went down to the cabin to execute his avaricious wish, and stole the money. Putting it into a handkerchief, he tied it round his waist. When he got on deck again, the last boat, heavily freighted with precious lives, had pushed away from the sinking ship, and was a short distance off. The man's only chance, therefore, was to jump for the boat. Bracing himself up, he made a desperate spring, but, alas! fell short, and sank like a piece of lead to the bottom, with the weight of the money from the mate's cabin. His sin had found him out. One sin of any sort is quite enough to sink any man."

A Procrastinating Centenarian.—Mr. John Thomson related: "I was in North Shields one day, and was struck by the very aged appearance of a woman I met. In the course of our conversation I remarked, 'You appear to be very old.' 'Yes, sir,' she promptly replied. 'I shall be one hundred and five years next birthday.' 'I trust you have made full preparations for eternity?' When she told me her age, there was an accent of gratified pride in her voice which rather amused me, but as she replied to my last query her tones were changed into an angry snarl. She declared, 'There is time enough for that'—the very words which are used by girls in their teens when Christians press upon them the need of having Christ in their hearts to guide and to help them through the dangers of the world. It saddened me to think of the answer, coming from one who had reached such an advanced age. God says, 'Now is the accepted time.' The devil whispers, 'There is time enough for that.'"

Waifs and Strays in the Colonies.—The Rev. Mr. Duff said: "We have great need to pray for our young men in the Colonies. Shortly after I landed in Melbourne I met a young man in the street whose appearance showed me most clearly that he was not doing well. At first, I did not know him, but on closer examination I recognized him as a fellow-student with me in my college days. After mutual inquiries as to friends, and so on, I asked, 'What are you doing now?' He sadly answered, 'I am utility man in the theatre.' Some time afterward, in the streets of Sydney, I was stopped by a young man whose face was very winning, but whose clothing was very, very poor. It was the old story; he wanted help. He belonged to Glasgow, and had come out to better himself; but instead of doing so by spending laborious days, he had simply ruined himself by giving way to the temptations which surround young men in the Colonies, as well as in Glasgow. Both these cases, one an educated, cultured man, the other a simple working man, prove that what our young men need is the grace of God in their hearts and Christ as their Saviour and ever-present Friend."

Invited to a "Free and Easy."—Mr. Galloway related: "A friend of mine, when a little boy, was taught by his mother to bow at her knee every night, and pray. Before rising he had to repeat the verse, 'My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not' (Proverbs 1 : 10). In course of time he went to Glasgow, and entered a large warehouse, where there were a set of fast, or rather loose, men banded together to hold a free and easy,' where smoking, drinking, and ribald or comic song-singing formed the staple of the night's enjoyment. They used every means to make him join them, first by enticements, then by jeer and laughter, till they extorted from him an unwilling promise to attend their meetings. The influence and memory of the faithful training and believing prayers of his Christian mother never left him, for on the evening he had agreed to go, as he went from his lodgings, the text rang through his mind. His mental struggles were so great that he was overcome and had to lean against a lamp-post to keep from falling. The Holy Spirit conquered; the lad turned and fled back to his lodgings and fell upon his knees in tears and prayer. It was the turning point of his life, for that very hour he dedicated himself to the service of Christ, and ultimately rose to the highest position in the city of Glasgow, and died a few years ago much respected by Christian men and women all over the country."

THE RESTORATION AND CONVERSION OF THE JEWS.

By the Rev. E. J. Edgren,

Professor of Biblical Interpretation in the Morgan Park Theological Seminary.*

Prophecies Relating to Literal Israel—Some to be Saved Individually—When Israel will be Saved in the Mass—The Overthrow of Gog—Great Prophecies—Israel to Return Unconverted.

THE prophecies concerning the restoration and conversion of Israel are of vital interest. There are many prophecies with regard to this people, which cannot with any just method of interpretation be applied to spiritual Israel. There is a spiritual Israel, children of Abraham by faith, and there is much in prophecy applicable to it. But there is also children of Abraham by nature, and this Israel is preserved in the world to the present day for some great purpose in the future, a purpose richly indicated in the prophetic word. Israel shall yet be converted to God. About their conversion Paul clearly states, that "a remnant shall be saved" (Rom. 9 : 27), and that hardness in part has come upon Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles come in; and so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. 11 : 25, 26). Hence, some will be saved before that time, but not until then will Israel be saved in mass.

Of this great salvation, still in the future, even the prophets of the Old Testament evidently were directed by the Holy Spirit to write, and that very fully. See for instance, Amos 9 : 11–15; Isa. 11 : 11–16; Jer. 23 : 3–8; 30–33; Ezek. 36 : 22–38; 37 : 39. Some of these prophecies received a partial, subordinate fulfilment at the restoration from Babylon, but evidently not the ultimate fulfilment. Notice, besides the description of the condition of Israel, such expressions as, that they shall no more be rooted out of their land (Amos 9 : 15); strangers shall no more exact service of them (Jer. 30 : 8); they shall fear God forever, and He will not turn away from them, to do them good (Jer. 32 : 39, 40); He will no more hide His face from them (Ezek. 39 : 29). The wicked shall be judged, but Israel saved, and this in the latter days. "In the latter days ye shall consider it" (Jer. 30 : 24). Surely these prophecies have not yet been fulfilled, for even now Israel is rooted out of its land, and God has turned His face from them and they serve Him not. But the time will come, when all that is foretold shall be realized. It will be in the latter days, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall have come in.

That the prophet is writing about literal Israel, is certain from the language used. We cite from Ezekiel: "Therefore say unto the house of Israel, thus saith the Lord God: Not for your sakes do I this, ye house of Israel, but for my holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the nations whether ye are gone. . . . And I will take you from among the nations, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you unto your own land. And I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean. . . . And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and my judgments ye shall keep and do. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers, and ye shall be my people, and I, even I, will be your God. . . . In the day that I shall cleanse you from all your iniquities, I will also cause you to inhabit the cities; and the ruins shall be rebuilt, and the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. . . . And the nations that are left round about you shall know that I, the Lord, rebuilt the ruins, and plant what was desolate. I, the Lord, have spoken, and I will do it" (Ezek. 36 : 22–38).

In the following chapter this restoration is figuratively represented in a vision of the resurrection of dry bones. See the divine explanation in 5 : 11–14. In the 39th chapter, v. 22–29, we read: "And the house of Israel shall know that I am the Lord their God from that day and forward,"* i.e., from the day of the overthrow of Gog and forward.

"And the nations shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquities. . . . Now will I restore the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, and I will be jealous for My holy name. And they shall bear their shame and all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwell safely in their land, and none maketh afraid; when I bring them again from the peoples, and gather them out of their enemies lands, and am sanctified in them in the sight of the many nations. And they shall know that I am the Lord their God, who caused them to be led into captivity among the nations, when I shall have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there. And I will no more hide My face from them; for I shall have poured out My Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God." Surely the Israel of this prophecy is not spiritual but literal Israel. Here, then, we have with certainty the return to Palestine of literal Israel, and their conversion to God at

THE OVERTHROW OF GOG.

Now what is this overthrow of Gog? The conversion of Israel will take place when the fulness of the Gentiles have come in, i.e., at the close of the present great missionary period. But will this be premillennial or postmillennial? Evidently the first; because Israel is thenceforward to know God and to inhabit and use their ancient land, and there shall be nations round about them, who shall know them and recognize in their history the hand of God. For all this there would scarcely be time after the millennium. Besides, it is not only highly improbable that Israel will remain unconverted during that blissful period, but certain from other Scripture that it will not be so. The overthrow of Gog, the mighty enemy of Israel, in his powerful attack upon it, must then be the destruction of Antichrist and his host, predicted in Rev. 19. Hence Gog, a term borrowed from the northern barbarian Asiatics who, in Ezekiel's time, descended from their highlands on an expedition against Egypt, here symbolizes Antichrist, as at another time Gog and Magog symbolize the final deluded rabble, a thousand years later, in its attack upon the beloved city (Rev. 20 : 8). The symbol is the same, because of the similarity, not the identity, of the foe.

There are other prophecies making mention of the overthrow or punishment of a mighty enemy, in connection with the salvation of Israel. So Joel 3. When God shall restore the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, He will judge the hostile nations in the valley of Jehosaphat. So in Isa. 59. Paul by inspiration makes the 20th verse a prophecy of Israel's future conversion (Rom. 11 : 26). In connection with it we read that God will pour His fury upon His adversaries, and the islands, i.e., distant countries, shall be recompensed. The enemy coming in like a flood, shall be driven away by the breath of Jehovah (Isa. 59 : 18–20). So also very clearly Zech. 12–14. The nations shall be gathered against Jerusalem, which shall suffer greatly; but the Lord shall fight against those nations, and the remnant of Israel shall be saved. These are evidently parallel with one another and with Ezek. 39; then also with Rev. 19. This is further corroborated by the fact that they are all followed by some allusion to, or description of, the millennium. But from Rev. 19 and II Thess. 2 we have already seen that Christ comes personally and visibly to the destruction of Antichrist. The conversion of Israel, therefore, takes place at the visible coming of the Lord.

Since this is so, the language of prophecy regarding the salvation of Israel will naturally agree with this fact. Thus in Joel 3, "the Lord will roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem." In Isa. 59, "the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob." Though this prophecy may be regarded as having had an incipient fulfilment in the first coming of the Lord, yet it may, and doubtless does, refer to another by and by. In Hos. 6 : 1–3, where repentant Israel seeks God and is raised on the third day—a symbolic expression pointing to Israel's conversion—the going forth of the Lord is "certain as the morning dawn." In Ezek. 38 : 19, 20, the whole land shall shake at the presence of the Lord; the mountains shall be thrown down and the steep places fall, when He interferes to overthrow Gog. In Zech. 12–14 chapters, we also read of the presence of the Lord as actual and visible: "I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplications, and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced" (12 : 10). Again: "Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle. And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east" (14 : 3, 4).

These prophecies have often been differently interpreted, but certainly the parallelism requires for them a reference to Christ's visible coming and presence at the overthrow of Antichrist, and the salvation of literal Israel. This interpretation is also perfectly natural. It is indeed difficult to see how, for instance, Zech. 14 : 4 can be interpreted otherwise, without a very doubtful spiritualizing of the text. As in Ps. 22 the piercing of the hands and feet of the suffering Messiah is a literal element in the midst of figurative language, so here, the feet of the Lord standing upon the Mount of Olives, in all probability is a literal element in a prophecy containing also highly figurative parts. Notice also the Saviour's own words while in the flesh. Just as He was to be pierced by the Jews, He mourned over Jerusalem, foretold its desolation, and added: "Ye shall not see Me henceforth till ye shall say, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. 23 : 39). This they will not say until they are converted. Then they shall say it.

But does not then this prophetic utterance of the Saviour most naturally combine His visible return to the earth with the conversion of Israel? In the light of prophecy, well known to the Saviour, as well as from the utterance itself the conclusion seems almost unavoidable that it does. But then we have it from Christ's own lips that His coming will be premillennial. How perfect the agreement of prophecy throughout! Israel shall largely return to Palestine, unconverted. There they shall witness the overthrow of the last great leader of antichristianity, see the Lord coming in glory, and say at last believing: "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." Thus the Scripture referring to the conversion of Israel strongly points to the premillennial coming of Christ.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Total Immigration Statistics for the past year have now been published by the chief of the bureau of statistics, who reports that during December there arrived in the customs districts of Baltimore, Boston, Detroit, Huron, Minnesota, New Orleans, New York, Passamaquoddy, Philadelphia, and San Francisco 28,216 passengers, of whom 23,766 were immigrants, 3615 citizens returned from abroad, and 1053 aliens not intending to remain in the United States. The total number of immigrants at the above ports for the year 1883 was 560,196, as against 712,544 in 1882. England and Wales contributed 70,033, Ireland 63,841, Scotland 19,541, Austria 11,032, Germany 180,812, Italy 29,446, Norway 19,704, Sweden 28,034, Dominion of Canada 62,218. All other countries 65,821.

The Report of the Court of Inquiry on the Proteus disaster reflects on General Hazen and Lieutenant Garlington, who it considers are both responsible with others for the failure to relieve Lieutenant Greely. After citing several blunders which contributed to the failure, the court says: "While the foregoing grave errors and omissions are regarded as having either directly led or largely contributed to the abortive issue of the expedition, yet, as they are all deemed to have been due to the lack of a wise provision and sound judgment in the exercise of a wide administrative discretion and unattended by any wilful neglect or intentional dereliction of duty, the court, after mature deliberation, is of opinion that no further proceedings before a general court-martial are called for."

The Greely Relief Expedition Appropriation is at last safely through Congress. Senator Hale, last week, in an earnest speech begged the Senate to reconsider its decision to insist on its amendment, as the dispatch of the expedition was a matter of urgency. Senator Cockrell opposed the proposal that the Senate should yield, and strongly urged it to be firm, although the expedition might be delayed thereby. Happily on a vote being taken, the number for agreeing with the House was twenty-nine. Twenty-two senators voted for a continuance of the deadlock. Captain W. A. Kirkland has been selected to command the Greely Relief Expedition. He has been examined by the Naval Medical Board as to his physical fitness to go on the expedition. He was found to be sound, with the exception of a slight rheumatic affection in one of his arms. It is thought that his slight disability will not interfere with his being assigned to the command of the expedition. Twelve line officers will be needed, six for each vessel. As was expected, the caution of the Senate was wholly unnecessary, as five times the number of men needed have already volunteered to go.

Ex-Speaker Keifer's Accusation against General H. V. Boynton, of the Cincinnati Gazette, has been referred to a special committee of the House, General Boynton having asked for an investigation. Mr. Keifer's charge is that while he was Speaker, General Boynton approached him with a corrupt proposal. The committee met for the first time on February 16th, when Mr. Keifer, who was represented by counsel, begged for delay. He said the witnesses he intended to produce resided in various States, and were not ready to give evidence. The chairman pointed out to Mr. Keifer that his request was unreasonable, as several weeks had elapsed since the charge was made, during which the evidence, if any exists, could have been collected. Also that the matter was not one that ought to be delayed, as, if Mr. Keifer had told the truth, General Boynton ought not to remain in the gallery another day. Nevertheless, as the ex-Speaker was not ready to proceed, an adjournment for a few days was ordered. General Boynton declares that he can prove his innocence beyond a doubt, and is anxious that there should be no delay. It is obvious that the investigation ought to be prompt and most thorough, as the question involved affects the honor of the press. It may be hoped that the committee will proceed in such a way as to leave no doubt on the public mind as to the truth or falsity of ex-Speaker Keifer's accusation.

The Rumors in Circulation as to the Critical state of General Grant's health since his accident in the winter are dispelled by an announcement in last week's Medical News, which states authoritatively that General Grant is doing very well, although his recovery from the effects of his fall has been delayed by an intercurrent rheumatism, affecting first the uninjured limb and then flying about to various regions. He walks about the house on crutches, and is waiting only for pleasant weather to go out.

The Constitutionality of the Nashville Sunday law has been declared by the Supreme Court. In deciding the test cases submitted to it, the court said: "To preserve the quiet and peace of a city or town on the recognized Sabbath of the people of the United States is a legitimate object to be consummated by the governing body of a city in such appropriate manner as shall serve the end, and when the power is granted its exercise by that body is a legitimate exercise of legislative power."

The Floods Caused Severe Suffering Last week in the afflicted cities. In Cincinnati on Wednesday the water-gauge registered over seventy feet, the highest point reached in a hundred years. Six thousand people were sleeping in the school-houses, and nearly a thousand relief boats plied in the submerged streets carrying provisions and fuel to people imprisoned in the upper stories of their dwellings. The following graphic description of scenes in the neighborhood was telegraphed on Thursday by a correspondent of the Times: "Bad as the situation is in Cincinnati and its suburbs, it is slight compared to that in some of the smaller river towns. The tow-boat Kate Waters began yesterday to make daily trips to up-river points. Between here and Maysville there are a dozen towns that are in the greatest extremity. The river had been closed for several weeks by ice, and supplies had run low. Many families when they fled to the hills had nothing in the way of food to carry with them except potatoes. These they have roasted in the fires they have kept burning when rain was not falling. There is a little town called Neville, where the Kate Waters found only a few roofs and the steeple of a church out of water. At Point Pleasant were two houses that were not inundated; one of these was the birthplace of General Grant. The water was all around the house and the cellar was full. At California, Augusta, Higginsport, and Ripley a like condition of things was found. Farm-houses along the banks were also flooded. One isolated house was seen with the occupants standing on the roof.. A skiff was going to their rescue from the shore. It was learned that they had been living in the second story, which the flood had invaded during the night. The man of the house cut a hole through the roof and lifted his wife and six children and the family dog up through it. Then he handed up some articles which they specially valued, and clambered up through the hole himself. There they had been for several hours waiting for some one to come to their rescue. The people on the hills were in a dreadful plight; their only protection from the storm was rude tents made with blankets." From Jeffersonville, Ind., Scranton, Pa., Wilkesbarre, Pa., Louisville, Ky., Wheeling, W. Va., come heartrending reports of suffering, and in some places there has been loss of life from falling buildings. On Saturday morning there was a general report from all quarters that the flood was stationary, and during the day came the welcome intelligence that it was slowly falling. On Monday a further improvement was reported in the Ohio valley, but in the Indiana and Kentucky towns the water was rising.

An Appropriation for the Relief of the Sufferers by the floods in the Ohio Valley was granted by Congress on February 12th. The sum of three hundred thousand dollars was appropriated by an almost unanimous vote of the House, and the bill passed the Senate immediately after. Mr. Follett, speaking for the Appropriations Committee, said a bill for an additional sum would be offered if necessary. The Secretary of War immediately took active measures to carry out the wishes of Congress. Orders were issued for General Amos Beckwith, Assistant Commissary General, stationed at St. Louis, to proceed to Cincinnati, where he has general charge of the distribution of supplies. He will establish headquarters at Cincinnati and act directly under orders from the Secretary of War. Orders were also issued for the purchase of supplies, and the charter of a sufficient number of boats to distribute them at places where they are most needed. It has also been arranged that an officer of the army shall accompany each boat and superintend the issue of supplies. The general plan of relief determined upon is the same as that pursued in affording relief to the sufferers from the overflow of the Mississippi River last year. On Friday another grant of $200,000 was made and promptly signed by the President. A telegram received from Cincinnati says that the Secretary of War had done grandly in the matter; that red tape, whose interference had been feared, had been all cut up and thrown away; that the cold weather, though better than rain, had increased the distress; that neither pen nor imagination could sufficiently describe the sufferings of the people. Beside the appropriations of Congress large sums have been raised for relief in New York and other cities. Miss Clara Barton, of the Red Cross Society, has gone to Cincinnati to assist in the work of distributing relief.

The Copies of "Thy Healer," Ordered by our subscribers, we are still unable to send. From some cause, as yet unexplained, no copies have been received from the London office of the new periodical. They will be forwarded to subscribers immediately on their arrival, and we trust they will excuse the delay, for which we are not responsible.

The Aims of Socialists and Communists were declared at a meeting held in Irving Hall, New York, on February 10th. It was called by the International Working Men's Association to express approval of the recent murders in Vienna. The room was decorated with a large red flag on which was inscribed the motto, "No God, no Master." Herr Most and other speakers addressed the audience, which numbered about a thousand persons. A number of resolutions were passed applauding the conduct of the Vienna assassins, whom the association thus addressed: "Brothers, your cause is that of the oppressed against the oppressor. That cause is a holy cause—the cause not only of Austria but of all countries. Brothers, we approve your action; we approve your methods. Between you and your oppressors there can be no truce. Kill, destroy, annihilate, assassinate, even to the germ of your aristocracy."

Mormon Preachers are Making Dupes in the South in spite of the efforts of Christian preachers and teachers to enlighten the people on the true character of Mormonism. A party of emigrants from North Carolina started for Utah on February 14th, under the guidance of a so-called Mormon "apostle." A journalist on the same train entered into conversation with the travellers with the view of ascertaining how they had been duped. His account of the conversation discloses the Mormon methods. The fertility of Utah, the beauties of the co-operative system, and the mutual aids which the church promises its members are held out, while never a word is said of polygamy except to denounce Gentile misrepresentations. Thus people are induced to emigrate rather than to change faith, and it is only when under the thumb of the Council of Seventy that they realize themselves to be but serfs of the Mormon priesthood.

Anniversary Services were Held at the Cremorne Mission, New York, conducted by Jerry McAuley, on Sunday, February 10th. Mr. McAuley, though evidently suffering, was present, and took part in the evening meeting. Dr. Alexander and Dr. Cullis, of Boston, also delivered addresses. Many testimonies were given of the good the mission is effecting, and an appeal was made for assistance in carrying on and extending the work this year.

The Increasing Prosperity of Princeton College is a source of general gratification. At the meeting of trustees last week Dr. McCosh stated that an effort is being made to erect a building for the accommodation of the art school, at an expense of $40,000, to enable work in that department to begin in September. The plan devised by the Committee of Eastern Colleges for avoiding excesses in intercollegiate athletics was laid before the board and adopted, with a statement that Harvard had done likewise. The president announced that a number of lectures would be delivered in the college this year on pedagogics, with a view of training teachers. He reported that the college was in a very quiet state, there being a good amount of study and much religious feeling.

The New "People's Church" in Boston, Mass., has been formally dedicated by eight days' services, which commenced on Sunday, February 10th. It has been built mainly through the efforts of the Rev. J. W. Hamilton, a Methodist clergyman, but his object was to make it distinctively an undenominational church for the people. The money required has been collected all in small sums and chiefly in the New England States. The corner-stone was laid in 1877, when Mr. D. L. Moody, the Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D., of the Episcopal Church, and Dr. Manning, of the Congregational Church, took part in the ceremony. The interior of the church differs from the ordinary house of worship. Instead of pews, it has single folding chairs, provided with hat and umbrella racks, arranged in a semi-circular form on a gradually sloping floor. The church itself seats twenty-five hundred people; and the chapel, which can be thrown open so as to make one large hall, seats seven hundred and fifty more, thus giving a total seating capacity of three thousand two hundred and twenty. The edifice contains a window in memory of the pastor's wife, given by the women of Boston. Mrs. Hamilton died about a year ago. This is the people's church in name and in fact. No pew system of any kind exists. All seats are free.

Rev. George F. Pentecost has Accepted an invitation from Mr. D. L. Moody to assist him in his campaign in England, and intends to sail early next month. On receiving Mr. Moody's invitation Mr. Pentecost summoned a meeting of his church in Tompkins Avenue, Brooklyn, at which he read Mr. Moody's letter, and said if the call had come to him at a time when free from the obligations and duties of a settled pastorate he would have instantly accepted it and taken the next steamer to England. In view, however, of his relations to his church, the importance of which he fully realized, he felt his inability to determine what he should do, and had decided, after prayerful consideration of the subject and a conference with the members of the Boards of Trustees and Deacons, to lay the matter before the church, and whatever its decisions might be it would be accepted by him as an indication of the Lord's will. The church by resolution advised the pastor to accept the call, and recommended that Mr. Stebbins, the precentor of the church, should accompany him. Some surprise has been expressed at Mr. Moody's request, as it was understood that the English ministers were rendering him hearty and cordial assistance in his work.

The Church Porch is the Title of a Useful association organized in connection with Harvard Church, Brookline, Mass., of which the Rev. Reuen Thomas is pastor. The object of the association is to promote Christian discipleship among the young. The membership consists of three classes—active, associate, and honorary. Active members are those who take part in the devotional meetings. Associate members are those who engage to attend regularly the devotional and social meetings of the society. Honorary members are those adults who wish to identify themselves with the society without taking part. The following simple formula signed by each member well defines the aim and scope of the society: "Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I purpose to try to do whatever He would like to have me do. I will pray to Him, and read the Bible every day, and henceforth I will try to be His disciple." The association is doing a useful work among the young people of the church and the city.

A Sad Affliction has Befallen the Singing Pilgrim, Mr. Philip Phillips and his wife, who are mourning over the very serious illness of their son James, who is gradually but surely sinking toward the grave. He is graciously sustained by divine power, and is full of good cheer. His father has cancelled all engagements, and gives himself entirely to caring for his boy. James has been the constant companion of Mr. Phillips for several years, and has helped him in sacred services in all parts of the world. His pastor, J. A. Kummer, writes: "He is a fine Christian young man, and is fully ready to depart and be with his Lord."

Christian Work in the Rigging of a Wrecked ship. Mr. F. H. Tibbetts, one of the survivors of the City of Columbus disaster, relates the following incident of a "stout man" near him in the rigging who was terribly afraid to die: "I told him to pray, but he said he couldn't. I told him that there was little chance for life, and he should take the opportunity to make his peace with God. I prayed with him and he did so, and said he felt better. A young man near me was in great mental distress. He told me he didn't know how to pray and couldn't, he had led such a wicked life. At last he said: 'I will not go before my Maker with a pack of cards in my pocket,' and he threw his cards overboard, but he perished with the wreck."

KNOWLEDGE, WORSHIP, GRATITUDE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"So that they are without excuse: because that, when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful."—ROMANS I: 20, 21.

Knowledge not Invariably a Blessing—Does not Justify Boasting—To be Desired Nevertheless—Two Forms of Atheism—I. Knowing God without Glorifying Him—Not Tracing Their Good Things to Him—A Farmer's Idea of Providence—No Sense of Obligation—No Worship—No Recognition of His Omnipresence—Do not Trust Him—II. Not Thankful—For Mercies Possessed—Coveting Other Mercies—A Singing Minister—III. The Result—Falling into Vain Imaginings—IV. Fly from the Sins.

THOSE who boast of their knowledge betray their ignorance. Knowledge is not a possession to be proud of, since it brings with it so great a responsibility that a nurse might as well be proud of watching over a life in peril. Knowledge may become good or ill according to the use which is made of it. If men know God, for instance, and then glorify Him as God, and are thankful, their knowledge has become the means of great blessing to them; but if they know God, and fail to glorify Him, their knowledge turns to their condemnation. Our Saviour could plead for some, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But what plea is to be used for what they do, and yet do evil; who know what they ought to do, and do it not? Accursed is that man who heaps to himself knowledge till he becomes wise as Solomon, and then prostitutes it to base ends by using it to aggrandize his wealth, to pamper his appetites, to bolster his unbelief, or to conceal his vices. A man may by knowing more become all the more a devil. His growing information may only increase his condemnation.

It is clear, then, that knowledge is not a possession of such unmingled good that we may grow vain of it; better far will it be if the more we know the more we watch and pray. Go on and read, young man. Go on and study with the utmost diligence. The more of knowledge you can acquire the better; but take care that you do not, like Sardanapalus, heap up your treasures to be your own funeral pile. Do not by a rebellious pride curdle the sweet milk of knowledge, and sour your precious blessing into an awful curse. It is soon done, but not so soon undone.

It was the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil the eating of which brought all this evil upon us which ye see this day. Ye may eat of that tree still, if so it please you; but if ye taste not of the tree of life at the same time, your knowledge shall only open to you the gates of hell. Knowledge of itself alone is as land which may either become a blooming garden or a howling wilderness. It is a sea out of which you shall bring pearls or dead men's bones. Life and death, heaven and hell, are here; if it was said of old, "Take heed what you hear," I also will say, "Take heed what you know."

The people mentioned by Paul in our text fell into two great evils, or rather into two forms of one great evil—atheism; the atheism of the heart, and the atheism of the life. They knew God, but they glorified Him not as God, neither were they thankful.

We will first consider the first sin mentioned here, and then the second. I shall not look at these two evils as if you were Romans, but I shall adapt the text to your own case, and speak of these sins, as Englishmen are too apt to commit them. Thirdly, let us view the consequences, or, what comes of men not glorifying God, and not being thankful. Then, fourthly, let us fly from these sins immediately, God helping us. O Holy Spirit, help the preacher now, for all his help is in Thee!

I. At once, then, let us look at this first sin, a sin very common in these days. They knew God, but as God. Even in old Rome, with all its darkness, there was some knowledge of God; how can the creature quite forget its Creator? Of course the people had not that spiritual knowledge which the Holy Ghost communicates to the renewed in heart, for the carnal mind cannot know God spiritually; its fleshly ideas cannot come near to His holy spirituality. But Paul means that they perceived the eternal power and Godhead of the Great Former of all things; and they might have perceived much more of His divine character and glory if their foolish hearts had not been darkened by their evil passions. When you go among the heathen, whether they are Pantheists or Polytheists, or whatever they may be, there is still a notion in the background of all their mythology of some one great superior being, elevated above those whom they call gods, some serenely just father, preserver, avenger, and rewarder of men.

Some among the heathen no doubt attained to a very considerable knowledge of God, or at least they walked upon the borders of marvellous discoveries of the Godhead. We are greatly surprised at the language of Socrates, and Plato, and Seneca, and others; such men have lately been held up as patterns; but if their lives are studied, they will be found to be sadly defaced with what Paul fitly calls "vile affections." These were wise men, but the world by wisdom knew not God; they were great thinkers, but a clear revelation of God was not in all their thoughts. They did not like to retain God in their knowledge, and so they remained steeped in loathsome vice which we dare not mention, for it is a shame even to speak of the things which were done of the most enlightened of them in secret. They had knowledge, but they forgot its responsibilities; they knew God, but they glorified Him not as God, neither were they thankful.

We may now let all the heathen go, for it is more true of us than it is of them, that we know God. We know God, but I am afraid that there are many thousands and millions of our fellow-creatures who glorify Him not as God; let us see to it that we do not ourselves belong to the unhappy number. Those do not glorify God as God who do not trace all their good things to God. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above," but many ungrateful hearts forget this truth, and receive the blessings of this life with dumb mouths and cold hearts. In the old time there were those who traced everything they saw to what they called "Chance;" that misformed deity has been laid aside, and on its pedestal men have set up another

IDOL KNOWN AS "NATURE."

Nowadays swarms of people attribute everything that is great and wonderful to "nature"—they talk forever of "the beauties of nature" "the grandeur of Nature," "the laws of Nature;" but God is as little spoken of as if He were not alive. As to laws of nature, these occupy with moderns much the same place as the deities of Olympus with the ancients. What are laws of nature but the ordinary ways in which God works? I know of no other definition of them. But these people attribute to them a sort of power apart from the presence of the Creator.

One standing up in the street, venting his infidelity, said that we could not do better on Sunday than go abroad and worship nature. There was nothing that was so refining and elevating to the mind as nature. Nature did everything. A Christian man in the crowd ventured to ask, "What is nature?" And the gentleman said, "Well, nature—well—it is nature. Don't you know what it is? It is nature." No further definition was forthcoming; I fear the term is only useful as enabling men to talk of creation without being compelled to mention the Creator.

I find nowadays that people talk about "Providence," and yet discard God. Among the vulgar and the ungodly this is another subterfuge to avoid the ascribing of their blessings to the Giver of them. A farmer, whose crops had failed a second time, was consoled by a clergyman, because he suffered from the hand of Providence. "Yes," said he, "that Providence is always treating me shamefully; but there's one above that will stop him." The poor soul had heard of Providence till he thought it an evil power, and hoped that the good God would curb its mischievous influence. This comes of not speaking plainly of God. For what is Providence? Can there be such a thing without the constant working of the Great Provider?

Men talk of "Foresight." But is there any foresight without an eye? Is there not some living eye that is watching for our good, some living hand that is following up the eye, and providing for our needs? Man does not like to think of his God. He wants to get away into a far country, away from God his Father; and he will adopt any sort of phrase which will help him to clear his language of all trace of God. The heathen often attributed their prosperity to "fortune;" some of them talked of "chance;" others discoursed of "fate." Anything is to man's taste rather than blessing the great Father, and adoring the one God. If they prospered, they were "lucky;" this was instead of gratitude to God. They looked into the almanac to find lucky days; this instead of faith in the Most High. Have we not some now who bless their good luck, and still talk about their fortunate stars? God whom they know they do not honor as God. Yes, and we have among us men who talk neither of "fortune" nor of "nature," but of themselves. They are styled "self-made men," and they are very prone to who made them; they are never backward in that cult. Their adoration of themselves is constant, reverent, and sincere. "Self-made men," indeed! Infinitely better is it to be a God-made man. Justice makes a black mark against those who do not ascribe their good things to God, from whom they flow.

But we can also commit that sin, in the next sense, by not feeling any obligation laid upon us through partaking of the divine bounty. Are there not many rich men to whom it never occurs to feel bound to serve the Lord who gave them power to get wealth? Are there not many healthy persons, sound of limb, and strong in constitution, who yet do not praise the God who has kept them from sickness and death? Are we any of us sufficiently grateful for our talents, our faculties, our friends, our daily provisions? Do we not all receive a large amount of blessing for which we do not render praise to God? The fact is that every mercy brings an obligation with it, and we that receive most ought to render most; for we receive nothing from God without being thereby naturally and of right laid under bonds to return to Him the glory due unto His name. We are tenants, whose rent is to be paid in service and praise.

Many may be met with who know God, but never glorify Him as God, because they never adore Him, and worship Him, with the love of their hearts. They go to church or to some place of worship regularly, and sing psalms and hymns, and they may even have family-prayer at home; but their heart has never adored the living God with living love. Their worship has a name to live, but it is dead. They present to the Lord all the external harvest of worship, but the corn is gone, only the straw and the husk are there. And what is the value of your your prayers without a kernel, made up of the straw of words, and the chaff of formality? What is the value of professions of loyalty from a rebel? What is the worth of professed friendship to God when your heart is at enmity against Him? O my brethren, if we accept Jehovah as the living God, let us give Him the utmost love of our souls. Will you call a man brother, and then treat him like a dog? Dare you call God your God, and then act toward Him as though He were not worthy of a thought?

There is another way of not glorifying God as God, and that is by never recognizing His omnipresence. Have we not among us those who on Sunday feel some kind of reverence of God, but during the six days of the week are godless? When they are in a place of worship they have some sense of God's being there; if they do not fear and tremble, yet they behave with decency and respect; but in other places they dare to act as if they were out of range of God. Do they fancy that God is not in that serect chamber where they follow out their passions? The skies are the roof of His temple, and beneath God's blue sky we ought not to find a place to sin in. Nowhere in time is there space for evil, nor in the universe is there room for sin. Yet, alas! how few recognize, "Thou God seest me," as being a death-blow to sin? "They know God, but they glorify Him not as God," but think that He is absent either in person or in mind, and that in some secret places they can hide away from Him, and with impunity follow their own desires.

There are some others who know God, who fail to glorify Him as God, because

THEY DO NOT TRUST HIM.

In revelation God has presented Himself as the object of trust to His creatures, and He has promised that all who trust in Him shall be forgiven their transgressions through the atonement of His Son, Jesus Christ. When proud man replies, "No, I shall trust in myself, trust in my own works, trust in my own prayers, but I shall not trust in Christ," then he knows God, but he glorifies Him not as God, and when he perishes he will be without excuse. What kind of God is that whom we will not trust? How do we honor Him when we refuse to believe Him? Do we accept His Godhead, and yet refuse His mercy? This cannot be.

The counts are many against men, but this one more must be mentioned—many know God, but they never glorify Him as God by submitting themselves to Him, and yielding up their members to be instruments of His glory. If I glorify God as God, then I desire to obey God's commandments, to spread His glory, to magnify His name. I desire in all things to please Him, if indeed I treat Him as God should be treated. What enthusiasm ought to be kindled in our breasts by the belief that we are God's servants! "I am Thy servant," is our happy claim, our honored challenge. This it is that makes a man of a man, and something more than man. Oh, to learn this lesson, and to practise it! To glorify God as God will make us akin to angels! Even you Christians may feel that this is much beyond you yet, but toward it you must ever fly. I shrink before my Lord in speaking of Him, but I desire what I have not yet attained—that I may truly glorify Him as my Lord and my God.

II. Now we come to consider the second sin. May the word which I may have to say about it be blessed to many of my hearers by the power of the Holy Spirit! The second sin is

"NEITHER WERE THANKFUL."

Did you know, dear friends, that unthankfulness was such a sin as this? Have you ever thought of it in this light before—that men were without excuse because when they knew God they were not thankful? Unthankfulness is a sin for which there is no excuse if it be attended with knowledge. I fear there are thousands who call themselves Christians, who are not thankful, and yet they never thought themselves very guilty on that account. Yet you see these sinners were without excuse, because they were guilty of a great sin before God, and that sin was unthankfulness. I tremble both for myself and you when I see want of thankfulness thus set in the front rank of sins. How is it that we may be unthankful?

I answer, first, there is in some a want of gratitude for mercies possessed. They receive many blessings without making a note of them, or even seeming to know that they have them. Their daily mercies seem to come in always at the back door, where the servants take them in, and never tell their master or mistress that they have arrived. They never receive their mercies at the front door with grateful acknowledgments; but they still continue dumb debtors, daily owing more, but making no attempt at a return. Many professors are of that kind—recipients of countless mercies, but destitute of such common thankfulness as even beasts might manifest.

Some show this unthankfulness in another way, for they always dwell most on what they have not got. They have manna, and that is angels' food; but then they have no fish, and this is a ready theme for grumbling. They talk very loudly of "the fish we did eat in Egypt," and lament those ample feasts provided by the muddy Nile. Moreover, they have none of those delightful vegetables—the leeks, and the garlic, and the onions. They have none of these rank luxuries, and therefore again they murmur, and call the manna "light bread." They put this complaint over and over again to Moses, till Moses must have been sick of them and their garlic. They said that they could not get leeks, and cucumbers, and onions, and that they were therefore most hardly done by, and would not much longer put up with it. Thankless rebels!

And have I not known some of God's servants say that they enjoy much of the presence of their Lord, but they have no riches; and so they are not among the favored ones. Over their poverty they fetch a deep groan. Some live in the presence of God, so they tell us, and they are full of divine delights, but yet they are greatly afflicted with aches and pains, and all the dolors of rheumatism, and therefore they murmur. I admit that rheumatism is a dreadful pain enough, but at the same time to dwell always on the dark side of things, and to forget our mercies, is a sad instance of ingratitude. We are few of us as thankful as we ought to be; and there are some people who are not thankful at all, for instead of a song concerning their mercies, their life is one long dirge for their miseries.

Some show their unthankfulness by

under their supposed ills. They know from Scripture that even their afflictions are working for their good, yet they do not rejoice in the prospect, or feel any gratitude for the refining process through which the Lord is passing them. Heaven and perfection are left unsung, but the present processes are groaned over without ceasing. Their monotonous note is always this pain, this loss, this burden, this uncomfortable sensation, this persecution from the world, this unkindness from the saints, and so on; all this goes to show that, though they know God, they do not glorify Him as God, neither are they thankful.

We can be guilty of unthankfulness, also, by never testifying to the goodness of God. A great many people come in and out of your houses; do you ever tell them about God's goodness to you? Did you ever take up a single ten minutes with the tale of the Lord's lovingkindness to you? Oh, what backwardness there is to testify to God as God, and to all His goodness and love! Our mouths are full of anything rather than the goodness of the Lord. Shame on our wicked lips!

Some fail, also, in their singing of God's praises. I knew a dear old Methodist preacher, who is now in heaven, who when he came downstairs of a morning was always tooting a bit of a hymn over, and he did the same in the barn, and the field. I have passed him in the street, and noted his happy melody; indeed he was always singing. He never took much notice of anybody, so as to be afraid of being overheard. Whether people heard him or not did not make much difference to him. He was singing to the Lord, not to them; and so he went on singing. I do not think that he had much of a voice, or an ear for music, but his soul was made up of praise, and that is better than a musical education. God does not criticise our voice, but He accepts our heart. Oh, to be singing the praises of God every minute of our lives, and never ceasing therefrom!

It is plain that many are not thankful to God, for they never praise Him with their substance. Yet when the Jew was thankful, he took care to give a portion to the house of the Lord; before he would eat of his corn, he would send his sheaf to the sanctuary. If we are grateful to God, we shall feel that the first thing to do is to give of our substance an offering of thanksgiving to the Most High. But this does not strike some people, whose religion is so spiritual that they cannot endure to hear of money, and they faint at the sound of a collection. I am afraid their thankfulness is not worth more than what they pay to express it; that is to say, nothing at all. God deliver us from such a state of heart as that; and may we never, in any of these senses, be found among those professors, of whom it is said that, when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were they thankful.

III. Listen to me now carefully for two or three minutes while, in the third place, I mention, very briefly and solemnly, what was

THE RESULT OF THIS.

They knew God, but they glorified Him not as God, neither were they thankful. And the first result of it was that they fell into vain imaginings. If we do not glorify God, the true God, we shall soon be found setting up another god. This vain-imagination business is being done quite as extensively now as in Paul's days. Depart from the inspiration of the Bible, and from the infallibility of the Spirit of God who wrote it, and where will you go? Well, I cannot tell where you will go. One wanders into one vain imagination, and one into another, till the dreamers are on all sides. I expect to see a new doctrine every day of the week now. Our thinkers have introduced an age of inventions, wherein everything is thought of but the truth of God. We do not want these novelties. We are satisfied with the Word of God as we find it. But if you do not glorify God as God, and are not thankful to Him for all His teaching, then away you go into vain imaginations.

And what next? Well, away goes the mind of man into all sorts of sins. The chapter describes unnatural lusts and horribly fierce passions. Men that are not satisfied and thankful—men that have no fear of God before their eyes—it were a shame for us to think, much more to speak, of what they will do. A heart that cannot feed at God's table will riot somewhere. He that is not satisfied with the cup that God has filled will soon be a partaker of the cup of devils. An unthankful spirit is, at bottom, an atheistic spirit. If God were God to us, we should not be unthankful to Him.

It seems that these people, of whom Paul wrote, fell into all kinds of bitterness, such as envy, murder, deceit, malignity, whispering, backbiting, hating of God. They became spiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, and so forth. Well, if your spirit is not sweetened by the adoration and the love of God, it will grow bitter. If love does not reign, hate will rule. Look at unthankful people. Hear them talk. Nobody's character is safe. There is no neighbor whom they will not slander. There is no Christian man whom they will not misrepresent. O brothers and sisters, dread unthankfulness! Perhaps you did not think that it was so bad, but it is horrible! God help you to escape from it!

IV. And that you may escape from it, let us finish up by this exhortation.

LET US FLY

by the help of God's Spirit from these two sins. "Oh," says one, "I am full of sin." Come and glorify God, then, by confessing it to Him. "Oh, but I am not pardoned." Come and glorify Him by accepting pardon through the blood of His dear Son. "Oh, but I am of an evil heart." Come and glorify Him by telling Him so, and asking His Spirit to renew you in your mind. Come, yield yourself to His sweet Gospel. May His blessed Spirit incline you so to do. Come, take Him now to be your God. Have you forgotten Him? Remember Him. Have you neglected Him? Seek Him. Have you offended Him? Mourn before Him. Say, "I will arise, and go unto my Father." Your Father waits to receive you. Glorify Him as God.

And then, next, let us begin to be very thankful, if we have not been so before. Let us praise God for common mercies, for they prove to be uncommonly precious when they are once taken away. Bless God that you were able to walk here, and are able to walk home again. Bless God for your reason; bless Him for your existence. Bless God for the means of grace, for an open Bible, for the throne of grace, for the preaching of the Word. You that are saved must lead the song. "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless His holy name." Bless Him for His Son. Bless Him for His Spirit. Bless Him for His Fatherhood. Bless Him that you are His child. Bless Him for what you have received. Bless Him for what He has promised to give. Bless Him for the past, the present, and the future. Bless Him in every way, for everything, at all times, and in all places. Let all that is within you bless His holy name. Go your way rejoicing. May His Spirit help you so to do!

FIRST STAGE OF THE MISSIONARY JOURNEY IN AFRICA.

BEFORE the discovery of diamonds at the New Rush, or Kimberley, in 1871, travelling up country in South Africa was very slow and tedious, the journey having to be accomplished the greater part of the way by bullock-wagon, and often taking several weeks to accomplish from Cape Town. But as Kimberley increased in population and importance, fresh facilities have been provided. There is now an express coach with ten horses, of which a picture appears on the next page. It has the appearance of rapid transit, but when one takes into consideration the heavy, barren, desolate, and sandy nature of the country, the marvel is sometimes that an average of six miles an hour is maintained.

Bullock-wagons form the next stage of the missionary's journey from the Cape northward. With a good team of eighteen oxen, they rarely accomplish more than twenty-five miles per day—generally less—and the greater part of that distance is done after sunset and before sunrise, as the heat greatly fatigues the cattle.

The late Rev. Dr. Moffat was in his early days well and painfully acquainted with this mode of travelling, and wrote thus concerning it:

"Having travelled nearly a whole night through deep sand, the oxen began to lie down in the yoke from fatigue. The next day, arriving at the place where we had hoped to find water, we were disappointed. As it appeared evident that if we continued the same route we must perish from thirst, we altered our course, crossing over a dreary, trackless, sandy waste, without one green blade of grass, and scarcely a bush on which the wearied eye could rest. Becoming dark, the oxen unable to proceed, ourselves exhausted with dreadful thirst and fatigue, we stretched our wearied limbs on sand still warm from the noontide heat, it being the hot season of the year. Thirst aroused us at an early hour; and finding the oxen incapable of moving the wagon one inch, we took a spade, and, with the oxen, proceeded to hollow-in a neighboring mountain.

"Here we labored for a long time, digging an immense hole in the sand, whence we obtained a scanty supply, exactly resembling the old bilge-water of a ship, but which was drunk with an avidity no pen can describe. Hours were occupied in incessant labor to obtain a sufficiency for the oxen, which, by the time all had partaken, were ready for a second draught; while some, from the depth of the hole and the loose sand, got scarcely any. We filled the small vessels which we had brought, and returned to the wagon over a plain glowing with a meridian sun; the sand so hot that it was distressingly painful to walk on. The oxen ran frantic, till they came to a place indurated with little sand. Here they stood together, to cool their burning hoofs in the shade of their own bodies, those on the outside always trying to get into the centre." Three days had they to remain on this burning plain, with scarcely a breath of wind stirring, what there was of it feeling as if coming from the mouth of an oven.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

An Undermined City in Pennsylvania was the scene of a panic last week. A few months ago the inhabitants of Hazleton were alarmed by cracks appearing in some houses over the Laurel Hill pit, one of the mines which extend under the city. No serious damage was done, and the alarm subsided. But last week two more houses began to sink, and, after going down about eight feet, they fell together. In this condition they now stand. The families had ample time to get out in safety, but their household effects were lost. A great crowd quickly gathered, and before an hour had passed over four thousand people had been on the grounds. A sinking and cracking of the earth took place for some distance around these houses, and the hasty exit of many families in the neighborhood, with their household effects, soon followed. Many families began moving their household goods to places of safety without loss of time. In this they only displayed ordinary regard for life and property. It is astonishing that people who have made no provision for eternity do not display similar prudence, knowing, as they do, that this world must soon cease to be their home (II Peter 3 : 10).

An Exciting Scene was Witnessed at the Elevated railroad station at Fifty-ninth Street, New York, on February 12th. A young man named Victor André, said to be a grand-nephew of General André of Revolutionary fame, entered the station at eight o'clock, and passed on to the platform. Soon afterward a young lady closely veiled followed. She crept up behind André and, placing a revolver close to his left side, fired. Then stepping back a few paces she pointed the pistol at her own head and fired again. She fell dead, but André was alive, and was carried to the Presbyterian Hospital. It was found that he was dangerously wounded, and the physicians give no hope of his recovery. At first André professed not to know who had shot him, but letters found in his rooms led to an investigation, which proved that the woman was Miss Jennie H. Almy, a lady earning her living as a short-hand writer and teacher, to whom he had been betrothed. An expression in one of the letters implied that improper relations existed between them, and that Miss Almy was agonized by shame and believed that André contemplated deserting her for a more wealthy lady. She had been in deep distress for several days, but had given no intimation of her murderous and suicidal intentions. It is not our custom to chronicle crimes in these columns, but the principles of society in this and other cities in such matters as led to this double crime, are becoming deplorably lax, and it is well that a warning such as this should be published from time to time. Almost every day crimes resulting from the same cause are recorded by the daily press, proving the truth of the apostolic warning (James 1 : 15).

LAWYER HUNT'S CLIENT.

A RISING young lawyer was one day visited in his office by a poorly-clad, emaciated woman accompanied by two children, a boy and a girl. She laid on his desk a poor little pile of bills, and looked pleadingly in his face.

"I have come to you, Mr. Hunt," she said, "to beg of you to appear for my husband. I am very poor, and I cannot pay you a proper fee; but I have sold a few things, relics of better days, and have brought you all they realized. It is only thirty dollars. I am ashamed to offer it you, but if you would accept it out of pity for a poor distressed wife and her children, you would be doing an act of Christian charity."

The tones and manner of the suppliant were in startling contrast to her garb. They told of refinement and education The lawyer looked searchingly in her face, and he saw there, in spite of its pallor and emaciation, that she could not be more than thirty years old, and that she was still very beautiful.

"Of what is your husband accused, madam?" he asked.

"He is charged with burglary, sir. He was arrested yesterday, and I came to you as soon as I could raise the money. Believe me, sir, I would have been glad to pay more if I had been able."

"Do you know anything of the evidence against him?"

"No, sir, nor anything of the defence he has. I thought you would see him in prison."

"I will, madam. You may rely on my doing all I am able in his behalf."

"God bless you, sir, and reward you, as I cannot."

Mr. Hunt visited the man according to promise. He found him a degraded brute, evidently guilty of the crime, and without contrition or shame. He had many interviews with him, and defended him ably at his trial. It puzzled him that he should take so much pains and labor with so much energy, and take so much interest in the fate of a man for whom he felt a deep repugance, and who, withal, could never recompense him. His costs out of pocket were more than the thirty dollars, but the lawyer worked on, and in spite of the clearest evidence he nearly succeeded in getting his client acquitted. But not quite. His brilliant speech powerfully affected the jury, but the judge's charge left them no alternative but to bring in a verdict of guilty, and the prisoner received a heavy sentence.

Passing out of the court-room Mr Hunt met the prisoner's wife. She thanked him through her tears. Her emotion was almost too deep for utterance, but her broken words seemed to the young lawyer an abundant recompense for his effort.

The next day Mr. Hunt visited her wretched lodging. There he heard her story. It was a familiar one. A girl well educated and refined attracted by a showy, fascinating scoundrel. Her heart's affections captivated; induced to consent to a clandestine marriage, and then the discovery that she had married a villain. But she had been true and faithful to him through seven years of misery. She had refused the offer of her father to receive her again if she would abandon her husband, and had set herself to the hopeless task of trying to win the depraved man to the ways of virtue and religion. Now he was in jail, and she with her two children had come to the verge of beggary. Mr. Hunt procured her some copying work to do, and, finding that she was an accomplished linguist, brought her more profitable occupation as a translator.

One day she received a letter from the prison in which her husband was confined, requesting her to come there immediately. She went, and found her husband dying. In a quarrel with another convict, which ended in a fight, he had been thrown heavily, and sustained internal injuries which proved fatal. The widow closed his eyes, and returned home to her fatherless children.

Mr. Hunt continued to befriend her, and found his respect and regard for her increase as he saw more of her. Some two years after her husband's death he made her an offer of marriage, and was accepted. With the changed circumstances of her life came a revival of her health and spirits, and soon no one could have recognized in the graceful, beautiful lady the woman who went a few years ago in her shabby clothes to Lawyer Hunt's office as a suppliant.

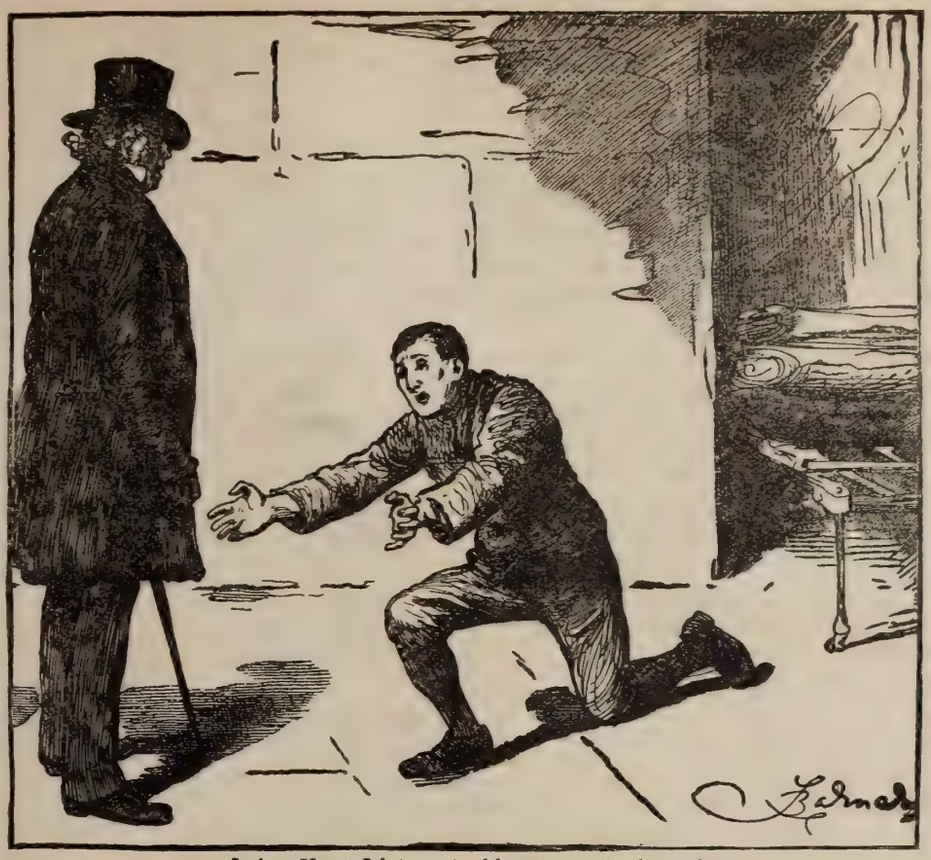
The years that followed were happy ones for husband and wife. The lawyer was elected to a judgeship, and was honored and respected by his fellow-citizens. Only one cloud cast a shadow over the household. The boy Ralph appeared to have inherited all the bad qualities of his bad father. The difference between the two children was astonishing. Emily grew like her mother, and a more gentle, tractable, obedient child could rarely be found; but Ralph, in spite of his mother's teaching and prayers and his stepfather's manly expostulations, had an apparently incurable propensity to vicious ways. Kindness had as little influence over him as severity. With him, as with his father, the pious mother pleaded and prayed, and her tears fell upon him many a time as she besought him to avoid the path his father trod. It was all of no avail, and finally, after committing a grievous sin, when he was seventeen years old, he stole all the money he could lay his hands on in the house, and ran away.



Judge Hunt Listens to his step-son's Appeal.

Fifteen years passed away, and during all that time the wicked lad was followed by his mother's earnest prayers. No word came from him. The mother fell ill, and during her illness her one anxiety was about her erring son, and the last word on her dying lips was a prayer for his reclamation. Judge Hunt and his daughter followed her to the grave, weeping.

The day after the funeral a letter from Ralph arrived. It was addressed to his mother, but the judge opened it. Ralph was in a jail in a distant city condemned to death for murder. Immediately Judge Hunt started to visit him. As he entered the prison and stood face to face with the young man his thoughts travelled back thirty years, to that day when he visited Ralph's father. The resemblance was startling in its accuracy. The bullet head and the little cunning eyes and prominent cheek-bones proclaimed his descent, but the closest bond of all was the look of degradation which was present in the son as it had been on the father. Flinging himself on his knee before his stepfather, Ralph said: "Oh, save me! They are going to hang me. I never meant to kill the man. Go to the governor for me. He will listen to you. Oh, save me for my mother's sake!"

"Stop," said the judge, "not that name. Your misconduct shortened her days. She would have been happy but for you. As I loved her, I hate you for wounding her."

"But you will go to the governor for me? My mother would have wished you to do that."

"I cannot say now. I must think. I will see you again," and the judge turned away and left the prison. He went to an hotel, and sat down in his room alone. He had to determine his course. Ralph had touched a responsive string. There was not a good quality in the condemned man. As the judge said, he hated him for his badness not so much as because he had wrung that dear heart out of which the bereaved man had hoped to keep all sorrow. Yet the spirit of the dead seemed to plead for the bad fellow. She had loved him. "Yes," said the judge, "he has no right to plead her name, but he was right in saying she would have wished it. My dear darling, for your sake I will try."

Judge Hunt did try. He told the governor all the facts, and had the satisfaction of carrying back to the prison the governor's promise that the sentence of death should be commuted to one of imprisonment. More than that he could not do. He could not pardon him; he could not change his nature. But Ralph was grateful, and the judge promised him that his sister should visit him, and then commending him to the prison chaplain he left.

What a flood of light such an incident throws on the sinner's position before God. Utterly, hopelessly depraved, we may plead with Him for mercy for Christ's sake. That blessed name seems to aggravate our guilt, yet God, whose ways are above our ways, pities us in spite of our depravity, and, loving us while we are yet sinners, welcomes us for Jesus' sake, forgives us, and gives us a new nature, which no human helper could give us. It was the realization of this amazing love that filled the heart of the great apostle when he broke out into that ecstasy of joy which concludes his argument in the epistle to the Romans: Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. 8: 38, 39).

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Lawson's Resentment.

JOHN MORLEY, the minister and Mr. Waldron regarded Rose with surprised admiration. Again the sombre room seemed the brighter for her presence, and her clear, fresh young voice sounded pleasantly to their ears, after their own grave and deep tones.

"I thought I should find you and Hetty alone, Mr. Morley," she said; smiles and blushes following one another closely upon her fair face; "and the bell did not ring, so I came straight on here. I have only left a book behind me, and I came back to fetch it."

John Morley approached Rose, and drew her hand through his arm with an air of pride. Hester too, as if attracted by some irresistible charm, had descended from her seat, and pressed close beside her. This girl possessed some fascination which drew all hearts to her; though one might know lovelier women, wiser women, women tenfold better. The few words she had uttered were simple; but like the foolish old songs with sweet tunes, which are heard by chance, and which one always wishes to hear once more, the three men were silent in the dull parlor when she ceased speaking, as if they waited to hear her voice again.

"This is the young lady who has consented to be my wife, Mr. Waldron," said John Morley, with an ill-concealed triumph in the effect her appearance had produced.

She stole a bashful look at the great man of the neighborhood, and courtesied profoundly; a boarding-school courtesy, yet not without a certain diffident grace of its own. Mr. Waldron's face relaxed from its severity.

"Well, brother," he said, with greater affability than before, "I wish you joy. And you also, my dear; only we must make you one of ourselves as speedily as possible. We have just been speaking of it to John Morley. You must join the church when you become his wife and the mother of this little girl."

"Yes, sir," murmured the girl, with charming shamefacedness; while a shade of gravity clouded her sunny face for a moment. The old minister came forward, and addressed her in a tone of earnest solemnity.

"It will be the turning point of your life," he said, "to become the wife of a godly man. Hitherto you have been wandering in the paths of vanity, but here you will be safely enfolded from the snares of this world. Morning, noon, and night a voice will sound in your ears: 'This is the way; walk ye in it.' You will be snatched from the world, and gathered into the bosom of the church."

Once again the girl shivered, and looked in bewilderment at the faces around her, wondering what their strange manner of greeting her might mean. But they had each put on a smile for her, and her nature was buoyant enough in itself to find complacency everywhere. John Morley's handsome face, moreover, wore an expression which any woman would be pleased to see in her future husband; and she bridled her pretty head with a half-affected air of coquetry.

"I must go directly," she said in a girlish tone of importance; "I have a hundred things to do yet to-night. There is my book on the table, Mr. Morley. Thank you very much. Good night; good-night. Good-by, my little Hetty."

The door closed upon her, but the three men did not resume their seats, and Hester remained standing on the hearth, listening eagerly for their next words. The controversy had come to an unexpected end. Yet John Morley drew his little daughter within his arms, in an unaccustomed caress, and stroked down her tangled hair with a trembling hand.

"If the church be scandalized," he said, in a voice which he rendered steady by a great effort, "I can withdraw from it. There are other forms of worship and other sects not greatly differing from my own. My intended wife has been brought up in the Episcopal Church. If it be necessary—"

The pause was of even more significance than the words; and the old minister opened his eyes widely in unutterable astonishment. Mr. Waldron was the first to speak.

"It is a matter for expostulation," he said, "not of reproof or censure. Let each man act according to his own conscience. What do you say, Mr. Watson?"

"It is a question encompassed with difficulties," answered the minister diffidently; "and every man must act according to his own inward light. But since Brother Morley has gone so far as to promise marriage to this young creature, I do not see how he can conscientiously break off his covenant with her."

With that utterance the subject seemed settled. A few minutes later Mr. Waldron shook hands with John Morley with distant brotherliness, and went away with the minister. John Morley kissed his child, and bade her go to bed. But Hester loitered for a minute or two after he had reopened his large book, as if longing to say something to him. It was evidently an effort, an effort which she felt constrained to make; and at last, when he believed himself to be alone, John Morley heard a small, timid voice speaking from the threshold, and saw Hester looking back at him with anxious eyes. What she had to say before she left him was simply this: "I hope you will not make God angry with you, father." Then she went to her little chamber, and John Morley returned to his book with disquieting thoughts in his mind. And the old house was still and silent.

One of the three gables of the house rose a story higher than the others, and under its pointed roof was a large attic, lighted by a great dormer window, which overlooked the neighboring buildings, and caught a glimpse of fields and woods beyond, with a range of distant hills, lying blue and cloudlike against the sky line. It was the pleasantest room in the dark old house. Beneath it lay some printing-offices, black and grimy, containing ancient presses, covered over with dust and cobwebs; for John Morley had given up the printing business, which his predecessor had carried on, and the attic in the gable was his only workroom. He employed also but one workman, a stranger, who looked like a foreigner, and who had been passing through the town on the tramp the first week after his marriage with Hester's mother.

The young wife had taken pity upon the footsore and famishing wanderer, and had persuaded her husband to give him a trial at his professed trade as a bookbinder. This trial was a complete success. He had learned his trade in Paris; his father having been an English artisan who had married a Frenchwoman from Burgundy. The amount of work accomplished by this single man was marvellous, and the price he set upon it extravagant; yet such was the taste and beauty of the workmanship, that John Morley seldom received less for it than the high sum at which his binder valued it. Throughout the whole county no binding was esteemed unless it had issued from John Morley's workshop.

The binding room, wherein this solitary artisan had worked for ten years, was not only light and sunny, but it was odorous with the pleasant scent of Russia leather and morocco and in the summer with the flowers which he cultivated in boxes and pots about his window-sill. His press and work-table stood in the wide bay formed by the casement, where the daylight fell upon him, long after the court below and the sombre parlor were obscured in twilight. Over the rusty old grate, which was formed only of a few rude bars of iron fastened into the chimney jamb, stood a rack containing his tools for the printing of his ornamental devices upon the gold-leaf. All around on the shelves and the sloping ceiling were displayed specimens of the tasteful branch of art which he carried on in unbroken monotony from day to day, and from year to year.

He was a man so quiet, perhaps from his ten years of lonely work, that never was any sound heard of him in his attic; which indeed was isolated from the rest of the house by the empty rooms below, though there was a door out of them which communicated with the second floor of the dwelling. There was another entrance to the workroom by a door into a passage running along the side of the house, of which he kept the key, in order to let himself in at any hour; for he was an early riser, and often came to his work at five o'clock in the morning and remained until late at night; taking neither pleasure nor rest, beyond that absolutely necessary for health.

He was a small, tough, withered-looking man, stooping a good deal in the shoulders, and with thin, scanty hair. Always upon reaching the deserted printing-offices, it was his custom to exchange his boots for a pair of soundless list slippers, which could make no noise upon the bare boards of his attic. He was a nervous man, starting at every sound, of which however but few ever reached him in his solitude, for the window opened upon the court instead of the street; and whatever rare tumult might be in the latter only came to his ears softened by the distance. So quiet was the gable that the house-sparrows gathered there in numbers, and their shrill, pert chirping seemed the only sound that did not discompose him.

The sole pleasure of this secluded and laborious being was to see Hester push open the door of his attic, and, with her book under her arm, creep quietly in and climb upon a tall chair which stood at a corner of the press. There she watched him spreading the delicate gold-leaf upon the crimson or blue morocco of his bindings, and stamp them carefully with his elegant devices. Very seldom any conversation passed between these two; but sometimes the child mounted upon a ladder and sat on the highest step, which reached nearly to the ceiling, and there read aloud, in a low, pleasant murmur of a voice, which was as soothing as silence itself, from the book which happened to be the favorite of the day. That was the crowning point of his pleasure; but he never sought it, and never put his sense of delight into words.

If Hester ever brought him any book to be mended, however old and stained and worn, he lavished all his art upon it; pondering in his mind what new device he could discover to embellish it. The nursery rhymes and primers of Hester Morley were marvels in the decorative art of bookbinding; though they lay unseen in her bedroom, upon some shelves which he had made for her.

The second marriage of John Morley was solemnized in a distant town, and afterward he took his young bride a short excursion, while his house was being set in order for her reception. During this time Hester almost lived in the attic, to the inexpressible delight of Lawson; a delight, however, which was mingled with a profound and smouldering resentment against his employer. He could not understand how he could need any companionship besides his child's.

"Lawson," said Hester, one day recurring to a subject which had secretly troubled her ever since the visit of Mr. Waldron and the minister to John Morley, "do you think that God will be really angry with my father for being married to another wife?"

"Ay, do I," answered Lawson, in deep accents and brief words.

"But, Lawson," she said, her face growing pale and awe-stricken, "it is a dreadful thing to make God angry. Miss Waldron has taught me all about it at the Sunday school. Don't you know what He did to Sodom and Gomorrah? Suppose He sent down fire from heaven, and burnt all the house up? Or suppose He should strike my father and my new mother dead, like Ananias and Sapphira? I can't help thinking about it all day long, and at nights when I awake. What should God be angry for?"

Lawson stooped over his work, breathing softly on the gold-leaf, and smoothing it out carefully with his smoothest finger.

"If God is angry with my father," continued Hester, sobbing, "I think I should like Him to be angry with me as well. If Ananias and Sapphira had any little children, who would take care of them after they were struck dead? But I don't think He will be angry. Have you ever seen my new mother, Lawson?"

"You must not call her mother," said Lawson; "your mother is in heaven, with God."

"But I've promised to be like her very own daughter forever and ever," answered Hester; "I don't know what made me promise, only my father said I ought, and it would make him happy. Lawson, I would do anything to make my father happy. And I don't think she will be the same as the stepmothers in books. What was my own mother like, Lawson?"

With slow and quiet movements, for he seemed incapable of any quick or energetic action, Lawson mounted the step-ladder, and reached an old portfolio from the highest shelf. From this he drew out an engraving, mounted upon board, and surrounded by an exquisite scroll of gilding and coloring; it was a woman's face only—a sweet, calm, colorless face, long and oval, with a placid serenity approaching to sadness upon it. The child and the workman bent over it some time in silence.

"That was how she looked," he whispered, "the last time I saw her, just before she died; and I promised, and your father promised, on our bended knees, that we'd neither have thought, nor care, nor plan, save for you and your happiness, Miss Hester. And this is the way," he cried, smiting his hands together with a sudden agony of passion which seemed impossible in so quiet and subdued a creature, "that my employer keeps his promise! Yes. God will be angry and I do well to be angry."

It might have provoked a smile to hear this puny, shrivelled, insignificant workman identify himself and his impotent resentment with God and His anger. But there was no one to smile, except Hester, who looked up into his face with wide open eyes of terror and amazement.

"Miss Hester," he said, more wildly, "this is how it is. It is seven years ago, and I've been toiling ever since to make a dot for you. Why, I've only taken small wages from your father, while he gets six or ten times the amount by my work! I found out a new way of bevelling the edges, which nobody knows how to do save myself. There was a very nice little fortune for you already. Everybody was saying John Morley is rich. And so this bold, laughing, flirting, flaunting madam has married him for his money, and she will make it fly like chaff before the wind. We shall all be poor again. I've been keeping down my poor mother and myself, when I might have made money for us both."

"Is your mother very poor?" asked Hester.

"Yes. She is living with my sister in Burgundy," he answered; "both of them are widows, and they are quite poor, but for what I send them, and I haven't sent them as much as I could."

"Is my father very rich, Lawson?" asked Hester again.

"He would have been by the time you wanted your dot," answered Lawson.

"I don't know what a dot is," said Hester.

"It is the money you will want to marry a good husband with," he replied; "and now you will be poor, very poor. It's all over, and I've been a fool, and John Morley is a fool."

He threw himself half across his binding press, and covered his face with his hands, while Hester stood by, looking doubtfully at his downcast attitude, and going over in her mind the strange things he had been saying.

"Do you think my own mother knows?" she asked at last in a hushed voice.

"Ay! does she," answered Lawson; "many and many a time she comes up here, and walks about with her soft, quiet feet, which I couldn't hear at all if there was any noise in the room; and she looks over my work, and pushes the right tool toward me, when I don't quite know what to do for the best. Oh, she knows all that goes on in the old house she has left. Don't you think she is often and often with you, Miss Hester, watching over you in your little bed, and sitting by you in the parlor of an evening, when you're reading? Do you never feel her near you?"

"I think I do," whispered the child, pressing close to the visionary man, and laying her small fingers upon his warm living hand.

"She may die yet! She may die yet!" he muttered to himself; "people die easily sometimes. Then we should be all right again. There's no room for two mistresses in one house. I shall never feel her near to me when the other is here. My best work is over. I shall do no more good in the world as long as the other one is alive."

He continued muttering to himself at intervals, while he burnished the gilding under his hands.

Hester then mounted to her high seat upon the step-ladder, and sat watching the evening clouds, which could be seen slowly sailing toward the west across the field of sky which was visible from the window. Now and then she sighed as a child seldom sighs. The sun went down and the distant corners of the attic grew dusky and filled with shadows; and when the child awoke from her long reverie, cold and troubled, she fancied readily that in the darkest of the gloom there stood the soft, light outline of a figure clothed in white, whose dim face was calm and sweet and sad. It was her mother; but she had entered into a covenant to be as a daughter to her father's second wife.

PAUL AT ATHENS.

S. S. Lesson for March 2, Acts 17: 16-34. Golden Text, verse 23. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul's Waiting Thoughts—His Spirit Stirred—The Appeal of Unsaved Souls—Paul among Devout People—No Apparent Results—Summoned before the Areopagus—His Text—His Logical Argument—The Moment for Decision—Mockers and Procrastinators—The Witnesses Left Behind.

PAUL, driven out of Berea by the persecution of the Thessalonian Jews, and accompanied by some of the Berean brethren, came to Athens. None of these brethren remained with him, for he sent them back to hasten Silas and Timotheus in joining him. But whenever Paul was sent forth, as he had been by the Holy Ghost, he must be a missionary; it was woe unto him if he preached not the Gospel. No prayers of earnest devout Athenians seeking after truth had preceded his arrival, and thus the ground was by no means prepared, like that at Philippi. Jews there were, but their spirit resembled that of the Athenians themselves.

While remaining at Athens alone, the sole representative of Jesus in that city, then most renowned in the world for learning, within him "when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry" [or full of idols]. Paul knew, as the Athenians did not, the eternal issues which were at stake in the life of each individual man and woman who passed him in the street. He knew the glorious possibilities for God in each life; every one whom he met might become, not only saved, but a temple of the Holy Ghost, and a very river of blessing to others. And each one was now missing this glorious, and only worthy, end of existence—each was "dead in trespasses and sins," and a fount of corruption, instead of blessing, to those around. He knew the power of God to do mighty work upon souls, and alone though he was, the work before him appearing impossible, he was ready to the hand of his God for anything to which He should call him.

PAUL'S SPIRIT WAS STIRRED

It is strange if the state of unsaved souls does not stir our spirits. If we really believe that heaven and hell are realities, if we really know what it is to have God in our own lives, and if we know, on another hand, "the depths of Satan," it is very clear that the love of Christ can have little constraining power over us, if we are not ready at any time to work under the Holy Ghost for their rescue. It is true the work of some may be necessarily more a work of prayer than of effort, and the work of others may be more of effort than of prayer; but if the Spirit of God does not constrain us to one or to both, there is little evidence of His really dwelling in us.

Paul, as usual, began in the synagogue, seeking to work on ground prepared by scriptural knowledge, among the "devout persons." Devout, but unspiritual; devout, but unteachable. Oh, how many souls are thus, "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (II Tim. 3: 5)—having "a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge . . . being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness" (Rom. 10: 2, 3). These are always the bitterest opponents of all really spiritual work. To such the Gospel is not only foolishness, they believe it to be subversive of all true ideas of right and wrong. Why? Because they believe that something good is still to be found in human nature, and they really depend on themselves and not on God for salvation.

TO THEM GOD IS A MYSTERY,

a distant Being to be regarded with solemn awe, never to approach without fear and dread. Paul's complete freedom of spirit, and his real personal acquaintance with God, his certainty of sin forgiven, his entire devotion to God and his real love to Him, were to them so incomprehensible, as to arouse suspicion rather than sympathy. And if so with the Jews, much more so with the polite but heathen Athenians, with whom he disputed daily in the market. Who can find access to such hearts as these? Only God Himself.

For some time Paul went on with this work every day, his own patience tried by seeing no result, but learning more than ever what he afterward wrote to the Corinthians—

"I AM NOTHING"

(I Cor. 12: 11). Two years later he saw the wonderful work of the Spirit at Ephesus; but as God educates His instruments while He uses them, we see how frequently the manifest power of the Spirit of God is preceded or followed by a time of comparative dearth and powerlessness. At first Paul's preaching and personal conversations did not go deep enough into these Jewish and Athenian hearers even to stir up opposition. At last some of the philosophers deigned to notice him, saying, "What will this babbler say?" A somewhat contemptuous way of speaking! "Other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods: because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection." This was something against the national feeling, and could not be tolerated. Hope was reviving in the heart of Paul. At any rate, the people began to see that something was stirring, and the apostle saw in it the hand of God, creating listeners to His truth. The unknown man who had so boldly stood up in the synagogue uninvited, and who had spoken in the market to one and another, was now creating such a sensation that the highest court in Athens took cognizance of it, and Paul was called to stand before the Athenian council in

THE AREOPAGUS.

It was such an opportunity as had not been given him in all the days of his previous ministry. Many a man in such a case would no doubt have studied and prepared the whole night beforehand, that through eloquent phrases and rhetoric he might produce an impression which would incline his hearers to pay attention to the real Subject of his discourse; and thus having impressed himself upon the audience, he would introduce Jesus. Not so Paul; he would put himself out of sight and introduce the God in whose cause he came among them, and the Saviour whose messenger he was. God the Holy Ghost prepared the words which Paul should speak according to the promise of Jesus. "When they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate: but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost" (Mark 13: 11).

The man of God stood in the midst of this renowned company of men bent on satisfying their curiosity and love of acquiring human knowledge, and one can well feel how the spirit of that critical, unsympathetic audience, with few souls yearning for the truth, must have weighed on his spirit. But God had given a clue, and shown him how to speak in a way which, even though it might not convince them, would never be forgotten.

In the course of his walks about Athens Paul had noticed an altar with this inscription, "To

THE UNKNOWN GOD."

He knew that it was not by chance that his eye had fallen upon this, and as he traced God in all things, so in this little incident; and this was the text which God gave him for his discourse. It was masterly in its very simplicity, as all the teaching of the Holy Ghost is. He argued with reason and common-sense, at least, on his side that men should know the God they worship. That if men count Him worthy to be worshipped, and believe in His creative power, they should at least "seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him,

AND FIND HIM."

Paul then quoted from the well-known authors of the day, mostly poets. These heathen men-of-letters had got beyond the superstition of polytheism, and there was already a movement toward the worship of one God "in whom we live and move and have our being," to which Paul added "For we are also His offspring." And on this fact he grounded an appeal addressed to their dignity as being God's offspring, "Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." As though He would say, "How can the creation create the Creator?" so turning idolatry into a meaningless absurdity. Having thus established God's position, and His claim upon His creatures, Paul spoke fearlessly of God's command to men everywhere that they should repent, should turn from and turn to, for this is repentance from sin, from self, from the world, from idols—to God. Paul showed the justice of God, "The times of this ignorance"—i.e., when men heard and knew no other way but to serve idols—"God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent."

THE RESULT.

It was a moment for decision. Those who were swayed by no personal consideration, but who wanted to know the truth for the truth's sake, could not but be convinced how untenable was their position, and how really they were now accountable to the God who had sent His servant to make Him known. Paul did not mince matters; he spoke of coming judgment, saying, "Because He hath appointed a day, in which He will judge the world in righteousness [in] the Man whom He hath ordained having offered faith to all in that He hath raised Him from the dead." It has gone out of fashion to preach judgment, but Paul dared not leave it out of his discourses, because he would not be wiser than God. He had given his message; that which he had said could never be unsaid; his hearers were under its responsibility. Neutral they could no longer be. "Some mocked, and others said: We will hear thee again on this matter." But neither the mockers nor the procrastinators decided for God, and were saved. "Howbeit certain men clave unto him and believed;" among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them." It did not look as though much had been done, but there was at least a witness for the truth left behind at Athens.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Motion for a Vote of Censure on the Gladstone government for its incapacity in Egypt was passed by the British House of Lords, but the debate was continued in the Commons through the week without reaching a vote. Mr. Gladstone's reply to his opponents is said to have been a masterly defence of his policy. He denied that it had been vacillating or inconsistent. He informed the House that 4000 men had been ordered to Suakim. General Gordon, he said, had a plan of his own for extricating the garrisons and restoring the country to its former pacific condition. General Gordon's plan would restore the former rulers to their ancestral power, usurped by Egypt. He denounced as a gross error the dual control of England and France, which, he said, had been left him as a legacy by the Conservatives who were now denouncing him. England had not, he declared, withdrawn from the hands of the Egyptian Government the control of its institutions. She had simply made Egypt understand that the British military occupation of Egypt entailed the necessity of seeing British advice followed.

The Details of the Fall of Sinkat on the Soudan frontier of Egypt have been telegraphed. Tewfik Bey, one of the ablest Egyptian officers, was in command, but the valor of the general was powerless against famine. For a fortnight the garrison had been eating roots and tree leaves. Tewfik Bey harangued his men, saying that by fighting they might save themselves, but that by remaining they must die from hunger in a few days; flight was impossible. The men, thus animated with Tewfik Bey's spirit, destroyed the military stores, exploded the magazine, filled their pouches to the utmost with cartridges, and issued forth, 600 strong, against the rebels. El Mahdi's hordes rushed to the attack. Tewfik Bey and his men fought nobly. For a long time they repulsed every attempt to break their ranks. Finally superior numbers prevailed, and with a tremendous rush the rebels burst through one of the sides of the Egyptian square. A general massacre ensued, and not a soul escaped. According to the latest reports only four sick men, who were unable to take part in the sortie, the Cadi of Sinkat and thirty women were spared by the rebels. Sir Evelyn Baring, the British Minister at Cairo, telegraphs that after the battle the rebels entered Sinkat and put every one to the sword.

Baker Pacha States, in Explanation of his recent defeat, that it was due to the fact that the Egyptian forces under him were forced into the army against their will; that, in addition to their being in sympathy with the False Prophet, they had a religious fear of him. Believing that the Egyptians were likely at any moment to turn on him and aid the rebels, and not wishing to run the risk of sacrificing the few brave Europeans he had with him, he thought it best to leave Trinkitat for Suakim, where a better opportunity would be afforded for reorganizing his forces.

Extracts from Queen Victoria's New Book have been cabled across the Atlantic. It is in the form of a disconnected diary of her life for twenty years, commencing August 21st, 1862. The book is dedicated to the memory of John Brown, the Queen's late attendant. His portrait adorns the book, and a glowing tribute to his virtues is contained in its pages. Details of the Scotch gillie's services are recorded, and a minute description is given of an accident which befel him during an excursion on the mountains, in which one of his legs was scratched. The betrothal of the Princess Louise to the Marquis of Lorne is narrated, with other matters of family interest. The Queen also mentions with deep respect the eloquent and earnest sermons she heard from the late Dr. Norman McLeod. The concluding page is devoted to the death of John Brown. It contains these sentences: "His loss to me is irreparable, for he deservedly possessed my entire confidence. He served me truly, devotedly, untiringly. To say that he is daily, nay, hourly, missed by me, whose lifelong gratitude he won by constant care and devotion, is but a feeble expression of the truth."

Mr. Bradlaugh Again Administered the Oath to himself in the House of Commons on February 11th. He was informed that his proceedings were irregular, and by a formal vote of the House he was excluded. He has since resigned his seat, and has gone to Northampton to seek re-election.

Russia is Steadily Creeping on Toward British India. Her latest step is the annexation of Merv. The German press says the submission of the tribes of Merv to Russia is worse for England than the disasters in the Soudan. It comments upon the remarkable success of the Russian policy in Central Asia, and says it is always directed against England. If the Russians should stand again before the walls of Constantinople the English would be disabled from commanding them to halt, as they did in 1878. Russia will become the immediate neighbor of the British in India, and will be able at any moment to create disturbance in Northern India. Now only Afghanistan is between Russia and India. The frontier tribes are always ready to invade the rich Indian provinces, if only their rear is covered, and this Russia can now guarantee.

The Czar of Russia is Reported as Suffering tortures from fear of the Nihilists. A prominent English journalist says: "I hear from St. Petersburg that for the last month the Czar has been in such a deplorable state of nervous depression that to all intents and purposes he may be regarded as insane. He is thoroughly terror-stricken, and lives in a state of panic which would be ludicrous if it did not produce such melancholy consequences. The present state of things in Russia cannot last many months, and what the issue will be no man can predict. The attitude of Russia toward Germany has become absolutely servile in its dependence."

A Massacre of Christians in Tonquin is Reported, and it is stated that it was the result of the French invasion, the people being unable to distinguish European nationalities and regarding all Europeans as alike enemies. La Patrie says that over fifty Christians have been massacred in the neighborhood of Hue and that the mission houses have been demolished. Bands of men in the pay of the mandarins of Nguien and Vantoung are pillaging and murdering and crying "Death to the Christians!" The Vicariate of Eastern Cochin China is endangered. The Christians in the vicinity of Tourane are fleeing to Puinhoin, hoping to find the French there.

Mr. Bastian, an American Spiritualist, was last week expelled from Vienna. He gave a seance in the Imperial Palace, and during the manifestations the Crown Prince Rudolph detected and exposed him. When the Prince caught Bastian he was gliding about in the dark with his shoes off. When the room was lighted the Crown Prince says he saw Bastian conceal something in his clothes. Bastian at once ran out of the room, and in his stocking feet escaped from the Archduke Johann's palace into the street, leaving his shoes behind him. Archdukes Johann and Rainer, Prince Batthyany and other distinguished guests chased him through the corridors of the palace into the street at the front door.

The Universal Unrest was the Subject of Episcopal comment in a sermon recently preached by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who, discoursing on the words "Peace on earth," said the natural question evoked would be, "What! Peace on earth; is there peace now?" Who should dare to say that there was now peace on the earth? Was not the present state of things rather an armed watchfulness? Was not nation now watching nation? Was there not a condition of unrest throughout all the nations, which a great statesman of our own day spoke of a few years ago as a moaning wind throughout Europe, which would soon arise into a mighty storm? What meant Nihilism? What meant Communism? What meant that which had been spoken of as the red spectre of anarchy? It might be that some of these things of which he had ventured to speak to them were, as it were, the sounds of the footfall of the coming Antichrist, and if it were so, well then, let every true heart take courage. They knew the final issue, and if their redemption was in truth drawing nigh, let them lift up their heads.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Removed to another London district, that of New Cross, on February 12th. The Stratford Mission, which closed the previous day, was exceedingly successful. So crowded were the services, that overflow meetings were found to be indispensable, and many thousands of persons attended them. Those meetings were addressed by Major Whittle, Lord Kinnaird, and Lord Radstock, and by several of the neighboring ministers, while Mr. and Mrs. McGranahan conducted the musical part of the services. Mr. McGranahan has organized a choir of male voices, and the innovation is justifying itself by its effectiveness and utility.

A Ladies' Fire-Brigade has been Organized in England in connection with Girton College, Cambridge. The lady graduates displayed characteristic persistence in their undertaking, against adverse circumstances. Having recently had cause for alarm by the overheating of one of the stove-pipes of the college building, they resolved on forming themselves into a fire-brigade, and very naturally applied to Captain Shaw, the Chief of the London Fire Department, for assistance in instructing and drilling them. As the captain was reluctant, they hired an ordinary fireman. In a short time they became proficient, and as nimble as any member of a simple country brigade. They can work the engines and execute the manœuvres with the greatest precision, and when Captain Shaw was called upon to witness their drill, he complimented them heartily on their proficiency.

THOMAS CHALMERS was born in the town of Anstruther, Fifeshire, Scotland, on March 17th, 1780. He was the sixth child in a family of fourteen. His father, John Chalmers, was a "dyer, shipowner, and general merchant," and a citizen of the old God-fearing type. He was characterized by much moral worth, and honored for his steady adherence to evangelical truth and his fervent but unostentatious piety. His mother seems to have been like minded, and was spoken of by all who knew her as "a devout and most worthy woman."

Thomas was, almost from the first, committed to the care of a nurse, whose cruelty and deceitfulness haunted his memory through life. To escape from her he went of his own accord to the parish school at the age of three. He grew a strong, brave, merry boy, exceedingly boisterous, with big head, matted dark hair, large plain features, broad shoulders, well-proportioned but brawny limbs, his laugh always loudest, and his figure always foremost at football and the other games in which the boys were contending.

Among the books which he read at a very early age was the "Pilgrim's Progress." But his chief delight was in a Pictorial Bible, where he learned, first from the illustrations, and afterward from the letter-press, the scenes, incidents, and lessons of Scripture. When quite a child, he formed the resolution to become a minister; and, as a good many boys have done, he played at preaching to his companions. This resolution, however, sprang from none of the stirrings of youthful piety, of which we sometimes hear; for he showed none of the religious impressions which might have been expected of one brought up in an exemplary home. It was merely because at that time the minister was the greatest and cleverest of men in the eyes of a country boy; and if such a boy had any intellectual ambition in him, he generally aspired to distinguish himself in the pulpit.

ENTERS AT ST. ANDREW'S UNIVERSITY.

In the Session, 1791–92, when he was only twelve years old, Chalmers entered the University of St. Andrew's. There he spent his first two sessions in much the same way as were his school days at Anstruther. A great part of his time was occupied in boyish amusements in which, as at school, he was ever ready for fun and frolic.

It was in his fourteenth year that the mind of the student woke as from sleep, and gave indication of its giant energies. Mathematics, which seems to some a cold, hard science, had for him a charm beyond the fascinations of romance. The classics, although expounded by John Hunter, one of the most admired scholars and grammarians of his day, called forth no response from Chalmers's mind. He had little of the critical and mere literary faculty; his delight was only in demonstrations and certainties.

A CONSPICUOUS STUDENT.

Having found in mathematics the natural bent of his mind, he plunged into the study of it with the intensity of his temperament. He became one of the conspicuous students of his college. The earlier fancy for the ministry now gave place to a new ambition to become professor of mathematics in one of the national universities. This awakening of an intellect long inert could not be confined to the mere ardent pursuit of mathematics and physics; it sought vent for itself in the outlets of literary composition. Specimens of his later college compositions are written with singular force and beauty of language, and are interesting as the first-fruits of that billowy Chalmerian style, which is as marked as the Johnsonian, and which proved capable of marvellous rhetorical effect.

At this time there was everywhere a violent reaction against the previous ages of passive belief. Various forms of scepticism and materialism prevailed largely, though secretly, among the literati and upper class of Scotland, and had infected even the professors of the universities and the ministers of the Church; and it is clear that by the hands of his own academic superiors Chalmers, when a lad of seventeen, having then been for two years a Divinity student, was first infected with these doctrines.

It was not until his twenty-first year that he found his way out of the labyrinth of speculations into which he had been drawn, or his mind cleared of the last distempered dreams in which he had been indulging; and it was while attending the lectures of the evangelical Professor Robison, that the true light dawned upon his mind, and showed him a pathway from the miry pit of atheism.

After completing the course of study prescribed by the Church of Scotland, Chalmers obtained license as a preacher of the Gospel on July 31st, 1799; but there was as yet no burden of a divine message in his spirit, which his tongue should make haste to utter. About a month afterward he made his

in a chapel in Wigan, and on the Sunday following he delivered the same discourse in Liverpool. In October, the same year, he established himself in the house of a relative in Edinburgh, and pursued with great ardor his favorite studies of mathematics and philosophy. In November, 1801, he was by the University of St. Andrew's. At the same period he was installed as Assistant-Professor of Mathematics in the university.

On May 12th, 1803, Thomas Chalmers' was ordained with the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery of Cupar. The charge committed to him was a compact rural parish in Fifeshire, occupied by a purely rural population. The young minister began his work with a very inadequate sense of its serious character. Intent on academical distinction, he gave to parish duty but a small proportion of his time. He took a deep interest in local and national politics, and was a prominent public man. Europe was at that time agitated by the conquests of the first Napoleon, and volunteer corps were organized in Scotland, of one of which Chalmers became captain.

From the various accounts which have been given us by Dr. Hanna, Dr. Fraser, and others, we are enabled, in thought, to see Thomas Chalmers in his manse at Kilmany, dashing off his sermon, quick as the pen could run, in the late hours of Saturday night, intent only on doing a necessary duty, and neither aiming at nor expecting the conversion of souls as a result of his ministry. So he continued until the year 1810. That was for him

A MOMENTOUS YEAR.

Death made havoc in the Chalmers family. Within a few months his uncle and a dearly loved brother and sister were carried to the tomb. Two other sisters were declared to be dying of consumption, and Thomas Chalmers himself, then thirty years of age, was prostrated with a dangerous illness. For four months he never left his room; and it was more than a year before he could resume his parochial duties.

During this enforced retirement, the Holy Spirit led him to review his past life, and the result was that he became entirely dissatisfied with himself. Then he read books that searched his spirit closely—Pascal's "Pensées," Wilberforce's "Practical View," Scott's "Force of Truth," Baxter on "Conversion," Doddridge's "Rise and Progress," and many others; and from that dim and lonely chamber issue forth these words:

"My confinement has fixed on my heart a very strong impression of the insignificance of time. This should be the first step to another impression still more salutary—the magnitude of eternity. Strip human life of its connection with a higher scene of existence, and it is the illusion of an instant, an unmeaning farce, a series of visions and projects and convulsive efforts, which terminate in nothing."

These changes were not sudden, except in their beginning; they were not violent; they were not terrifying, as some have experienced. They were gradual, but fundamental, growing as the light grows; they were deep and enduring as life. In short, Thomas Chalmers was converted. The humblest, the most unassuming of men in himself, Chalmers now feels that he is charged with a divine message of reconciliation to perishing sinners; through the grace of God he rises to the height of his grand commission, and with heavenly fire upon his lips proclaims to all around:

"I AM AN AMBASSADOR FOR CHRIST!"

The little sequestered Kirk of Kilmany, once so thinly attended, and the few so careless, was now crowded in every corner, even the standing room, not by the parish folk only, but by strangers from Dundee and Edinburgh. Thomas Chalmers was a name in the country. It had come to be widely recognized that a man of rare power and devotedness was rusticating in a small parish of Fifeshire; and it was inevitable that he should be invited to fill a wider and more conspicuous sphere.

The Tron parish church of Glasgow was without a minister, and hearing of the fame of Chalmers, the Town Council, in whose gift the appointment lay, offered it to him in such a cordial manner tha he at once accepted it. The election was made on November 25th, 1814, but the new minister was not formally admitted until July, 1815. Chalmers was then just thirty-five years old.

He speedily rose to an unparalleled degree of popularity in consequence of his extraordinary eloquence and power. But he did not think that the end of his ministry was answered by crowded churches and enthusiastic admiration of his oratory, he felt that nothing was really gained unless souls were brought into living relationship with Jesus Christ. Though the people of Glasgow were speaking of his "Astronomical Discourses"—the Principia of Newton set to music—as the most magnificent sweep of intellectual power they had ever witnessed, and though on the Sabbath he found it necessary to preach the same sermon morning and evening in order to prevent the overcrowding of the Tron Church, he was yet for some months in a state of despondency because he saw no fruit of his labors.

During the eight years that he labored in Glasgow, he laid the foundation of his national fame by such preaching as Scotland had never known before, and by such methodical evangelical efforts to grapple with the physical misery and spiritual destitution of the masses, as had never before been witnessed, and which remain to this day a model and stimulus to all Christian workers. But mighty as he was as preacher and parish pastor, there was deep-rooted in his heart a passion for Academic work, and for contact with intellectual youth; and he held that the Professorial Chair presented, above all other positions, the opportunity for the most intensive and far-reaching influence.

BECOMES PROFESSOR OF MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

In 1823 the Chair of Moral Philosophy at St. Andrew's became vacant, and it was spontaneously and unanimously offered to Chalmers. Feeling that he could now be more usefully employed at the fountain-head of thought, in filling the souls of the young men who, in their various vocations, would have the moulding of future generations, he resolved to accept the appointment, and commenced his long career as professor, extending over twenty-three years, and terminating only with his death.

Chalmers highly valued an Established Church, ncipally because it was, in his opinion, the st instrument for the extension of the paro- ial system into the remotest and most needy rts of the country. But recent judicial deci- ns were entirely subversive of his cherished liefs and convictions, and effected a reversal, the time, of all his aims and purposes. He sired that the public funds should be applied the support of the Church, but he would not mit that those who disbursed those funds had ight to govern the Church. He wanted State pport without State control.

Foreseeing, in the summer of 1841, that his sire would not be granted and that the law rts would still by their decisions govern the urch, he saw that separation from the govern- nt was inevitable. Chalmers then applied his nd to the first tracing out of a scheme by ich the Church of Scotland, disestablished by force of circumstances, could be carried over the platform of a Free Church, with its char- er, capabilities, and services unimpaired.

n view of a clearly impending crisis, a special vocation of the Evangelical ministers assem- d in Edinburgh—four hundred and fifty ong—in the month of November, 1842. It s opened by Chalmers with a serene and minous discourse, from these words of the almist, "Unto the upright there ariseth light the darkness." He took the opportunity to iew the position of the Church in conse- ence of recent decisions of the Court of Ses- n, and discussed "the exact principles which st determine whether we can remain within, must withdraw from, the endowed Church, it is, retain our stipends or throw them to the ds, whatever be the consequences."

HIS SCHEME OF SUSTENTATION.

Chalmers also sought permission to expound scheme of Sustentation for a Free Church. e four hundred and fifty brethren listened h admiration, but the scheme was regarded h general incredulity; and the prospects d out by it were considered as the visionary icipations of a too sanguine imagination. It s a perilous experiment for the ministers to render their sure and regular incomes paid the government with punctuality, and to ve the parsonages which the government had ovided for them for life, and go out poor and pendent to live on voluntary gifts.

The following year, however, the Convocation emnly voted the following resolution: "It is determination of the brethren now assem- d, if no measure such as they have declared be indispensable be granted, to tender the ignation of their civil advantages, and to cast emselves on such provision as God in His ovidence may afford." "Will they come ?" was the universal inquiry. "Surely they l think twice before they give up their com- table manses and well-paid stipends," said people. These may be their principles, t will they be prepared to carry their prin- ples to the extent of giving up their prop- y?

THE DAY OF DISRUPTION.

It was Thursday, May 18th, 1843. The ex- ement and suspense in Edinburgh and roughout Scotland was intense. The morning se dull and cloudy; but as the day advanced, became clearer and more settled. For several ys previously there had been an unusual influx strangers into Edinburgh, some drawn by riosity, but tens of thousands from profound mpathy, and the anticipation of beholding a blime spectacle. By four in the morning ge numbers had taken their seats in St. An- ew's Church of the New Town, in which the siness of the Assembly would be transacted, ere they sat in expectation for upward of nine urs. A still greater number had taken their ats, as early, in the large hall of the Canon- lls, where preparations had been made for the ception of the New Assemby if they withdrew d made the formal inauguration of the Free urch of Scotland. Long before the middle the day all ordinary business was suspended. ense but eddying crowds were to be seen at the various points where there was any cause of interest or attraction.

The Marquis of Bute, Royal Commissioner, was keeping state at Holyrood. Troops of cavalry, mounted on their proud coursers, and glittering in armor, with banner and trumpet, were circling round the palace. Carriages and equipages were rushing to and fro, and richly caparisoned steeds struck fire from their hoofs as they dashed past with their lordly riders. By midday the long spacious Chamber of State was filled with a splendor such as old Holyrood does not now often exhibit, the representative of royalty, the highest of the nobility, ermined judges, star-bespangled warriors, and the dark array of the clergy still national; while the whole scene was adorned with cheeks as fair and eyes as bright as if the court of Mary Stuart had been revived.

But the air was electrical for all that; any turn of the wind might dissolve the dark cloud in a destructive shower; passions are all the more intense when repressed under the show of easy nonchalance. This Chamber of State is hung with portraits of the old Scottish kings; among the rest is one of William of the "glorious Revolution." The Royal Commission was standing opposite, in a circle of all that was outwardly august, and imposing, and venerable in the nation—surely it was the very marriage-day of Church and State—when this picture of King William accidentally broke away from the wall, and came crashing down upon the floor. A voice like Cassandra's proclaimed, "There goes the Revolution settlement!"

The ever-increasing multitude, who have been floating about the town all day, now concentrate and await the birth of events. The galleries are crammed with their nine-hours' occupants; the back seats below are also filled; and the ministers and elders pour in hastily, till every seat in the body of the church holds its man.

THE SCENE IN THE CHURCH.

Dr. Welsh, always calm and dignified, enters and takes his Moderator's chair; Chalmers on his left. The Commissioner next appears, and fills his Chair of State. After the opening devotions, and after the great assemblage had resumed their seats, there was a bending forward, and a universal cry of "Hush! hush!"

"Fathers and brethren!" Dr. Welsh began, and every accent circulated like an electric current through the breathless assembly. Distinctly and concisely he explained that the brethren had decided that rather than be subject as ministers to secular government they would resign government pay and found a Free Church. He thus concluded: "We protest that it is and shall be lawful for us to withdraw to a separate place of meeting, for the purpose of taking steps for separating in an orderly way from the Establishment. And we now withdraw accordingly, humbly and solemnly acknowledging the hand of the Lord in the things which have come upon us, because of our manifold sins, and the sins of the Church and nation."

He bowed to the Commissioner, left his seat, and walked down the aisle. Chalmers followed him; and other venerable fathers—Gordon, Macdonald, Macfarlane—rose and departed. The people in the galleries, spellbound at first, broke out into one rapturous shout. Then minister after minister passed away, elder after elder, until many seats were left empty. More than four hundred ministers, soon afterward increased to five hundred, and a still larger number of the elderhood, pass from the church into the streets.

The great shout inside is the signal to the multitudes outside; and as the well-known faces appear in front, the cry reverberates through the city—"They come! they come!" One loud ringing cheer after another hails the brave men. They came out in no regular order; but the dense multitudes gathering and forming a narrow lane, they were forced into an unintended procession of three and three, a quarter of a mile in length; and through the crowded streets, and under the crowded windows, they made their way to the hall of Canon-mills.

THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

Amid acclamations, continued for several minutes, Chalmers takes the chair. He calls upon them to join in the psalm—

"O send Thy light forth and Thy truth;
Let them be guides to me,
And bring me to Thine holy hill,
Ev'n where Thy dwellings be."

As the 3000 voices swell through the building, a ray of sunshine—rare on that cloudy day—suddenly breaks in, and irradiates the assembly; and many present are at once reminded of the text of Chalmers's sermon six months before, "Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness."

SUCCESS.

Whatever may be the doubts in some minds as to the wisdom of the Disruption, there can be none as to the successful operations of the Free Church. Its multiplication of religious agencies in large towns; its care for the rural population; its educational and other philanthropic institutions; its Foreign Mission honored by large success in heathen lands—all show that even if the Disruption could be proved to have been an evil, it has been over-ruled by Providence for good.

In the year 1881 the Free Church had about 1030 ministers, and raised during the previous year, for all purposes, the sum of nearly $3,000,000.

Exigencies of space forbid any reference to the after work of Thomas Chalmers, much as we should like to describe his splendid home-missionary success in the degraded neighborhood of the West Port, Edinburgh, where he subsequently built a church. This was the crowning achievement of his life, for a few months after he was called to his eternal rest.

DEATH.

Dr. Chalmers died on the night of May 30th, 1847, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. He had recently returned from a visit to London, and was apparently in his usual robust health. "During the whole of the evening he was peculiarly bland and benignant." Immediately after prayers he withdrew, and bidding his family remember that they must be early to-morrow, he waved his hand, saying, "A general good-night."

The housekeeper, who had been long in the family, knocked next morning at the door of Dr. Chalmers's room, but received no answer. Concluding that he was asleep, and unwilling to disturb him, she waited till a second visitor called with an important message; she then entered the room—it was in darkness; she spoke, but there was no response. At last she threw open the window-shutters and drew aside the curtains of the bed. He sat there, half erect, his head reclining gently on the pillow; the expression of his countenance that of fixed and majestic repose,

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

She took his hand, she touched his brow; he had been dead for hours; very shortly after that parting salute to his family he had entered the eternal world.

"His spirit at a bound
Left its encumbering clay;
His tent at sunrise on the ground
A darkened ruin lay."

A king of men had passed from the earth, and through all Christendom there went a wave of tender sorrow. He was the greatest orator, the greatest preacher, and one of the most magnanimous, wise, and honorable men, in the illustrious scroll of those who have shed lustre on the name of Scotland.

THE ARCTIC MARTYRS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 24, 1884.

"By the breath of God frost is given: and the breadth of the water is straitened."—JOB 37: 10.

Where Winters are Hatched—The Unexplored Region—The Returned Passengers—Contrast between their Going and their Coming—The Jeannette Voyage—Not a Failure—In what it Succeeded—I. THIS is a river or lake or sea frozen over. The waters that would otherwise be free are straitened and in crystal shackles. In Job's time there had been no polar expeditions, but this text is descriptive of an Arctic sea. In the most ancient times the tyrant Cold went forth and assailed the waters while at play, and took them into everlasting captivity, and the crash that the Arctic explorer hears at midnight is only the restless captive turning over in her chains. It is the home where all our winters are hatched in nest of iceberg under the wings of the north wind. There are long rows of castles in which live. There are great battlements of glaciers—Gibraltars and Sebastopols—guarding the realm of frigidity, and ponderous gates of glass that swing open long enough to let adventurers sail in and then swing shut, leaving the world to guess about the lost shipping.

Great cities of palaces and castles and minarets and domes and bridges and archways and obelisks and statuary lifted up with such splendors that the human eye is extinguished if it gaze too long. Cathedrals in which eternal silence worships. Thrones on which eternal stillness reigns. Continent uninhabited save by walrus or bear or wild geese or ptarmigan or deer. Hundreds of miles that have never heard human voice or the sound of human footstep. Immensities of chilled quiet. "By the breath of God frost is given: and the breadth of the waters is straitened."

From these lands ten

have now arrived. Oh, the contrast between their going and their coming! July the 8th, 1879, summer day, steaming out from San Francisco Harbor. Decorated yachts filled with distinguished citizens accompanying. Wharves and hills covered with enthusiastic spectators. Fort Point with twenty-one guns of salutation. Blast of steam whistles and dipping of colors, and by telegraph the whole country sympathetic with the gallant undertaking. Now their return after nearly five years! The poor remains of a fragment of the expedition passing amid lines of sorrowful thousands, but the chief objects of interest hearing not a sound of gun and seeing not an uplifted hat. "A failure!" say thousands of people. Two or three bare islands discovered, and the most of the bones of the adventurers flung by the polar winds or gnawed by the polar bears, while here and there a relic, from which all signs of humanity has been obliterated, comes home to revive the prolonged anguish of bereft households. I protest here and now against this misleading cry of failure.

In at least four respects the De Long expedition has been

A MAGNIFICENT SUCCESS.

I. First, it has demonstrated in most stupendous manner and before all nations that religion may be carried into all enterprises, and especially into those which are scientific. Christ was not more certainly on the ship in Galilee than he was on board the Jeannette. Of their first Sunday out De Long's diary records: "Had the articles of war read and the ship's company mustered. Then read divine service, and was much pleased at observing that every officer and man not absolutely on watch voluntarily attended." Yea; it was divine service every Sunday.

I again open De Long's ice journal, and read: "Sent back for Lee. He had turned back, lain down, and was waiting to die. All united in saying Lord's Prayer and Creed after supper." Further on I find the record: "Alexy dying. Doctor baptized him. Read prayers for sick."

De Long further records these words: "I was much impressed, and derived great encouragement from an accident of last Sunday. Our Bible got soaking wet, and I had to read the Epistle and Gospel out of my Prayer-book. According to my rough calculation it was the fifteenth Sunday after Trinity, and the Gospel contained some promises which seemed peculiarly adapted to our condition—Matthew 5: 24: 'Take no thought for your life what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body what ye shall put on.'" The ice-journal of the closing days of that awful journey reads thus: "Lee died at noon. Read prayers for the sick when he found he was going." Again he writes: "We are in the hands of God, and unless He intervenes we are lost." Of he says: "One hundred and thirty-third day. Everybody pretty weak. Read part of divine service." Alas! he could read no more than part of it. Far away from home, and hungry and freezing and dying, they cried unto the Lord, and they went right out of a cold earth into a warm heaven. Oh, we who neglect divine service because it is too cold or too hot, or we are too busy, or have company, let us take the chiding that comes down from the North in the box containing the ice-journal of George W. De Long, the Christian commander.

They did not wait to pray till the cutters parted in the gale and the last can of pemmican was exhausted and they were reduced to a little willow tea and a fried boot-sole, but while the Jeannette was in good trim and sailing on for a scientific conquest so promising that it excited the jealousy of naval officers at San Francisco, the Tuscarora, and the Alaska, and the Alert, and the Monterey of the United States Navy joining not in the cheers and the salvos at the departure of the Jeannette. The prayers of the Arctic explorers in good weather as well as severe are illustrious example for all who go down to the sea in ships as well as for all landsmen. Do not wait to pray till your provision gives out and your boat must be abandoned, and there is no game to bring down or fetch in and you are lost in the snowdrifts.

PRAYER ALL THE WAY

from San Francisco to Lena Delta. Prayer, though the fingers were too numb to turn the leaves, and the lips too stiff with cold to speak the words, and the eye too dim with fatigue to see the page.

They were men of splendid physique, if their portraits are accurate, and of cultured intellects, if we may judge from their diplomas and correspondence, and were armed with all the meteorological instruments and philosophical apparatus, but they did not consider themselves strong enough or wise enough to do without God. Let the infidel and atheistic and blatant philosophy of our day hear it and repent. Do not stultify yourselves and your religion by saying that any expedition is a failure which sets up the banner of the Son of God on the glittering pinnacles of iceberg till all the nations behold the crimson standard.

Gloria Patri, which we sang this morning, sung by these Arctic voyagers, while heaving icebergs played the accompaniment. Glory be to the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost as it was, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen! Oh, did it merely happen so? Was it only accidental? Was there no significance wide as earth and high as heaven in the fact that in that unending winter on monumental hill on Lena Delta the tomb was crowned with a cross? On that cold forehead of th world is set the most precious symbol of th Christian religion.

II. Another success of the polar expedition i in giving the world demonstration of UNPARALLELED COURAGE.

Remember that it is different from tha courage which we all admire—courage in battl It was a more difficult courage, for it was agains the dumb elements. Going into ordinary battl the soldier knows that there is a possibility tha the enemy may give way through cowardic But icebergs never get afraid, and are neve thrown into panic. Going into ordinary battl the soldier knows that it is possible that th enemy may be overcome by a flank movemer or assailed from the rear. But the Arctic Ocea never was flanked. A soldier going into ord nary battle knows that there is a possibility tha the enemy's ammunition may give out. But th polar regions never lack ice for bullets, and it for guns, and ice for cavalry charge, and ice fo thunderous bombardment, fleets of ice, an squadrons of ice forever armed against shippin "Come to me," these cry, "come to me, thou proud Jeannette, and will crush in thy bows, and take off thy mast and loosen thy rudder, and I will bury thee wit no funeral honors in the same grave where dropped the Resolute, and the Intrepid, and th Fury, and the Pioneer, and the Resistance. The most difficult of all courage was the courag of De Long and his men, for they fought n other men who may be routed, but dumb forc of nature which never give any quarter an never surrender and never die.

God in olden time sent forth Joshua an Elijah and Paul by their example to teach th world courage. Now He sends the Schwatka the Franklins, the Dr. Kanes, the Livingstone the Stanleys, the De Longs, the Amblers, th Collinses, who do honor to the human rac More now than ever before there are gian among men, great throngs of men still conque ing fatigue and hunger and physical woe th they may present the round earth to the cause geographical discovery. We have found out last how the world is bounded—on the North, the South, on the East, and on the West by th courage of man and the goodness of God. It not more weighty, such explorers' discovery the features of the globe, than what they discov of the capacity of man when he sets out f great enterprises. The influence of such e ample is most salutary.

We want more men of that kind to work t reforms of State and Church, endurance th cannot be frozen out by the world's frigidit What is detaining the Church of God in o days is its namby-pamby membership. V have plenty of Christians in the vineyard rea to sit down and eat grapes, to push out into the cold. Yet God is fitti out expeditions on all sides, and men and wom are wanted who care little for their own comf and everything for what they can do for othe Frederick Oberlin commanded such an expe tion, Florence Nightingale another, Alexanc Duff another, John Howard another, Bish Asbury another.

BUT FEW DE LONGS

If you cannot command an expedition you c join one. The day will arrive when all the gr Christian expeditions shall come back in t presence of many worlds, not only the lead but the led, not only the commanders but t commanded, not only the celebrated but the scure shall get celestial and divine recognitio

As Christ introduces His friends, and t question is asked, "Who are these Thou int ducest into our imperial company?" Christ v say: "This is the woman that gave a cup cold water to the thirsty traveller. This is t child that read the Scriptures to her bli mother. This is the nurse that rocked the s child's cradle. This is the female clerk of t store who patiently endured the insolence customers. This is the mother who brought her children for God. This is the man who forsook not his religion amid the ridicule of the hat factory. This is the fireman who fell dead in trying to get a child out of the third story of a burning building. This is the machinist or the coal-heaver or the fireman of the sunken Jeannette who, kneeling in the Arctic storm, prayed that their sins might be made whiter than snow." And then Christ, waving His hand over a great multitude that no man can number, will say, "They were cold, they were sick, they were poor, they were despised, they were wronged, they came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the lamb."

That day will be the rectification of everything, and those who expected to take back seats in heaven will be called to take front seats, and those who would have been satisfied to occupy a footstool will be awarded a throne, and those who had no ambition except to get inside the shining gates will be made rulers over many cities.

III. Another success of this polar expedition is in the fact that it has persuaded the whole world that it is now in that direction. It is a great thing for the world to know when it has struck the impossible. Never until now has every reasonable and enterprising man been willing to call a halt. All down through the days of Cabot and John Franklin and Dr. Kane and Nordenskjöld and Schwatka the world has thought that there was an important passage to be discovered and great things to be won for geography, but the impression has come upon the most hopeful of us that God does not mean the race to move any further that way. If there were fifty north-west passages of what use would they be to the world if only one ship out of a hundred could reach one of them?

TIME TO STOP PUSHING

Beside that the whole demand for a north-west passage has changed from the fact that this continent has been cut through three times—by the Union Pacific, the Southern Pacific, and Northern Pacific railroads, and what is the use of going so far around when we can go straight through? Beside that, it is demonstrated that there is nothing there more valuable than frozen islands, and that the only crop yielded is ice, sheaves of ice, stacks of ice, harvests of ice to fill garners of ice.

This De Long expedition has proved that God does not want the world to be occupied any further up that way. By the solemn emphasis of this polar disaster, He says: "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." Without this last expedition the world would not have been satisfied.

Let neither private munificence nor governmental authority pay another dollar or allow another life to be lost in Arctic expedition, except it be relief enterprises like that now being fitted out. God has bolted and barred that gate and written on it, "No admittance." Let not our foot attempt to pass it, for there are too many pacing up and down to make it safe for us to attempt to break through. God has some reservations. The Bible says that He keeps something even from the angels, and is it strange that He should keep something away from the human race? There must be paths where Jehovah can walk alone and without being questioned by human impertinence. De Long and his men have made for us most important discovery, for they have found for us the limits of useful exposure.

If Columbus was to be honored for finding the shore of this continent, let these dead men have an imperishable monument for the fact that they have, with their suffering predecessors, found the shore of the divine secret. It is a great thing to have seen for themselves and for all ages the burnished barriers of the Omnipotent, and to have just looked through the crystal pickets of the fence marked "No thoroughfare." Blessed are those men and those nations who are wise enough to know that there is a limitation to human thought and to human courage, and that at the highest latitude ever reached by ship's prow or reindeer sled is the white altar on which the human race must kneel in humble defeat, crying with Job, "He stretcheth out the North over the empty place."

IV. Another great success of this polar expedition has been the demonstrating to the world, more powerfully than ever before, that our departed friends, however far off and however long gone out of life, are as much as before, and this by divine and unmistakable intuition. Why this funeral march half round the earth, from Siberia to Russia, from Russia to Germany, from Germany to America, and one of them here to take steamer for Liverpool, keeping up the march of death for at least two weeks more? Why not let their bodies sleep where they fell? Neither private nor governmental largess can build so high or so brilliant or so vast a monumental shaft for those men as those uplifted splendors around the North Pole. No such sarcophagus as those of the eternal congealment, no such American or European cathedrals for pillar and dome and altar and lights as those St. Marks, those St. Pauls, those Holy Trinities of collonaded and arched and transepted and chancelled and chandeliered architecture of the icy dominions. Lieutenant Chipp and his men, who were never found, are resting in Westminster abbeys of splendor far beyond London's acropolis. No. The forty reindeer must be harnessed to the sixteen sleds, and through the atmosphere 69 degrees Farenheit the dead are brought to Yakutsk, then 2000 miles further to Irkutsk, then on to Moscow, then to Berlin and Hamburg, where wreaths are showered and bells rung in honor of these bodies coming home. Two men in our time were found mean enough to shoot a president, but I do not believe in all the land there is a man mean enough to criticise the expense of this

LONG MORTUARY TRAVEL.

Every man says that is right. Bring them back to their own land, and, as far as possible, put them beside their own kindred, so that when they rouse in the great day of the awakening, which shall be to all graveyards and cemeteries, they may come hand in hand with those who were rocked in the same cradle and sheltered in the same mother's arms.

An instinct planted in all hearts must have been divinely planted and for some useful purpose. The divine lesson is that the dead are ours. Five years, fifty years make no difference. Write it on the cemetery gate and chisel it on the stone and embalm it in the heart. Ours. Never did God, since the day when He hung the world upon nothing give such magnificent demonstration of that truth as by these 8000 miles of obsequies, all nations with uncovered head bidding God-speed to the silent procession.

Some people recklessly say they do not care what becomes of their bodies after they leave this life. I care very much. I want to lie down in the midst of my kindred. The same springtime that puts bloom on their graves I must have put bloom on my grave, and though we go there one by one, one by one, and years pass between this arrival and that arrival in the still country, I want us all to get up together and substitute for the last kiss of earthly heartbreak the good-morning kiss of resurrection reunion. We must come out of the gates side by side.

Yes, yes. Give De Long back to the widowed soul. Let Collins go to the arms of his brothers now waiting. Take Dr. Ambler back to his beloved Virginia, and Boyd to the Philadelphians waiting for him. Let dust seek kindred dust. And if any are not claimed, let the United States Government be mother to the homeless dead, and at the naval cemetery in Annapolis point to these as to others already garnered, saying, "These are my jewels." Do not say, "Why all this waste of human life?" There has been no waste. If all these explorers had lived a hundred years at home they could not have given to the world such an irresistible lesson as now of the triumphant and world-electrifying fact that the dead are ours.

As we close up this volume of thrilling crystallography, let us rejoice that another volume of

has ended. Volume after volume of pain and struggle added to the long shelf. Story of architects who fell from the scaffold of great buildings they were constucting. Story of chemists whose eyesight was blasted while making important experiments. Story of men who by sword or pen or ship's compass or trowel or hammer or spade or plough or needle or kind word achieved liberty for others. Volumes of suffering filling up nine tenths of the world's library. Volumes illustrated with vignettes and plates of martyr's stake and perishing Arctic expeditions. Pages printed in blue and black and red ink, blue for the bruises, black for the infamy, and red for the carnage. While overtopping and outmeasuring all other volumes in importance is the ice-journal of and sufferers who sailed into the Arctic repulsions of this world that He might open passage for all the race to sail through, yet frozen of the world's neglects, and flung dead in the exploration. The first picture of that ice-journal a disagreeable manger, and the last picture an agonizing cross. God hasten the day when all the volumes of the world's suffering shall be ended and a new library be opened, all its shelves filled with stories of escape and jubilee and scrolls of new songs unto Him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood and made us kings and priests unto God forever.

THE OCCUPATIONS, ETC.

A new pamphlet of Dr. Talmage's Sermons, under the above title, is now ready. Among the twenty-six sermons it contains, are those to Lawyers, Doctors, Merchants, Clerks, Commercial Travellers, The Theatrical Profession, and Telegraph Operators. Also Sermons on Business Life, The East Wind, Silver Wings, The Pouting Son, The Ferry-boat of the Jordan, etc. It may be obtained, postage paid, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office for thirty cents.

The Urgent Need of Concerted Action between the Legislatures of all the States in the matter of marriage and divorce has received confirmation in the message of Governor Bowen, of Rhode Island. After drawing the attention of the Legislature to the bad eminence attained by the State for its numerous divorces, he said: "In 1882 there was one divorce to every nine hundred and seventeen marriages, and when we consider that probably one third of our population are adherents of the Roman Catholic Church (in which divorces are not recognized for any cause), the proportion of divorces becomes absolutely startling. For the ten years ending December 31st, 1882, there were two thousand eight hundred and twenty-four applications for divorce in the State, of which two thousand two hundred and one were granted. The large majority of these divorces were granted without opposition, and therefore, upon ex parte depositions, which are practically only such depositions of interested parties as would make a prima facie case. About one fifth of the applications allege adultery as a cause for divorce, and yet I am informed by the attorney-general that no prosecution for adultery was ever known to him based on evidence brought out in a divorce case. In fact, a divorce for this cause would be granted upon evidence that would not warrant for a moment the holding of a person upon a criminal charge." It appears that the statistics do not indicate a low state of immorality in Rhode Island. Many of the applicants are citizens of other States, who go there to bring suit because divorces are more easily obtained there than elsewhere.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Safe on the Rock to the Last.—The Rev. Mr. Brown said at a recent meeting: "At the deathbed of an old Christian friend, whose life had been devoted to the service of God, I inquired, 'Are you safe on the rock Christ Jesus?' 'Ah, yes, I have trusted Christ all along, and He never yet failed me, nor will He fail me now.' There was no exuberant joy, but a quiet trust in the holy promises of God, that He, for His Son Jesus' sake, would not forsake those who trusted in Him during prosperity, when the darkness of death began to cover their eyes. Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Lost for Want of a Bright Light.—Mr. Sloan says: "Some years ago a steamer was coming up the Firth of Clyde on a stormy night. Careful watch was kept, and all was going well, till suddenly a dim, flickering light appeared right over her bows. In another instant the steamer went crashing into a ship which was lying at anchor. Several lives were lost, and much damage done. What was the cause of the accident? The anchored ship had allowed her light to grow dim from want of oil. It was only neglected. This is like what many Christians do; they forget to read the Word, to meditate upon it, and to watch with prayer, therefore their light is almost out, to the injury of themselves and others. 'Watch and pray.'"

A Jewish Missionary's Experience.—Mr. Mathews relates: "Seventeen years ago I started as a missionary to the Jews in Spitalfields. I have come out in the morning with a good coat on my back and a new hat on my head, and returned home with my coat torn, my hat smashed, and my face spit upon. These days have passed away, we hope, never to return. We have stood our ground, and now our missionaries are free to come and go as they please. For eighteen months after my conversion my wife lived separate from me, because she considered I had become an apostate, and had forsaken the living and true God. As a true Jewess she was bound to leave me; but I thank the Lord that she had her heart changed so that she now loves and serves Jesus Christ as her Saviour."

Daft Davie's Smart Appearance.—"At a meeting held in a northern town several persons were brought to the Lord, and found peace for their souls. One of them was a half-witted fellow who had a rather untidy appearance. Davie, after his conversion, thought it unbecoming in a Christian to be dirty, so he scrupulously washed his body and cleaned his clothing. On the next Sabbath, while on his way to the church, the minister met him going to church, and greeted the lad with, 'You're fine to-day, Davie!' 'Aye, sir, He was fine Hissel' the mornin' He rose frae the dead.' The poor imbecile lad showed to all that he was truly converted, and was able to give a reason for the hope that was in him, for by the change in his outward appearance those who knew him in former times were moved to inquire into the cause, so that his light was shining and glorifying God."

A Ship Captain's Dying Cry.—Major Colquhoun said: "Some few of us know a gentleman who is now a rich shipowner, but for more than forty years he sailed the seas, taking all chances of wind and weather. When a poor Newfoundland boy he went to sea, and rose step by step to the position he now holds in our city. He tells us that just as he kept the commandments of God he succeeded. If he neglected prayer and broke the law of God he always suffered for doing so. He had six brothers, all sea captains, and sometimes he tells of the death of one brother, who, before he was out of his teens, commanded a fine ship and sailed her for years. One dark, stormy night the ship was driven on the rocks not far from his mother's house, and all hands were drowned except the mate, who was saved by being washed ashore. When the mate recovered he peered into the darkness, hoping to see his ship, but could not; he only heard his young captain's voice crying to God for mercy. Sadly he turned toward the captain's house. When the mother saw him, her heart sank, and she cried, 'What has become of my son?' With a sorrowful mien he replied, 'He's gone.' 'Did he send me no message?' 'No, there was no time; the last words I heard him say as I stood on the rocks were, "God have mercy on my soul."' Turn to the Lord Jesus now, do not wait till death stares in your face, but cry for pardon now, and the promise is yours."

A Gambling-House Employe Saved.—Mr. Newal, who does good work for Christ in France, said: "We noticed a man and his wife coming into our hall very often. On inquiry we learned that the man was employed in a gambling-house. Our missionary got their address and called upon the little family, and spoke to and prayed with the wife, who was soon converted to Christ. One day the wife said to the missionary, 'Oh, sir, if only my husband was converted how happy we would be!' 'If you believe that God will answer our prayers I will pray with you for his conversion.' 'Yes, I do believe,' she answered. They prayed together, pleading that God would open his eyes and his heart to see and admit Jesus. When the husband came home, he said, 'I have had a very strange feeling to-day. I almost think it is what those Protestants call conversion. I must give up my employment and trust to God for food.' 'At what hour did you experience this strange sensation?' I asked. It was the very moment we were kneeling in prayer for his conversion."

Weeping at a Sermon on Heaven.—Mr. Deware related: "An aged couple in America had one son. They were earnest, devout Christians, but their boy was a fast young man; yet he could listen with interest and even rapture to a good sermon. He went with his parents to hear one on 'Heaven,' and enjoyed the address very much. When the speaker had finished, with a fervent appeal to his hearers to prepare for spending eternity, the young man looked into his parents' faces expecting to see them glowing with happiness, but he saw them shedding tears of deep, heartfelt sorrow. Surprised, he said, 'Why, father, mother, what makes you cry? the sermon was on "Heaven," and though I've little chance of ever being there, you are certain to enjoy that glorious place.' 'That's just it,' was the affectionate answer; 'we know that we shall be there through faith in Christ's finished work for our salvation; but our only son, where will he be?' This reply was the means used by the Holy Spirit to reach the youth's heart, and resulted in his becoming a Christian. It was the answer of fainting, doubting hearts, yet the Lord used it to pierce his soul, and He gave power to the youth to stand firm in the faith. 'Be not faithless but believing.'"

A Family of Jews Converted.—Mr. Aaron Mathews, the devoted missionary to Jews, said: "I will relate a case of a Jewish family being brought to the Lord Jesus through the instrumentality of one of our missionaries. I was in Jersey lately, where I met a converted Jewish family. The head of the family asked me to visit on my return to London a Jew named Mr. W. I asked, 'Why should I visit him?' and elicited the following reply. He said: 'I had occasion to visit Covent Garden Market on business, and met Mr. W. there. He invited me to take a glass of wine, but I declined, saying, "I am now a Christian, and ever since I became one I have never crossed the door of a liquor-saloon."' Mr. W. began to abuse my friend, stating that it was for mercenary purposes that he had changed his faith, though the Jew who does so is foolish, because a converted man must not tell lies. Now, lying is a very convenient thing in business, so that an unconverted Jew has a much better chance than a Christian Jew. My Jersey friend, in concluding, pressed me to visit Mr. W., but I remarked, 'Why delay? I'll send word to another missionary, and he will gladly call.' This was done and the Lord blessed our brother's efforts, and Mr. W. and his family are now rejoicing in the Saviour. To dispose of the fiction that we bribe Jews to be converts, I may tell you that Mr. W. sent us £5 for distribution among the poor, and gave the missionary a fine gold watch as a token of his gratitude."

THE SEVEN APOCALYPTIC CYCLES

By J. Alexis Edgren, D.D.*

Professor of Biblical Literature in the Theological Seminary, Morgan Park, Ill.

The Seven Representative Churches—The Opening of the Seals—The Trumpets—The Persecuting Era—A Missionary Period—The Seven Vials—Destruction of Antichrist and the Millennium.

THE Apocalypse probably covers the whole period of world-history from the apostolic age to the end. In structure it is repeating and progressive. Six times it goes over the same or part of the same period, ending in the coming of Christ and the glory which is to follow. At every repetition it brings out some new feature of this pre-millennial period, until prophecy about it is nearly complete; and then, in the seventh cycle, it sweeps on through the millennial Sabbath and into eternity.

Thus we have first of all the letters to THE SEVEN CHURCHES of Asia. Why are these seven selected, and not all the churches of the district? Evidently because seven is the sacred number of completion, and because just these seven furnished a typical representation of professed Christianity during the whole pre-millennial age. The conditions, tendencies and dangers of these seven churches would always recur, throughout the age, and the warnings, encouragements and promises given them would constantly be needed.

Possibly also the seven, in the order in which they are placed in the prophecy, point to successive predominant conditions within professed Christianity during the present world-age. This seems very probable from the description of the several churches. Ephesus, the church of the first love, but declining, well represents the close of the apostolic age and some time after it. Smyrna, the church faithful in trial, the represents the period of the heathen persecutions. Pergamus, the church faithful in confession of essential truth, but tolerating those in its membership who taught an unholy alliance with heathenism and the world, represents the period of such men as Athanasius, Jerome, Augustin and Chrysostom, and also the period of the formation of a persecuting State church and the introduction into it of heathen customs, saint and relic worship, from the early part of the fourth to the beginning of the eighth century.

Thyatira, the church of works and love and service, but also of fornication, represents the succeeding period to the Reformation, with its zealous missionary operations in Britain, northern, central and eastern Europe, but also with its unholy union of church and State, and its heathenish image worship, etc., perfected and with its scholasticism and mysticism.

Sardis, the church having a name that it lives but is dead, yet in part declining and ready to die, and having a few names, of God called worthy, and promised a portion with him, fitly represents the period of Protestant and Reformed State churches, almost entirely dead although, in distinction from Catholicism, they have a name that they live. To this period belong a few worthy names, and in part these churches have been spiritually revived through the great awakenings of the last two centuries.

Philadelphia, the church of faithful and loving activity for God, which shall be kept from the hour of trial, which is to come upon all the world, and is so emphatically reminded of the speedy coming of the Lord, represents the wondrous period of loving and aggressive missionary work, in the midst of which we live, the period of mission societies, Bible societies, Sunday-schools and all the various blessed activities for God. This period began with our century, or a little before. It seems to be synchronous with the "angel flying in mid-heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and tribe and tongue and people" (Rev. 14 : 6).

Laodicea, melancholy Laodicea, the church of lukewarmness, and riches, and self-content, though spiritually wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked, represents the period to follow the predominantly genuine mission age and to precede the coming of the Lord. It coincides with the parable of the ten virgins and with the time of the last antichristian dangers, and will probably be very short, for it embraces the days that shall be shortened for the elect's sake.

Now, since these periods do not have sharply defined limits, but blend into one another, we may, and indeed must in the present period, see those elements forming, which shall bring about the Laodicean condition, the final goal of the worldly tendencies in evangelical churches. Be on thy guard, Philadelphian, lest thou lose thy Christian humility, love, spirituality and true consecration to God. For, remember, there will be a Philadelphian element running through the Laodicean age. To Philadelphia is the promise, that it shall be kept from the hour of trial which is to come upon all the world.

Then begins

of the prophecy, the opening of the seven seals. In the first six we go over the same period as before, but viewed in a different aspect. It continues throughout the period, but with it also war, and dearth, and pestilence, and distress, and martyrdom, as symbolized under the following seals up to the sixth. Under it we have the gloom and terror of the impending great day of the wrath of God. In the seventh chapter follows a sealing of a symbolically complete number of the servants of God, whereupon a heaven-scene opens to view, and we see the saved from all nations, and kindreds, and tongues standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed in white robes, with palms in their hands, and loudly praising God. This is a glimpse of the heaven side of the millennial glory.

After a significant silence in heaven follows

of prophetic visions, going over again the pre-millennial world-age, and bringing out more particularly some of its great leading events. On account of many and striking coincidences with history we think the first four trumpets symbolically set forth the overthrow of the Western Roman Empire by the ravages of Goths, Vandals and Huns, and by the abolishing of the name and office of Roman Emperor in the West by Odoacer ; while the fifth and sixth likewise set forth the overthrow of the Eastern Empire by the Saracens and Turks.*

This mighty movement of overwhelming barbarian and Mohammedan forces, by which the civilizations of Europe and historical Asia and Africa were deeply affected, the life of the church seriously threatened, and nominal Christianity keenly afflicted, is a theme grand enough for a place in prophecy. Then follows in the tenth chapter, we think, an allusion to the Reformation. The little book, the Bible, closed by the Catholic Church, is opened again to the world. Next in order is the end. Then time, pre-millennial time with its opportunities and struggles will be no more. Hence prophecy passes on to the witnesses who are to be killed by Antichrist, but rise again, and ascend to heaven in a cloud—a glimpse of the first resurrection. This prophecy may have an initial fulfilment in a line of witnesses through the period of State church oppression, and a final in two special witnesses in the very last days. In one of these we may meet again with Elijah.

* [Dr. Edgren refers here to the year-day fulfilment. There will also be a literal-day fulfilment.—ED.]

In the twelfth chapter we come to beginning with a representation of the living church of God, under the figure of a virtuous woman. Of her Christ was born after the flesh. The devil attempted to destroy Him, but failed. Then he fearfully persecuted the church, which through the providence of God, found a place of refuge in the wilderness. In the thirteenth chapter is a symbolic representation of the world-power, antichristian in heart and persecuting the saints of God, and having at its side a sacerdotal power, a deceiving priesthood, performing lying wonders and oppressing those who do not obey its will. The first fulfilment of this prophecy, we believe, is to be found in the world-powers under influence of a nominally Christian priesthood, especially, though not exclusively, the Roman Catholic. But it has, no doubt, also another fulfilment in a last personal Antichrist and his false prophet. It therefore points to antichristianity in the world, of which Catholicism in its political and priestly aspect is a preparatory form, essentially antichristian in spirit and works, but not in fulness of development. It is, perhaps, the apostasia, the falling away (II Thess. 2 : 3).

After it comes the Antichrist, the man of sin and son of perdition, in and with whom is the climax of sin, the absolute denial of the Father and the Son, and perfect self-deification, working with all the power of Satanic hatred, deceit and unrighteousness. Toward this goal the materialistic atheism of our day strongly tends. Then follows again a scene of the redeemed with the Lamb, singing a new song before the throne —a millennial scene.

The latter part of the fourteenth chapter and the fifteenth contains in which we have the prophecy of a great missionary movement, the preaching of the Gospel to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people ; the declaration of the fall of the mystical Babylon ; warnings against the beast and his worship, with allusion to serious times for the children of God in the world, and finally a heaven-scene, in which those who have gained victory over the beast sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb, and foretell that all nations shall come and worship before God, because His judgments are made manifest. It opens to view the millennium.

Now comes

going over more fully the judgments alluded to in the former. Thus in the sixteenth chapter seven angels pour out seven vials of wrath upon the antichristian world, and the kings, deceived by spirits of devils, gather themselves to the battle of that great day of God Almighty, and the judgment on Babylon. In the seventeenth chapter the beast appears again, bearing upon his back a lewd woman, drunken with the blood of the saints, and having upon her forehead written : "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." The symbolism and the explanation so plainly points to the Roman Catholic Church that we cannot mistake in our interpretation here. It is that church, unfaithful in covenant relation with God, borne up by the political world-power, guilty of the blood of a great host of martyrs, abominable in doctrines and practices, and mother of other dead and persecuting churches, if not so bad, yet largely of the same spirit that we see here. And her doom is announced in the same and the following chapter. The horns of the very beast upon which she has been seated shall destroy her, and she shall be cast as a millstone into the sea, and be found no more at all. That is according to the inspired explanation ; the worldly kings, who lend their power to the last form of antichristianity, shall hate and destroy that church which before was upheld by the world-power of which they are representatives.

Who shall say that this prophecy has not already begun to receive its fulfilment ? When Victor Emmanuel, in 1870, set up his throne in Rome, despising the pope's bull, then papacy received a fatal deathblow as to its political power, and it was not long after, when the pope, who just before this significant event had with great pomp declared himself infallible, was heard complaining that not one government in Europe upheld him.

It is remarkable that this happened just about 1260 years after the time when the wicked Emperor Phocas really established the papacy by constituting the Bishop of Rome the head of all the churches by his decree of 607 and his aid until death, 610. This is the period (42 months —1260 days, or years on the year-day scale, as in Dan. 9), predicted in Rev. 13, as the time during which the first beast exercises his blasphemous and oppressive power. But, if this beast is the antichristian political power, then the 42 months is the period of that power under influence of the papal priesthood, i.e., aided by the second beast with lamb's horns. It is the period of politico-papal reign. This period, like that of the Babylonish captivity, evidently has two or more beginnings, termini a quo and corresponding endings, termini ad quem. Of such termini the following are conspicuous : Justinian's decree, constituting the Bishop of Rome head of all the churches 533, and the death of Phocas 610. To the first corresponds the year of the reign of terror in the French Revolution, a fearful deathblow to papacy ; to the second the overthrow of the papal political power by Victor Emmanuel.

The last concentrated form of antichristianity will be the beast himself, who will lead the kings to battle in the great day of the Lord. Already, in the words of materialistic leaders, the power which will carry him to the supreme elevation may be recognized. They cry, "Away with God, this mere shadow of ourselves ; nature, aye, man himself is God, there is no other." Remember the worship of that woman in Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris, during the Revolution ! Remember the conclusions of the Positive Philosophy ; man is to be worshipped ! Look at the socialistic movements of our day ! Fearful symptoms these ! Who can tell what terrible forms of evil may yet come out of them ? We have seen the incredible barbarities of civilized atheism already. Let us not imagine that the scenes of the French Revolution cannot be repeated, and that on a far larger scale ! In the present infidel movement in the world there are many antichristian leaders. At last it will, in all probability, bring forth a personal Antichrist, in whom is concentrated all the wickedness of preceding antichristianity, who is representatively and pre-eminently the beast in his last form, the man of sin, the son of perdition, who will have sway literally 42 months, three years and a half, and who will meet his doom at the hands of Christ at His coming. Before this last judgment of Antichrist, in which antichristianity, wherever it exists, will be reached and punished, we have a scene of much people in heaven praising God for His righteous judgment, and of the marriage of the Lamb, thus connecting itself with the first resurrection and the opening up of the heavenside of the millennium.

Then comes

including the final judgment on Antichrist, the binding of Satan, the millennium, the final judgment on Satan and on the wicked before the great white throne, and then a glorious symbolic description of the eternal heavenly abode and state of the righteous.

Thus the Revelation of John sets forth Christ's double coming, and gives us to understand, that until His return to the earth, there will be fearful struggles with evil, although the Gospel shall be preached to all nations, and the fulness of the Gentiles be gathered in. After his manifestation to destroy Antichrist, will come the golden age foretold for this world—and then, after the last shock of the final judgment, the absolute glory of heaven.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The National Convention of the Democratic party for the nomination of candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency is to be held in Chicago on July 8th. St. Louis, Saratoga, and Louisville contended for the honor, but Chicago was ahead on the first ballot, and was finally selected. The call for the convention concludes as follows: "Each State is entitled to a representation therein equal to double the number of its Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States. The Democrats of each organized Territory and the District of Columbia are invited to send two delegates, subject to the decision of the Convention as to their admission. All Democratic conservative citizens of the United States, irrespective of past political associations and differences, who can unite with us in the effort for pure, economical, and constitutional government, are cordially invited to join in sending delegates to the Convention."

The Resolution of the House of Representatives expressing sympathy at the death of Herr Lasker, who died in New York on January 3d, has been returned by Prince Bismarck. The House directed that a copy of its resolution should be sent to our minister to Germany, with instructions to communicate it through the legitimate channel to the presiding officer of the legislative body of which Dr. Lasker was a member. Mr. Sargent sent it through the German Foreign Office, but Bismarck would not allow it to be presented to the Reichstag. One of the clauses of the resolution ran thus: "His loss is not alone to be mourned by the people of his native land, where his firm and constant exposition of and devotion to free and liberal ideas have materially advanced the social, political and economic condition of those peoples, but by the lovers of liberty throughout the world." As Lasker had been one of Bismarck's most persistent opponents he did not approve of the eulogium, and has sent back the resolution with a polite note intimating that his thirty years' experience in the public affairs of Germany justified him in holding an opinion differing from that of the House, expressed in the resolution. The House formed a perfectly correct estimate of Dr. Lasker's labors, but it did not act courteously or prudently in sending its resolution. In future it will probably refrain from officiously meddling with the internal affairs of other countries.

The Tariff Bill Passed by the Forty-Seventh Congress proves, as evidence accumulates, to have effected a smaller reduction than was supposed. Every new fact disclosed indicates that its reductions were apparent rather than real. The following figures, taken from the report of the New York Times, respecting the statement furnished to the Ways and Means Committee by the Bureau of Statistics, last week, are specimens of the relief afforded. Six principal classes of goods were reported on. Of these four showed an actual advance in the average rate of duty paid for the first six months of the operation of the "reduced" tariff. They were glass and glassware, woollen goods, cotton goods, and earthen, stone, and pottery ware. On each of these there was also a falling off of imports amounting in the aggregate to $1,374,491. It is evident, also, that the depression was not the result of the bill. On two classes of goods there was a decrease in the average duty. One was sugars, on which the duty was cut down 2.77 per cent, and the imports increased by $2,368,860. The other was iron and steel, on which the average duty was lessened 2.71 per cent, while the imports were reduced by $8,804,709.

The Senate of Iowa Passed a Stringent amendment, on February 20th, to the prohibitory measure now passing through the Legislature of that State. It provides that "no person shall manufacture for sale or sell or keep for sale as a beverage any intoxicating liquors whatever, including ale, wine, and beer, and the same provisions and penalties of law now in force relating to intoxicating liquors shall in like manner be construed to apply to violations of this act and to the manufacture or sale, or keeping for sale, or keeping with intent to sell, or keeping or establishing a place for the sale of ale, wine, and beer, and all other intoxicating liquors whatever." The penalties range from $20 to $1000 fine and imprisonment. The House commenced its debate on the temperance question on Friday.

The Command of the Expedition for the Relief of Lieutenant Greely has, it is now announced, been given to Commander William S. Schley, who is making arrangements for the early despatch of the expedition. The Bear and the Thetis, the two vessels purchased for the voyage, are being strengthened and prepared for their perilous undertaking. Some changes in the original plan have been rendered necessary by an agreeable episode. The British Government has presented to the United States a fully equipped ship suitable for the expedition. Secretary Frelinghuysen last week reported to the President that in searching for vessels adapted to Arctic voyaging, attention had been directed to the Alert, a ship belonging to the British Government, and Mr. Lowell was instructed to ascertain if it could be purchased. The British admiralty responded by offering the Alert as a present to the United States. The Alert is a steam vessel, which was specially fitted out for Arctic explorations by the British Government. She was the advance ship of the Nares expedition of 1875. She is much larger than either the Thetis or the Bear, the vessels purchased for the Greely expedition, and will carry about as many men as the two combined. On account of her size she will be used as a supply ship, and will follow in the wake of the other vessels, so as to be of service in case of need. The British Government in tendering the vessel observe that they have not forgotten the considerate conduct of the United States in the matter of the Resolute, a British ship which was abandoned by her crew, but was saved and brought home by American seamen, and bought and returned to Great Britain by the United States Government. This graceful recognition of past kindness will be appreciated by America.

The Suffering from the Ohio Floods Still Continues, although the waters have subsided in the majority of the afflicted cities. In some places the people are entirely dependent on government relief and private charity, there being no food to be bought, even by those who have money. Within a space of fifty miles from Evansville, Ind., fully one half the buildings have been swept away, and seventy thousand bushels of corn have been lost. At Point Pleasant, W. Va., the people at the close of last week were still on the mountains, dependent for blankets and food on the supplies sent by government and adjacent towns. The rivers fall slowly, and as they subside the full extent of the desolation becomes apparent. It is more serious than was at first supposed. In Cincinnati the floods have so injured the buildings that several of those four stories high fell last week, and others will have to come down. It is most gratifying to notice how prompt and liberal is the assistance rendered from all quarters; the South, especially, being prominent in the good work. Little towns, comparatively poor, contributing $5000 besides clothing.

A Destructive Cyclone Ravaged Six Southern States on February 19th. Reports of its devastation come from Georgia, Alabama, North and South Carolina, Louisiana, and Kentucky. A lengthy despatch from Macon, Ga., describes the appearance of the storm in that locality. About five o'clock the sky, which had assumed a threatening appearance, was irradiated with a remarkable electric display, and then the storm burst, wind, rain, and hail striking the city at all points. A path twenty miles wide was cut by the tornado, and it left in its track the ruins of dwelling houses, public buildings, and uprooted trees. Its full force was not experienced at Macon, but Jones, Wilkinson, Hancock, and Washington counties all suffered severely. The deaths reported numbered twelve, and many persons were seriously, if not fatally, injured. From Raleigh, N. C., twenty-three deaths are announced, and eighteen suffered injuries from which they cannot recover, while in South Carolina ninety persons were killed and one hundred injured. Birmingham, Ala., New Orleans, La., Charleston, S. C., and Louisville, Ky., all suffered heavily in property, no storm so destructive having been known since 1878. All reports agree as to the suddenness of its approach, and that it was of very brief duration.

The High License Law Passed by the Legislature of Illinois has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of that State. This law will apply to Chicago as well as other cities, and the result will be watched with interest. The law was not opposed by any city beside Chicago, but there the saloon men resisted its charge of $150 for a beer license and $500 for a liquor license, and have tested the case before each tribunal up to the highest court. They opposed it on technical grounds, but have not been able to overthrow the law. The Chicago liquor-dealers will now have to pay as high rates as those outside that city have already done; and if the law is enforced in the metropolis of the State as faithfully as it has been in the rural districts, the gain to the cause of temperance will be marked. That is probably the nearest approach to temperance legislation there is any hope of effecting at present for Chicago.

"The Devil's Auction," a Notorious Play which has been performed in the theatres of many of our chief cities before crowded houses, cannot be presented at Schenectady, N. Y., the mayor having refused a permit. His decision has caused considerable surprise, the mayors of New York, Brooklyn, and other cities having raised no objection to the play, which is of the spectacular order. A very cogent reason for the mayor's action is, however, now given. "Mayor Young," says a telegraphic despatch, "has been converted, has joined the Church, and patronizes the Salvation Army."

The Large Bequests Left to Religious and charitable institutions by Miss Sarah Burr, of New York, will, it appears, reach the treasuries of those institutions in spite of the prolonged litigation, the surrogate having last week admitted the will to probate. The suit has been going on for nearly two years, an attempt being made to break the will on the ground that the decedent was of unsound mind. She lived to an advanced age and in a penurious style, although she was worth three millions of dollars. But Miss Burr had never been accustomed to any other method of life, and, as the surrogate pointed out in his decision, any radical change late in life would have shown mental incapacity more marked than any sought to be established by the contestants.

The New City Council of Salt Lake City qualified on February 20th. For thirty years Salt Lake City has been governed by a polygamous Council and officers. A new Council has now been elected under the Edmunds law. Alderman Raleigh, a Mormon bishop, boasted of having served ever since the city had had a Council. He said no act of his gave greater satisfaction than the one which disfranchised him, and he called upon the members of the new Council to enter into polygamy and gain disfranchisement. D. H. Wells protested against the election conducted by the Utah Commission, and said he would not give up his place in the Council if the newly elected members had not been Mormons. Raleigh and Wells have several wives each, and are prominent church officials. James Sharp, the new mayor, made a speech, indicating that he and all the new Council would obey instructions in defiance of law, and go into polygamy. Thus, while the city government is in the hands of supposed monogamists, it is influenced by the church and is rebellious to the law of the land.

A Veteran Missionary Died at New Haven on February 9th, deeply honored and regretted. Dr. S. Wells Williams, the author of "The Middle Kingdom," who during the past eight years has been Professor of Chinese in Yale College, has gone to his rest at the age of seventy-two. He went to Canton as a printer for the American Board of Foreign Missions in 1832. He rapidly learned the Chinese language, and shortly afterward acquired Japanese. He translated a portion of the Bible into the latter language. Many missionaries who have gone to China have derived material assistance from two other books he prepared and published, the "Chinese Tonic Dictionary" and "Easy Lessons in Chinese." Dr. Williams also issued "The Syllabic Dictionary of the Chinese Language," which was the most arduous, as it was the most useful, of his literary undertakings. He made occasional visits of brief duration to his home in this country, but did not leave China finally until 1876, when the presence of the Chinese students at Yale afforded him an opportunity for laboring in the United States on behalf of China. He had suffered during recent years from slight attacks of paralysis.

The Remains of Lieutenant De Long and his dead comrades of the Jeannette expedition arrived in New York on February 20th, from their long journey from the mouth of the Lena in Siberia. Lieutenant Harber, who was commissioned to disinter them from the grave where Engineer Melville buried them two years ago, arrived at the spot in March, 1883. He, assisted by Lieutenant William Schuetze, had the ten bodies placed in coffins sent from New York for the purpose, and then, I travelling night and day, transported them across the Siberian wastes three thousand miles to Yakutsk, whence they went to St. Petersburg, and thence to Hamburg, where they were put on board the Frisia to be conveyed to New York. Last Friday a public reception of a most imposing character was tendered to the remains, and they were carried in procession, escorted by soldiers, sailors, and deputations from the government departments and scientific societies, to Brooklyn, where they lay in state in the equipment building of the Navy Yard. Thousands of people lined the whole route of the procession, and intense interest was manifested in the melancholy proceedings. Lieutenant Danenhower, Engineer Melville, and the other survivors of the expedition followed the bodies of their ten comrades. An empty hearse and pall was also included in the procession, in memory of Lieutenant Chipp and his eight comrades, whose bodies have not been recovered. It is supposed they were drowned in the Lena on the night of the storm, which separated the boats, in which the crew of the Jeannette took refuge after the ship went down. On Saturday seven of the bodies were buried at Woodlawn Cemetery, the corpse of Jerome Collins was placed on board a steamer for conveyance to Ireland, where he was born, that of Surgeon Ambler was sent to Virginia, and that of Fireman Boyd to Philadelphia. Assistant-Bishop Potter preached an appropriate sermon at the obsequies.

The Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State, in session at Buffalo, listened, on February 21st, to the report of the State committee, which showed that the total number of associations in the State is ninety-five, with a total membership of 17,073. Thirteen of these associations own buildings valued at $829,900. Four others own real estate, eighteen have building funds, and many of them have libraries. The total value of the association property in the State is estimated at $1,566,685, a net increase in 1883 of $342,870. The report stated that the State work was being done by the secretary and assistant secretary, and added that $5000 was wanted to continue this work. At the conclusion of the next morning's address the matter of raising this money was taken up, and the associations represented subscribed sums of from $250 to $5 each. A delegate announced $300 from Cornelius Vanderbilt. The total amount subscribed was $3700. At the afternoon session James McConaughy, Chairman of the College Committee, gave an account of the committee's work. He said that at Cornell University plans had been laid for work in a building on the college campus.

An Anti-Tobacco Pledge has been Adopted by the Cincinnati Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Eight ministers presented the following resolution to the Conference: "Resolved, That while we deem it proper to require young ministers just entering Conference to abstain from the use of tobacco and opium, in order to help them in this reform, consistency, justice, religion, and the Scripture, 'Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ,' demand that the older, yea, all, the members of the Conference do assume the same obligation, and to this pledge we invite the consideration and unanimous conformity of the Conference." The resolution was adopted by the Conference without dissent.

The Effects of Prohibition Legislation in Kansas are described by Rev. James A. Troutman, who has recently made a thorough investigation in that State. He sent inquiries into each of the eighty-one counties of the State, and has received replies giving a full report from sixty-six, including all the populous counties. These replies demonstrate three facts favorable to prohibition: First, that it has materially decreased the number of saloons. Second, that an unusually large per cent of the prosecutions under the law have resulted in convictions. Third, that the principle of prohibition is growing stronger. In the sixty-six counties heard from there were seven hundred and eight saloons prior to May 1st, 1881, the date that the prohibitory law took effect. There are now, in the same territory, three hundred and thirteen saloons. Prohibition, in less than two years, has closed three hundred and ninety-five saloons. During this time the population has increased twelve per cent. If the saloons had kept pace with the population, there would now be seven hundred and ninety-two saloons, so that in reality prohibition has prohibited four hundred and seventy-nine saloons in the territory named.

JOHN AND HEROD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly." —MARK 6: 20.

John the True King—The Nominal King—I. Hopeful Points in Herod's Character—Respect for Holiness—Admired John—Listened to Him—Obeyed Him—Conscience Affected—II. Flaws in His Character—Never Looked to John's Master—No Desire for Goodness—A Foxy Man—Did not Love God's Word—Disliked the Seventh Commandment—Under the Sway of Sin—III. What Became of Herod—Slew the Preacher—Mocked the Saviour—The Devil's Raw Material—An Infamous Name.

JOHN sought no honor among men. It was his delight to say concerning our Lord Jesus, "He must increase, but I must decrease." Yet, though John sought no honor of men, he had honor; for it is written, "Herod feared John." Herod was a great monarch, John was but a poor preacher whose garment and diet were of the coarsest kind; but "Herod feared John." John was more royal than royal Herod. His character made him the true king, and the nominal king trembled before him. A man is not to be estimated according to his rank, but according to his character. The peerage which God recognizes is arranged according to a man's justice and holiness. He is first before God and holy angels who is first in obedience; and he reigns and is made a king and a priest whom God hath sanctified and clothed with the fair white linen of a holy life. Be not covetous of worldly honors, for you will have honor enough even from wicked men if your lives are "holiness unto the Lord."

Let it be written on John's tomb, if he needs an epitaph, "Herod feared John." Only there is one better testimonial which any minister of the Gospel might be glad to receive, and it is this: "John did no miracle, but all things which he spake concerning this man were true." He wrought no marvellous work, which astonished his generation, but he spake of Jesus, and all that he said was true; God grant that our Master's servants may win such praise.

My subject at this time does not lead me to speak so much of John as of Herod. I desire to have no Herod in this congregation, but I am anxious about some of you lest you should be like him; therefore I will speak out of the tenderness of my heart with the desire that none of you may follow the steps of this evil king.

I. I would ask you to consider the hopeful points in

HEROD'S CHARACTER.

First, we find that Herod respected justice and holiness, for "Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy." I like to see in every man a respect for virtue even if he himself has it not, for it may be that the next step will be to desire it, and he that desires to be just is almost so. Some have brought their minds to such a pitch of sinfulness that they despise goodness, and ridicule justice and devotion. May God grant that we may never by any process be brought into such a fearful condition as that. When the conscience comes to be so confused as to lose its reverence for that which is good and holy, then is a man in a sad plight indeed. Herod was not in that condition: he honored justice, honesty, truth, courage, and purity of life. Though he had not these things himself, yet he had a salutary dread of them, which is a near approach to respect for them. I know I am speaking to a great many who respect everything that is good and right; they only wish they were good and right themselves. So far, so good.

The next good point I see in Herod was that he admired the man in whom he saw justice and righteousness, and that is a step further; for you may admire an abstract virtue, and yet when you see it actually embodied in a man you may hate him. The ancients recognized justice in Aristides, and yet some of them grew sick of hearing him called "the just." A man may be acknowledged to be just and holy, and for that very reason he may be dreaded. You like to see lions and tigers in the Zoological Gardens, but you would not like to see them in your own room; you would very much prefer to view them behind bars and within cages; and so very many have respect for religion, but religious people they cannot bear. They admire justice! How eloquently they speak of it, but they do not like to deal justly. They admire holiness! but if they come across a saint they persecute him. "Herod feared John," and tolerated John, and went the length of even keeping John for a while out of the hands of Herodias. Many of you like the company of God's people; in fact, you are out of your element when you get with the profane, you cannot endure them, and from those that practise debasing vices you fly at once. You delight in choice company. So far, so good; but that is not enough; we must go much further, or else we may remain like Herod after all.

A third good point about Herod was that

HE LISTENED TO JOHN.

It is nothing wonderful that you and I should listen to sermons; but it is rather wonderful that a king should do so, and such a king as Herod. Monarchs do not often care for religious discourses, except such as come from court preachers, who wear fine raiment, and use soft speech. John was not the kind of man for a king's palace—too rough, too blunt, too plain-speaking; his words thrust too much home; yet Herod heard him gladly. It was a hopeful point in his character that he would hear a man who preached justice, holiness, and the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." It is a fine point and a hopeful point in any man that he will hear and listen to an honest proclamation of God's Word, even though it come home to his conscience.

Perhaps I address some of you who hear the Gospel only now and then; and when you drop into a religious meeting you are like the dog in the library who would gladly have changed all the books for a single bone. There are many such people in London. Religion does not suit them; places of entertainment are much more to their minds. Some say of the preacher, "I won't hear him again, he cuts too closely; he is too personal." John said to Herod that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife; but, though he spoke so plainly, Herod listened to him, because "he was a just man and an holy." That was well of Herod, and it is well in you, my friend, if you are willing to hear the Gospel, however practically it is spoken. So far, so good.

But there was a better point still in Herod;

HE OBEYED THE WORD

to which he listened. Herod heard John gladly,, "And when he heard him he did many things." Many of our hearers do nothing; they hear, they hear, they hear, and that is the end of it. They learn the way, they know the way, they are expert in the way, but they do not follow the way. They hear the Gospel invitation, but they come not to the feast. Some seem to think that religious duty lies in hearing first, and talking afterward; but they are mistaken. Herod knew better than that. He was not a hearer only, he did do something, and it is remarkable that the text tells us that "he did many things." Perhaps these were some of the many things: he discharged a tax-gatherer who imposed upon the people, or righted the wrongs of a neglected widow, or altered a cruel law which he had promulgated, or changed his habits and manners in certain respects; certainly in many points he was an improved man, for John the Baptist had an influence with him for good, "For Herod feared John, and when he heard him he did many things."

I am speaking to some who, when they hear a sermon, put a part of it into practice, and they have done many things since they first attended here, for which we are very grateful. I have known a man become charmed with the Gospel, and he has given up his drunkenness, and his Sabbath-breaking, and he has tried, and succeeded, in a great measure, in leaving off profane language, and thus he has greatly improved. And yet, and yet he is only a Herod, after all; for Herod was Herod, after he had done many things; and, in his heart, he was still prepared for all sorts of wickedness. Yet he did amend somewhat, and so far, so good.

There was another point about Herod, namely, that he continued to hear the preacher gladly; for it is put into the end of the verse as if to indicate that he heard John still. John touched his conscience; but after all, he still

HEARD HIM GLADLY.

He said, "Send for John the Baptist again." Harry the Eighth would listen to Hugh Latimer though he denounced him to his face, and even sent him on his birthday a handkerchief, on which was marked the text, "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." Hal cried, "Let us hear honest Hugh Latimer." Even bad men admire those who tell them truth. However unwelcome the warning, they believe it to be honestly spoken, and therefore they respect the preacher. A good point this. You who are present and unconverted have heard most cutting sentences from me, you have heard of "judgment to come," and of that eternal wrath which rests upon those who die in their sins; let me warn you then, that if, after hearing the denunciations of God's Word, you are still willing to hear, I have great hopes of you. So far, so good.

There was yet one other point about Herod, and that is, through the preaching of John; for I am inclined to think that a certain translation, which renders the passage, "Herod did many things," in another way, may be a correct one, "Herod was perplexed," or, "Herod was made to hesitate." Such a sense is found in some manuscripts. He loved his sin, and he could see a "beauty of holiness" in religion, and he wished to be holy; but there was Herodias, and he could not give her up. When he heard a sermon, he was like a relative of his in after days, "almost persuaded," yet he did not give up his lust. He could not go the whole length John would have him go. He could not leave his bosom sin, and yet he felt as if he wished to leave it. There was a halting between two opinions, a hesitating, a wavering; he was inclined to good if he could have good and have his pleasure too; but his pleasure was so very much his master that he could not escape from it. He was like a bird taken with lime-twigs; he wanted to fly; but, sad to say, he was willingly held, limed by his lust.

This is the case with many of our hearers. Their consciences are not weaned from their sins; they cannot give them up, and yet they wish they could. They linger on the brink, and fear to launch away. They are almost out of Sodom, have almost escaped the fire shower, and yet in all probability they will stand like Lot's wife, a pillar of salt, because they will look back, and love the sin that lingers in their heart. Consciences nowadays seem to have gone out of fashion; but to have a conscience sensitive to the preaching of the word is an admirable thing; and if you have such a thing, so far, so good.

II. There were six good points about Herod then. But now, very sorrowfully, I want to indicate the of Herod. The first flaw was this, that though he loved John, he never looked to John's Master. John never wanted anybody to be his disciple, but he cried, "Behold the Lamb of God." Herod was, after a sort, a follower of John, but never a follower of Jesus. It is easy for you to hear the preacher and love him and admire him, and yet the preacher's Master may be all unknown to you. I pray you, dear friends, do not let this be the case with any of you.

I am the bridegroom's friend, and I shall rejoice greatly when the bridegroom wins your hearts. God forbid that my ministry should ever lead you to myself and cause you to stop there. We are only sign-posts pointing to Christ. Go beyond us. Be ye followers of us as far as we are followers of Christ, but in no other respect. It is to Christ you must go; the end of all our ministry is Christ Jesus. We want you to go to Him direct, to seek from Him pardon, from Him redemption, from Him a change of heart, from Him a new life; for vain will it be if you have listened to the most faithful of preachers, and have not listened to the preacher's Master and obeyed His Gospel. You will be Herods, and nothing more, unless grace leads you to Jesus Christ.

The second flaw about Herod's case was this, that he had no respect for goodness in his own heart. He admired it in another, but there was none of it in himself. Our Saviour described Herod admirably. What a master-sketcher of human portraits was Christ! He said of Herod, "Go ye and tell that fox." Herod was selfish, full of tricks; timid when he was in the presence of his superiors, but both cruel and bold when he was in the presence of those who could not defend themselves. We sometimes meet with these foxy people; they want to go to heaven, but they like the road to hell. They will sing a hymn to Jesus; but a good roaring song they like also when they get merry companions together.

By all manner of means, a guinea to the church. Oh yes! admirable thing. But how many guineas are spent upon some secret lust? So many try to dodge between God and Satan. They do not want to fall foul of either; they hold with the hare and run with the hounds; they admire all that is good, but they do not want to have too much of it themselves. It might be inconvenient to carry the cross of Christ on their own shoulders and become precise and exact in their own lives, yet they never say a word against other people doing so. It is a fatal flaw to have no root in yourself—a damning flaw, condemning your own self—to know the right and disregard it, to feel respect for it and yet trample it under foot. I judge that the doom of such will be far more dreadful than that of those who never knew the good, who were trained up in the purlieus of vice, and never had a glimpse of holiness or purity, and therefore never deliberately turned away from them.

Another flaw in Herod's character was that he never loved the Word of God, as God's Word. He admired John, and probably said, "That is the man for me. See how boldly he delivers his Master's message; that is the man I should like to hear." But he never said to himself, "God sent John; God speaks to me through John; oh, that I might learn what John is speaking, and be instructed and improved by the word John is uttering, because it is God's Word." No, no, I do pray you, ask yourselves, dear hearers, whether this may not apply to you. May it not be that you listen to a sermon because it is Mr. So-and-so's discourse, and you admire the preacher? It will be fatal to you if you treat the Word in that way. It must be to you what it is in truth, the Word of God, or it will not save you. It will never impress your soul unless you accept it as the Word of God, and bow before it, and desire to feel all its power as coming to you fresh from the lips of God, and sent into your heart by His Holy Spirit.

Now, we know Herod did not receive the word as the Word of God because he was a picker and chooser in reference to it. He did not like John's discourse when he spoke of

THE SEVENTH COMMANDMENT.

If he spoke of the fourth commandment he would say, "That is admirable; the Jews ought to keep it;" but when he dealt with the seventh commandment Herod and Herodias would say, "We do not think preachers should allude to such subjects." I have always noticed that people who live in the practice of vice think the servants of God ought not to allude to things so coarse. We are allowed to denounce the sins of the man-in-the-moon and the vices of savages in the middle of Africa; but as to the every-day vices of this city of London, if we put our finger upon them in God's name, then straightway some one cries, "It is indelicate to allude to these things."

John dealt with the whole Word of God, and he did not only say, "Behold the Lamb of God," but he cried, "The axe is laid to the root of the trees." He spoke plainly to the conscience. Herod, therefore, had this fatal flaw in his character that he did not attend to all that John delivered of the Word of God; he liked one part, and did not like another. He resembled those who prefer a doctrinal discourse, but cannot endure the precepts of God's Word. I hear one exclaim, "I like practical discourses; I do not want any doctrine." Don't you? There is doctrine in God's Word, and you are to receive what God gives you; not half a Bible, but the whole truth as it is in Jesus. That was a great fault in Herod; he did not receive the testimony of John as the Word of God.

Next, Herod did many things, but he did not do all things. He who receives the Word of God in truth does not only attempt to do many things, but he tries to do all that is right. He does not give up one vice or a dozen vices, but he endeavors to forsake every false way, and seeks to be delivered from every iniquity. Herod did not care for a thorough reformation, for that would call for too great a self-denial. He had one sin he wished to keep, and when John spoke plainly about that he would not listen to him.

Another fault with Herod was that he was

UNDER THE SWAY OF SIN.

He had given himself up to Herodias. She was his own niece, and had been married to his own brother, and was the mother of children by his own brother, and yet he led her away from his own brother's house that she might become his wife; he, himself, casting off one who had been a good and faithful wife to him for years. It is a mess of filthy incest one hardly likes to think of. The influence of this woman was his curse and ruin. How many men have been destroyed in that way! How many women are ruined daily in this city by coming under the vicious influence of others!

My dear men and women, you will have to stand before God on your own account. Do not let any one cast a spell over you. I pray you, escape for your life; run for it when vice hunts you. I may be sent at this moment with a word on purpose for you, to stir up your conscience, and arouse you to a sense of your danger. It is always perilous to be under the influence of an unconverted person, however moral he may be, but it is supremely dangerous to be under the fascination of a wicked woman or a vicious man. God help you to rise above it by His Spirit, for if you are hearers of the word and doers of evil, you will end in being Herods, and nothing more.

I will only allude to another point in Herod's character, that his religion, although it made him do many things, was rather one of fear than of love. It is not said that Herod feared God, but that he "feared John." He did not love John; he "feared John." The whole thing was a matter of fear. He was not a lion, you see; he was a fox—fearful, timid, ready to run away from every barking cur.

There are many people whose whole religion lies in fear. With some it is the fear of men—the fear of what people would say if they did not pretend to be religious—the fear of what their Christian associates would think of them if they were not reputable. With others there is the fear that some awful judgment would come upon them. But the mainspring of the religion of Christ is love. Oh, to love the Gospel, to delight in the truth, to rejoice in holiness; this is genuine conversion. The fear of death and the fear of hell create a poor, poor faith, which leaves men on Herod's level still.

III. I conclude by showing you very sorrowfully

WHAT BECAME OF HEROD.

With all his good points he ended most wretchedly. First, he slew the preacher whom he once respected. It was he who did it, though the executioner was the instrument. He said, "Go and fetch John the Baptist's head in a charger." So it has happened with many hopeful hearers; they have become slanderers and persecutors of the very preachers before whom they once trembled, and far as they could they have taken off their heads. After a time men dislike being rebuked, and they proceed in their dislike till they scoff at the things they once reverenced, and make the name of Christ a football for their jests. Beware! I pray you, beware! for the way of sin is downhill. Herod feared John, and yet he beheaded him. A person may be evangelical and Calvinistic, and so on, and yet, if he is placed under certain conditions, he may become a hater and a persecutor of the truth he once avowed.

Herod went a step lower, however; for this Herod Antipas was the man who afterward mocked the Saviour. It is said, "Herod with his men of war set Him at nought, and mocked Him, and arrayed Him in a gorgeous robe." This is the man that "did many things" under the leading of John. His course is altered now. He spits on the Redeemer and insults the Son of God. Certain of the most outrageous blasphemers of the Gospel were originally Sunday-school scholars and teachers, young men who were "almost persuaded," yet they halted and hesitated, and wavered until they made the plunge and became much worse than they possibly could have become if they had not seen the light of truth. If to make a Judas, "the son of perdition," he takes an apostle to work upon. When he takes a thoroughly bad character like Herod, it is necessary to make him plastic as Herod had been in the hands of John. Somehow or other, border men are the worst enemies. In the old wars between England and Scotland the borderers were the fighting men; and so the border people will do more harm than any until we get them on this side of the frontier. Oh, that the grace of God may decide those who now hesitate!

I may mention to you that, before long, Herod lost all the power he possessed. He was a foxy man, and always tried to win power, but in the end he was recalled by the Roman emperor in disgrace. That was the end of him. Many a man has given up Christ for honor, and has lost himself as well as lost Christ. Like the man who, in the old Catholic persecuting times, was brought to prison for the faith. He said he loved the Protestant faith; but he cried, "I cannot burn." So he denied the faith, and in the dead of night his house took fire; the man who could not burn was forced to burn, but he had no comfort in that burning, for he had denied his Lord. If you sell Christ for a mess of pottage it will scald your lips; it will burn within your soul like molten lead forever; for "the wages of sin is death." However bright the golden coin shines, and however musical may be its chink, it will prove an awful curse to the man who sells his Lord to gain it.

To-day the name of Herod is infamous forever. As long as there is a Christian church, the name of Herod will be execrated. And is it not a solemn reflection, that "Herod feared John, and did many things, and heard him gladly?" I know that no young man here believes that he will ever turn out to be a Herod. I might, like the prophet, say, "Thou wilt do this, and do that," and you would answer, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" But you will do it, unless you are decided for God.

An appeal like this once startled me. When I was young and tender, there was a hopeful youth who went to school with me, who was held up to me as an example. He was a good boy, and I used to feel no particular affection for his name, because I was so perpetually chided by his goodness, and I was so far removed from it. Being younger than he, I saw him enter upon his apprenticeship, enter upon the gaieties of a great city, and come back dishonored. It horrified me. Might not I dishonor my character? And when I found that if I gave myself to Christ He would give me a new heart and a right spirit, and when I read that promise of the covenant, "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me," it seemed to me like a Character Insurance Society. If I believed in Jesus Christ my character was insured; for Christ would enable me to walk in the paths of holiness; this charmed me into desiring an interest in Christ.

If you would not like to be a Herod, be a disciple of Jesus Christ; for there will be no choice for some of you. Some of you are of such powerful natures that you must either thoroughly serve Christ or serve the devil.

AN OLD SCOTCHMAN

was once looking at Rowland Hill, and the good old gentleman said, "What are you looking at?" He said, "The lines of your face." "What do you think of them?" He replied, "I think that if you had not been a Christian man you would have been an awful sinner." Some people are of that sort; they are like a pendulum; they must swing one way or the other. Oh, that you may swing Christ's way to-night. Cry, "Lord, help me to cleanse my way; help me to be wholly Thine; help me to possess the righteousness I admire, the holiness I respect! Help me, not only to do some things, but everything thou wouldst have me to do! Take me, make me Thine, and I will rejoice and joy in Him who helps me to be holy!" God bless you, dear friends, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

The Dangers of the American Missionaries in China have caused some anxiety. In the course of a private letter from Dr. A. P. Happer, dated Canton, December 13th, the missionary remarks: "For three days we had a very anxious time—on the 5th, 6th, and 7th inst. The Imperial Commissioner Pang, who has come here to defend Canton, prepared a proclamation in relation to prospective war in China, and what would be necessary to be done then. Before officially issued, it was surreptitiously circulated and sold by the thousand in the street, giving the impression that war had been declared, and that foreigners had to leave. It created an immense excitement, and immediate disturbance was threatened. I got Consul Seymour to send a letter to the Governor-General, to inquire if it was a true and genuine paper, and telling of the evil it was doing, and the danger to our chapels and lives. The Governor-General immediately sent an order to stop the sale by arresting all the newsboys engaged in selling it. We stopped opening the chapels for a few days. The Hong Kong Press says that it has reliable authority for the statement that France has diplomatically informed the Treaty Powers in China that she does not propose to attack any of the Chinese ports, nor to declare war against China; that in case the Chinese send troops to Annam to help the Annamites, of course the French will fight any force that appears, without asking who they are. If these statements are true, then the quietness of China is assured; for the naval forces of the Treaty Powers are sufficient to suppress any outbreak that may occur, and to protect the foreign residents. So I hope the present excitement will soon subside, and that we shall be permitted to resume our usual work."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Dog Saved Another Dog's Life at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on January 31st. The Poughkeepsie Eagle relates that on that day a gentleman was looking from his window at the ice on the river when he saw a dog in the ferry track, struggling hard to get out. The dog would swim along the edge of the ice, then get both feet on it, and raise himself partly out of the water and fall back. The animal did this once or twice, when another dog was seen hurrying to the spot. The latter seized the half-drowned dog by the neck and pulled and tugged away, vainly endeavoring to haul him out. He got him nearly out two or three times, but each time he dropped back. Suddenly the would-be rescuer started like lightning for the shore and the dog in the water kept up his struggles. In a minute or two the other dog was seen returning, and there was a man with him who was running. Dog and man reached the drowning dog in time to pull him out, and all started for the shore. When the two dogs reached the bridge which leads from the ice to the Brewery pier they laid down side by side, and made extraordinary manifestations of joy and delight, and their cries, not barks, were incessant. The dog that was saved is owned by Mr. George Lumb, of Swart & Lumb Brothers, and the dog that went to his rescue is a hunting dog belonging to Isaac H. Wood, of the Exchange House. The dog's action was an example to Christian workers. When he failed in his attempt to rescue he went to his master for aid (Mark 9 : 17–29).

A Difficult Question was Addressed to the secretary of a Young Men's Christian Association by a man in sore need of employment, who had searched for it many days at Auburn, N. Y., and had at length been offered work in a liquor saloon. He was almost despairing when the offer was made, and though conscientiously opposed to the business, his necessities tempted him to yield. He told the liquor-dealer he must have the evening to decide, and he went to the Young Men's Christian Association to ask advice. There he was counselled to decline it and trust in God. The matter was carried to God in prayer, and an assurance came that the prayer was heard, but there appeared no visible ground for hope. Faith was, however, justified in the result, for in less than three hours after the meeting closed, an eligible situation in one of the largest stores in the city was offered to the hesitating man and was thankfully accepted. He was saved from temptation and from violating the dictates of his conscience. Thus are we taught how wise it is to cast our cares on Him who careth for us (1 Peter 5 : 7).

HELEN TURNER'S DECISION.

IN the parlor of an old-fashioned farm-house two young people sat one winter evening conversing earnestly. There were evidences all around of comfort, even of luxury, but not of the display which indicates vulgarity.

But neither Helen Turner nor Frank Fulton, who was talking to her, had any thought just then to spare for their surroundings. Frank was going to Harvard the next day, and he was pleading very hard with Helen to give him a promise before he went that she would be his wife when his college course was complete and he had entered on his profession.

"You have known me all my life, Helen; as boy and girl we played together with our brothers and sisters; you know me thoroughly, and I cannot understand your hesitation on religious grounds. The match would please your mother and father as much as it would mine. But, more than all, you know that I love you dearly, and you admit that you love me. Come, dear, you will promise, will you not?"

This pleading had been going on for more than an hour; but apparently it was not successful. Helen was weeping silently, and she shook her head.

"Any one listening to you, Helen, would believe that I was a depraved, vicious fellow, unfit for the society of godly people. Have you ever known me do anything mean or cruel or even sinful as society understands the word? I do not drink, nor play cards, nor do any of the things you object to. Compare my life with any other young man who is a member of the Church, and tell me if I am not as pure as he."

"Frank, I admit it all, but that does not affect my decision. You do not understand why I refuse, and until you are converted you will not understand it. A relationship so close as that of husband and wife involves a community of feeling. With the dearest, best, and most cherished feelings of my heart you have no sympathy. An explicit injunction of God's Word prohibits our union, and my reason approves it. You would chafe under the occupations I delight in, and think them a bore. I should be chilled and depressed by your want of sympathy. Indeed, Frank, though my heart bleeds for you in your disappointment, I am sure I am acting wisely for us both. It has cost me bitter suffering to come to that decision. But it is irrevocable."

The tone in which Helen uttered those words could not fail to carry conviction into the mind of any hearer, and Frank Fulton, who knew her well, knew it was useless appealing further.

"Helen," he said, "you are incurring a serious responsibility. You do not know how strong an armor for me your love would have been. I could have resisted any temptation for your sake. Now, it seems to me it is no use trying to be good."

"God keep you, Frank, from such thoughts. They are unworthy of you. Your way to the light is not through the love of a woman. Until you feel that you love Jesus so much that you could, if it were necessary, give up me for His sake, which is, I think, the greatest test of love to Him you could give, you will not be safe for time and eternity. Now go, my dear friend. It grieves me to wound you. Believe me, I am suffering too. I must be alone, and I will pray for you."

Very reluctantly Frank bade farewell, and the next day was on his way to college. It was a sad heart he carried away with him. He was disappointed in the most cherished desire of his heart, and it seemed to him that all the world could give him would not compensate him for that disappointment. But as the days passed amid pleasant and congenial society, he grew more cheerful, and even became light-hearted and jovial. He entered into the pleasures of his companions, and took his enjoyment with the others. But at the end of his first term Frank would have acknowledged, if he had been bound to give an honest opinion, that he was not so good a man as he was at its beginning.

During the next three years his course had a uniformly downward tendency. He saw but little of Helen, for his vacations were not spent at his father's house, which was near that of the Turners. He seldom thought of her now; she seemed a thing incongruous with the scenes of dissipation among which Frank spent most of his leisure time. Occasionally, rumors of his wild course reached Helen's ears, and she wept and prayed in secret.

Helen Turner Hears Glad News.

One morning she heard that Frank had returned home. She did not expect to see him, for on his rare visits home latterly he had avoided her. But the fact of his being near her affected her strangely. Something seemed to be impending. She thought she was getting nervous, and would take the best of all remedies—fresh air. With her two little sisters she walked out through the frosty fields. Still the sense of some strange circumstance weighed upon her, and after an hour's walk the little party were returning home when the clatter of a horse's hoofs rang on the road. In a few minutes the rider had overtaken them and had alighted, and Helen saw that it was Frank Fulton.

"I have come, Helen," he said, "to bring you news that will surprise you. I am going to leave America for many years."

A quick spasm of pain crossed Helen's face, which Frank was not slow to perceive.

"I have," he went on, "abandoned all intention of practising as a physician here, and I am going away."

"You cannot be serious, Frank?"

"I am, indeed. Before I went I thought I would come to see if you still adhere to your decision about our union. You have heard bad accounts of me, I dare say. Have you ever thought you might save me by marrying me?"

"I grieved to hear the reports, Frank, but I could not do that. No, God will save you yet, but I still adhere to my decision."

"Then I claim you," said Frank joyously. "Helen, I am a new man. I can give you no better proof of it than that I have given up my prospects here and I have pledged myself to go as a medical missionary to China. I did that without knowing whether you would go too, but I am prepared even to give you up for the sake of the dear Lord, who saved me on the very brink of destruction. Helen, I understand you now. You were right when you said that there could be no true marriage between a believer and a worldling. I realize Christ's love, and I know it to be the mainspring of life."

Such joy as it is seldom given for human beings to enjoy filled Helen's heart as she heard Frank's avowal and listened to his account of the circumstances which had led to his conversion. And Frank did not go on his mission alone.

THE SCENE OF THE MASSACRE OF GENERAL HICKS AND HIS ARMY.

ON page 140 is a picture depicting the recent visit of Major Giles and a few cavalry soldiers to the scene of the slaughter of eight hundred Egyptian soldiers by the Arabs associated with the Mahdi in his rebellion against the Egyptian Government.

General Hicks and his army were attacked by the Mahdi's troops on November 1st. The want of water and the long march had weakened the Egyptian troops, but they appear to have made a determined stand. They formed a square, against which the Arab horsemen dashed impetuously. At the close of the day's fighting General Hicks still held his ground, the Arabs having failed to penetrate the square. The next day the attack was renewed with the same result. But the following day the Arabs succeeded, owing to the exhaustion of the Egyptian troops, in making a gap in the lines of men, and a general panic ended in a massacre. A native who was with the Egyptian army, and who was enabled to escape because of his black color and because he wore no uniform, says that Hicks Pasha fought like a lion, and was the last officer to fall. The members of his staff fell in one group. After the battle one hundred and fifty soldiers were found wounded. The bodies of the European and Egyptian officers were decapitated, and their heads fixed over the gate of El Obeid. The Arabs resolved to erect a tomb for Hicks Pasha's body because of his great bravery.

"We started," writes Major G. D. Giles, describing his visit to the scene of the massacre, "from Suakim, at about 8 A.M., our original intention being only to make a reconnaissance parade. The battlefield where, on November 4th, eight hundred black troops had been defeated and annihilated, had never been visited, so, finding a Bashi-Bazouk who knew the way, we thought we might as well ride on and see the spot, which was about fifteen miles distant. The first indications we found were several bodies lying on the ground, the skin having dried up, showing in some instances the wound which the spear had inflicted. The ground was stony, with a few stunted shrubs, and intersected by deep water-tracks, which had no doubt enabled the rebels to surround the black troops unseen. As we were speculating as to how the catastrophe had happened, and agreeing that from the number of vultures hovering over a ridge just in front of us the main battle must have been fought there, some of our scouts came up and reported that the enemy was in front of us. The rebels appeared to be in considerable numbers, and, as we were out without orders, we thought we had better return. The enemy fired a shot or two at us, and were no doubt disappointed at not making our closer acquaintance."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Cloud on the Horizon.

THE motives which had determined the second Mrs. Morley to become the wife of a man fifteen years her senior, and altogether different to the beau ideal of a husband which her girlish fancy had painted, were as complex as the motives to such marriages generally are. In the first place she had attained the age of three and twenty, yet, though very pretty and engaging, had met with no real opportunity of escaping from the life she hated—that of a governess in a middle-class boarding-school. There was a dreadful possibility that her attractions might fade away before she met with an establishment worthy of her; and she longed to be the mistress of a house of her own. On the other hand, John Morley had the reputation of being rich for his station, and he was a handsomer and more polished man than any of the younger men with whom she was brought into contact.

Except one memory, which was sentimentally brooded over in her heart, no one had so nearly touched her frivolous affections as this grave, melancholy, handsome man of middle-age, who had abandoned himself to a passionate devotion to her. On these grounds she had determined upon becoming John Morley's second wife.

Very naturally she resolved to put his attachment to the test, and not to spare it. She found the new house of which she was the mistress gloomy and poverty-stricken in aspect, and she set her heart upon beautifying it. It was a large, rambling old place, much too large for the small family dwelling in it; and she forecast her plans for turning it all into a habitation suitable to herself. But here she met a sudden and unexpected check, even in the first weeks of her married life. John Morley assured her, with a hundred protestations of his love, that he could not give her permission to do as she pleased with the dreary, half-furnished rooms. One room should be her own, he said, the largest in the house; and she might buy whatever she chose for it. It was a compromise which was disagreeable to her; but she resolved to make the most of it.

Up-stairs there was a large apartment, extending from the front of the house to the back, and wainscoted with panels of oak throughout, which had been hitherto used as a warehouse. This she fixed upon, insisting upon the fulfilment of her husband's promise, and upon it she lavished all her taste and caprice, while John Morley looked on and laughed, as one laughs at a child playing at keeping house. It was a pleasant time for Rose. She enjoyed the unconditional permission given to her with the full enjoyment of one who has always been obliged to look closely to her expenditure; with a gay good nature she gave up her plans of embellishing the rest of the house, while she concentrated herself upon this room allotted to her.

John Morley's home grew full of sound, in the place of its unbroken stillness. The blithe laugh of his young wife rippled from room to room, blended with the quieter but happy tones of his little girl. Now and then there came to his ears notes of music from Rose's piano overhead, short, merry tunes, tinkling through the empty rooms, with a suggestion of dancing steps accompanying them, though there was no one to dance except Hester, whose small feet had never before been set to music. The time was as blissful for John Morley as for his second wife, or rather, immeasurably more so.

The pity was that the girl was no more than a school-girl, with nothing but a school-girl's idea of happiness. She was good-natured, and good-tempered, and quite willing to do what she could to please her husband. But it had never entered her mind that his companionship alone would be sufficient for her. She had no wish whatever to reign over her new household unseen and unenvied by her neighbors. As soon as her drawing-room was furnished and decorated after her own taste, she longed to receive guests in it, who would admire and praise it to her satisfaction. There John Morley, reserved and self-contained, made a stand. He wanted no witnesses to his happiness.

The people of Little Aston were not of his kind; there were none among them who could become his associates, or whom he would choose to be the friends of his wife. On the one hand were the worldlings, the people who wasted their time at the card-table or in the dance; on the other were the members of the church, ignorant and ill-bred, with whom he had nothing in common beyond the religious conventionalities of church membership. He was separated from the world and the church alike. His wife might welcome to his hearth the old minister and his equally aged wife, whose gentleness could never offend or displease him; but there was no other person whom he could receive into his house with the cordiality of friendship. Mere acquaintances John Morley could not understand. To eat bread at his table was a pledge of living friendliness between host and guest. On this point no charm, or persuasion, or rebellion, could avail his wife anything. He was like a rock; and the poor, silly girl, with her empty mind and light heart, beat against it in vain.

After the first novelty had worn away, John Morley, though retaining his passionate and proud love of his young wife, fell back into his old studious habits—lost himself, and her, and all his new life in the books which came almost daily to his hand. If she invaded his quiet room where he sat all day long, and which was too heavy and sombre for a butterfly creature like her, to ask him for some new indulgence, or to display some new possession, he put down his book only for a few minutes, and soon grew absent if she prolonged her visit. He had no thought of any unkindness in this neglect. Hester's mother had been willing to sit hour after hour, his silent companion, ready to hear him if he should like to read aloud some sentence which pleased him more than others, a sentence which to her stood alone, with none before or following it; and he had taken it for granted that Rose would do the same. Since she did not do it, but avoided his dull room, he did not complain; but it never occurred to him to alter his own habits. Besides, after the lapse of a few months his eyes were opened to the snare into which he had fallen. He had been guilty of a blunder, he would not call it a sin, which he had formerly blamed harshly in others. He, a chief member of the church, a deacon, had entered into marriage with a worldly woman.

John Morley's creed was colored by his gloomy temperament. He began to look upon Rose, whom he had made his nearest and dearest companion, as a soul which still walked in darkness, under the tyranny of Satan; and whose destiny was an eternal separation from all goodness and happiness. The gaiety and charms of his young wife began to make his heart ache. He saw her treading mirthfully along the path leading to ruin and perdition. The possibility of eternal punishment, which he had calmly and philosophically considered from a distance, was brought into his own home, he had himself taken it to his heart; it was the only dowry his wife had brought him. In the quiet of his room this thought presented itself to him with innumerable and stinging variations—that the voice which he heard singing and babbling about his house would one day wail in hopeless anguish, and that the heart which he had won for himself would be pierced through with unutterable and unavailing repentance.

It is no marvel that John Morley set himself with his whole heart and mind to the task of enlightening and converting this beloved, but lost, soul. He argued with his wife; he read to her; he prayed for her. He called in the minister, as he would have called in a physician had she been stricken with some malady. Rose was frightened at first, and yielded readily to tears. But after a while she grew indignant, and then weary. Never before had it been suggested to her that anything was amiss in her. She had been christened and confirmed, and had been a communicant of her church. She ran over the Commandments, and found that she had kept them from her youth up. Certainly if she stood in any kind of danger the whole world was full of souls who were in equal, if not greater, peril. All this commotion was the result of having married an austere and narrow-minded man, who first shut her out from all the pleasures and enjoyments of her age, and then surrounded her with imaginary terrors. She began to harden herself against him, and resolved to bring up Hester after a fashion opposed to the strict rule of her father.

If there was any influence which could have won over the worldly spirit of Rose Morley to the grave but peaceful religion into whose sweet safety John Morley vainly strove to drive her, it would have been the simple faith of the child, who knew nothing of the technical phrases of any creed. Like the child Christ, Hester both asked and answered questions in such a manner as to startle and trouble the giddy mind of her young stepmother. But how could this gay and thoughtless girl help growing weary of her monotonous life, with a husband always burdened with spiritual anxieties for her, and a child who cared less for the plays of childhood than for the thoughts and pursuits of older years? She found herself altogether out of her element—a mere butterfly, which had flown heedlessly into a damp and chilly cave, where it could only fold its wings, and lose the brilliant hours of the summer which was swiftly passing away. The merry laugh and the tinkling of music ceased in the house; her step grew languid, and her voice low; the blue eyes were dimmed, and the cheeks faded; but John Morley saw in the change only what he wished to see—the pain and travail of a soul which was struggling into life. But a congenial friendship was about to be formed with momentous results.

Mr. Waldron's parliamentary duties deprived the church at Little Aston of his presence, and that of his daughter, during a considerable portion of each year. The church and the minister were perhaps a little more at their ease during their absence; but they felt all the increased importance of their personal attendance at the chapel, and their return was anxiously looked forward to. It had become a point of etiquette for Mr. Watson to proceed at once to Aston Court as soon as the rumor of their arrival reached his ears, in order to congratulate himself and them upon their reunion with the little church of which they were the most conspicuous pillars.

They had come down from London upon the commencement of the long autumnal recess, and Mr. Watson set out the next morning upon his visit of homage. Aston Court was about a mile from Little Aston, but most of the road lay through the fine old park which surrounded the newly-built mansion. Mr. Waldron was a utilitarian, and had sold off the deer which had belonged to the former owner, and divided his park into regular divisions, for the grazing of cattle and the growth of hay. The new house was plain, square, and massive, flanked by two smaller, but equally formal, wings. The windows of plate glass were of uniform size, distributed along the front of the building at even distances, and one large entrance door, with a portico, stood in the exact centre of the ground floor. The garden stretching before it was laid out in long, straight borders of the same breadth and length; and the trees separating it from the park were kept well clipped.

The usual reception-room, which was the dining-room of the mansion, was a large handsome apartment, but heavy and dull. Its principal decoration consisted of two life-size portraits of Luther and Melanchthon, excellently painted; the former hard, acute, and intrepid; the latter soft and feminine, with mournful blue eyes which seemed weary of gazing upon life. There was also above the fireplace a richly illuminated and gilded testimonial, signed by a thousand Nonconformists—inscribed to David Waldron in gratitude for his eminent services in the House of Commons in defence and advancement of the cause of Nonconformity. The middle of this apartment was filled by a long wide table, similar to those seen in committee rooms, and covered with dark leather; a number of leather-covered chairs were ranged along the walls. Curtains of deep crimson damasks, always drawn a little over the window, shed a solemn light into the room—a twilight which was not mournful gloom, but rather a wealthy and grand obscurity.

It was into this reception-room that the minister was ushered. It was Saturday morning, and on the next day Mr. Waldron and his daughter would occupy the large curtained pew in the corner of the chapel, which was appropriated to their use. Miss Waldron was seated at the table, a small insignificant person to look at, but the daughter of David Waldron, M. P. She received her pastor with mingled fervor and condescension, and invited him to a seat beside her. Mr. Waldron soon joined them, and a close conversation, a sort of religious gossip, about the affairs of the church and its members, ensued.

"Brother Morley is married again, as you know," said Mr. Watson, after some other subjects had been discussed, "and he is beginning to feel sorely troubled about his young wife. She remains the same worldly, thoughtless creature she was before her marriage."

"Ay! ay!" answered Mr. Waldron, shaking his head, "we gave in too soon there. You and I, as well as John Morley, were smitten with the young woman's beauty."

"Father!" interrupted Miss Waldron, in a tone of reproof.

"It is true," continued Mr. Waldron; "I never felt so checkmated in my life as when she appeared suddenly in the very midst of our expostulation with John Morley. But we must get her into the church. There must be ways and means of winning her over. We will put her into Miss Waldron's hands."

Miss Waldron was one of those persons who are never called by their Christian names even by their nearest relatives. It is possible that, in conversation with her, her father or her brother might sometimes address her by it; but it was not known beyond her own family circle. There seems something significant in this suppression of the name by which one is enrolled under the banner of the cross.

"By what means shall I get at this young woman?" asked Miss Waldron, not at all unwilling to undertake the conversion of Rose Morley, and entering into it as a business.

"I scarcely know," answered Mr. Watson, in perplexity.

"There is my Sunday-school class," continued Miss Waldron, "and my Mothers' Meeting on Monday, my Wednesday evening Bible Class, and my Saturday night Female Prayer-meeting."

"I am afraid we could not get her to attend any of these," replied the minister.

"Why not?" inquired Miss Waldron.

"She is quite an educated person," he said, timidly, "and has all the manners of a lady. She has been a governess, and plays very well, and can draw. She holds herself rather above the rest of our people. They are a little unpolished, you know."

"I do not see then what can be done in such a case," said Miss Waldron, with a stiff and chilly air.

PAUL AT CORINTH.

S. S. Lesson for March 9, Acts 18: 1–17. Golden Text, verse 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Alone in the City—His Independence—An Example to Discontented Teachers—Physical Need not the First Care—A Pressure of Spirit—The Turning Point—Henceforth a New Field—Crispus Converted—The Church in Paul's Lodging—Directions for the Sisters—God's Assurance of Safety—Gallio's Impartiality—Another Prominent Jewish Convert.

WHILE Paul was at Athens, he did not forget his converts at Thessalonica. When he was sent away from Berea, Silas and Timotheus were left behind, and Paul sent word to them to come to him with all speed. If they did so, it was at this time that Paul sent Timothy again to the Thessalonians. "Wherefore when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone; and sent Timotheus, our brother, . . . to establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith" (1 Thess. 3: 1–3). We hear nothing about Silas at this time. But when Paul wrote the two epistles to the Thessalonians [from Corinth, not from Athens as wrongly stated in our authorized Bible], we find the names of Silvanus [the Greek form of Silas] and Timotheus joined with that of Paul in his greeting. Perhaps Silas had remained at Berea to strengthen the young church there.

DAILY LIFE IN CORINTH.

Anyway, Paul came alone to Corinth. There he made acquaintance with some fugitive Jews, refugees from Rome. Suffering is often used of God to soften the heart and prepare it for the reception of His truth. We are not told, but we may be almost sure, that Aquila and Priscilla were among Paul's first converts at Corinth. With them he labored for his daily bread that he might "make the Gospel of Christ without charge" (1 Cor. 9: 18). This was Paul's usual custom. He had done the same at Thessalonica. "Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labor and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you: not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us" (1 Thess. 2: 9; 11 Thess. 3: 8, 9). At Ephesus again he did the same thing six years later; he says: "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me" (Acts 20: 33, 34). Would to God there were more of this spirit among us now! Honest hard work seems to have gone out of fashion. The luxury of giving the remaining hours to God after a hard day's honest work seems to be at a discount.

Many a young man who has been idle, and not altogether trustworthy in his situation, thinks himself fit, not only to win souls, but to teach holiness. Such an one often says the strongest things in the way of reproach to hard-working men and women who love the Lord, if they do not give all they can possibly screw out to maintain him, as though there were no other work of God abroad. Many a young girl, by no means remarkable for exactitude, for obedience, for conscientiousness, and for truth in her place as servant thinks she is equal to teach those who have known the Lord ten times as long as she, and bitterly reproaches those who do not liberally give for her maintenance. There is such a thing as being called of God to a life of faith and entire dependence on Him, but we do no call that faith which makes known the need to man, and we never find begging authorized in Scripture. Paul truly exhorted liberality on the part of the churches: "Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be

NO GATHERINGS WHEN I COME"

(1 Cor. 16: 2). Paul's rule for himself and other workers was to work for a living, or to trust in God. His rule for the churches was to have a store always ready for any necessity of God's work which He might bring before them. Paul never refused gifts where they were given out of a loving heart (Phil. 4: 15–18), but he never made his personal needs known so as to ask for them.

But the apostle, while he worked for his daily bread, did not make this the first thing. We do not hear of his being pressed in spirit because prices were down, but when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, he was pressed in spirit to testify to the Jews that Jesus was Christ. Up to this point he had reasoned and persuaded; but when his two fellow-laborers came, fresh from revival ground, and gave their testimony to what the Lord had done for them and by them, Paul was not backward; the scholar in him gave way to the glad redeemed child of God. Perhaps up to this time his learning and erudition had commanded respect from the Jews, but now that he was determined to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified—now that he was with them in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling—now that his speech and his preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power (1 Cor. 2: 2–4), these Jews must come to a decision. From the presence of a remarkable man, they had been brought into that of God, from doctrines they had been brought to personal responsibility, and now it was a whether they would or would not accept Jesus as Christ. Everything hung on the decision. All their national, their family, and their religious prestige must be sacrificed if they accepted Jesus; but, on the other hand, they would lose their souls if they rejected Him. To most of them God was no real acquaintance. His presence was intolerable instead of being "the fulness of joy," as it always is to His own people. So "they opposed themselves and blasphemed." This brought Paul to a decision to which God had been leading him throughout the whole period of his ministry; he said: "Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles." From this time he acknowledged that he was "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom. 11: 13), and now he was free to regard all men alike who were in Christ. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3: 28).

No sooner had Paul fully yielded his own ideas to God, and given up his natural thought as a converted Jew and that through the Jews at that time all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, than God gave him

A TOKEN FOR GOOD.

"Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, and all his house." No wonder this made a sensation, and set all the people talking; and Crispus must have had his hands as full as Paul's with the earnest inquirers who now saw there was something in it, since such a man as he had gone over. "Many of the Corinthians hearing believed, and were baptized." Paul lodged with Justus, close by the synagogue, and we may well believe that as the synagogues emptied, the conventicle filled, and that they had many a squeeze for room as Paul, Silas, Timotheus and Crispus spoke out of glad hearts, and one and another testified to blessing received. Life in the church increased—men and women taking part in the meetings—until Paul had to order that the sisters when they prophesied should have their heads covered, to distinguish them, doubtless, from the immodest priestesses of the gods. Paul describes this church thus: "When ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation" (1 Cor. 14: 26), there were no dumb spirits among them, and they "came behind in no gift" (1 Cor. 1: 7). It was the strongest contrast to his visit to Athens, and Paul must have been filled with joy. At this time the Lord spoke to him in a vision, and said: "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city." The work was broader and deeper than Paul knew; only God knows all the results of preaching His Word. The apostle remained there eighteen months, "teaching the Word of God among them." He found time to work for his living, to superintend all the evangelizing by others who also worked for their living, and to write long letters to his converts in other parts. He had nothing to pay for halls, and thus a glorious work of evangelization was going on free of cost.

The Jews did not long keep silence. They waited for a favorable opportunity of creating and this they thought they had found when there was a change of administration. Gallio was made the deputy of Achaia, and as he knew nothing of the state of things before his government began, the Jews thought they could easily make out a case against Paul. They brought him to the judgment seat, and now they had to prove that he had broken the laws of the community. No theft, no dishonesty, no brawling, no uproar could be proved against him. The only charge which they could substantiate was this, "This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law."

Paul knew, for God had told him, that no man should set on him to hurt him; he knew that if they set him on fire he would not burn, and if they stabbed him the point of the knife would be turned back—it could not enter if God did not permit. But perhaps he was hardly prepared for the complete confusion of his adversaries by the part which Gallio took: "If it were a matter of wrong or of wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you: But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters. And he drove them from the judgment seat." The wrath of the Jews then changed its object, and Sosthenes, the then ruler of the synagogue, the successor of Crispus, came in for the remainder of their ire. Perhaps then for the first time he had declared himself on the side of Christ. Later on Paul writes of him as a brother (1 Cor. 1: 1). How blessedly we see here the glorious working of God. While Paul was bent chiefly on the conversion of the Jews he made little progress among them. As soon as he recognized his mission to the Gentiles and left God to deal with the Jews, the rulers of the synagogue in succession became converted to God.

The News of the Surrender of Tokar, the stronghold in the Soudan, which Baker Pacha was attempting to relieve when his army was defeated, was cabled here on Friday. Five soldiers who fled to Suakim from Tokar, brought the news of the surrender. They reported that the rebels beset the town and kept up a constant fire of artillery and rifles. On Tuesday the garrison recognized the necessity of conferring with the rebels, and on Wednesday Yakoob and Maccaivi Effendi, chief of police, with a sergeant of artillery, went out and held a conference with the rebels. On their return they informed the garrison that they must surrender their arms on Thursday. Many of the soldiers murmured at this, and a large proportion of them escaped during the night. But as the conference had arranged, Tokar was surrendered on Thusday. Later reports show that the capitulation was an act of cowardice on the part of the officers, or that they had been bribed to favor a surrender. It is known that the privates were bitterly opposed to the surrender, and that all the officers favored it and overruled the objections of the subordinates. After the surrender Osman Digna, El Mahdi's lieutenant, gave a number of presents to the officers, which he said were as a mark of respect for their bravery in holding out so long; but the soldiers think they were given as part payment for the capitulation of Tokar, and were insignia of cowardice instead of bravery. With the exception of the bombardment, which was being constantly kept up and which did very little damage, Tokar was secure, as a majority of the rebels had been drawn away from the vicinity of Tokar and were being massed at Teb, where they were fortifying and awaiting the advance of General Graham. An effort is being made to induce the British Government to recapture the city.

Russia's Annexation of Merv has, as was Expected, alarmed the British Government, which sees only Afghanistan now between the Russian lines and British India. It is evident that the Russians have followed their usual policy of taking advantage of the English embarrassments in Egypt to creep another stage nearer India. The English minister at St. Petersburg has received instructions to ask of the Russian Government an explanation full and explicit of their annexation of the Merv oasis. He is at the same time to protest against this action as a breach of the assurances given to England by the Czar Alexander. Besides extending an English protectorate over Beloochistan, the government proposes to send a military commission to Herat, to ascertain the exact boundaries of Afghanistan and the condition of the border line defences. The government has sent Lord Ripon, Viceroy of India, instructions to re-enforce the garrisons upon the north-western frontier of India and to send troops to Quetta and Kandahar. The English agent at Cabul is negotiating a new treaty with the Ameer, which proposes to give the Ameer further subsidies than those which he receives at present on condition of the complete submission of foreign relations to English control.

General Gordon is Adopting Conciliatory tactics in the Soudan, and is acting with his usual high-spirited love of justice. He has opened two new gates in the forts of Khartoum, so that the people can pass in freely. He has abolished the octroi and market duties. He has also established boxes in the streets into which the people may drop petitions or complaints. A sheik was carried into his presence a few days ago with his feet mutilated by the bastinado, administered by the orders of Hussein Pacha, late Vice-Governor of Khartoum. Gordon telegraphed to Cairo ordering the stoppage of a portion of Hussein's pay for the benefit of the outraged sheik. If Hussein Pacha objects to this he will be returned to Khartoum to be tried. Hussein Pacha recently flogged a man to death. The common people have given General Gordon an enthusiastic welcome. He believes that he can pacify the Soudan without firing a shot. The New York Times, sketching the character of the Christian general, says: "Gordon is without doubt the most heroic figure of the day, and his marvellous ride to Khartoum will live in history. Gordon rode alone to meet a foe that had exterminated armies. Between Assouan and Khartoum the road swarmed with rebels filled with hatred of Egyptian and English rule and maddened with Mohammedan fanaticism, but Gordon did not hesitate to make his way through them. His confidence that he bears a charmed life so long as Providence has work for him to do was justified by the result. He reached Khartoum, where his authority is as absolute and unquestioned as it could be were he at the head of an English army corps. The secret of Gordon's fearlessness is his religious faith. The source of his power is the conviction among the people that he is as just as he is fearless."

Prince Jerome Napoleon Gave Audience on Saturday to eighty delegates from Bonapartist committees. He had his son by his side, the young man whom a section of the Bonapartists desire to make the head of the party. The Prince made his friends a speech of the true Napoleonic type. He said, in the course of his remarks: "Your presence here proves that when it is necessary to defend the national sovereignty and the rights of the people a Napoleon can always be called upon. I am happy to have my son at my side. It is a confirmation of the union of our family, and shows that it is as impossible to separate father and son as to separate the Napoleons from the cause of the people. The constitution of 1876, imposed upon the country by Orleanist intrigue, which subordinated everything to Parliament and handed over the government of the country to irresponsible majorities, is the cause of our present ills, the symptoms of which are becoming alarming. I trust you will not listen to the few individuals who are preaching a narrow, bombastic seditious policy, but that you will follow a great and loyal policy which shall revindicate the rights of the people. To the people alone belongs the right of constituting the government by the choice of that man for head whom it deems capable among the nation." It is evident that the Napoleons have yet much to learn.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the English Atheist, has been elected member of Parliament for the fourth time by Northampton. His object in resigning and then seeking re-election is apparently to convince the House of Commons that his constituency is determined on having him for its representative. Nevertheless the House has refused to allow him to take the oath, and has by resolution forbidden him to enter its precincts. Mr. Gladstone opposed the resolution, but it was passed by a vote of 226 to 173. As soon as the result was announced Mr. Bradlaugh retired under protest. He is being prosecuted for having voted on the last resolution in his case, he at that time not having taken the oath in the prescribed form.

The Proposed Palestine Canal is Considered feasible by Colonel Colville, who has returned from the Holy Land, having made a complete survey of the country between the Gulf of Akaba and the Jordan Valley, in the interests of the Palestine Canal Syndicate, of which the Duke of Sutherland is chairman. He reports that a range of low hills, having an average elevation of 400 feet and an extent of ten miles, must be cut through to make the Canal; but as the soil is capable of easy excavation he believes the undertaking to be possible.

Misrepresentations as to the Cause of Pauperism in England are being widely circulated here in connection with the discussion of free trade. Free trade is not the cause of the poverty of the lower classes in England. There is no great quantity of land there, and much of it is owned by large landholders, who monoplize it for their parks and in other ways, and do not cultivate it. Farmers' sons, despairing of ever owning a farm, drift into commercial life in the cities, and, being often without capital, swell the already numerous class of employés. Mechanics also put their sons into trade or into clerkships as being an employment more genteel and cleanly than manual labor; and thus the army of employés, who can do nothing but keep accounts or serve behind a counter, is again increased. The market is glutted, and the unemployed sink into poverty. Skilled mechanics, if they are honest, sober, and industrious, are seldom poor, and are rarely out of employment. Newspapers and public speakers, when they hold up the condition of England as a warning to us, are apt to mislead the people by misrepresenting the true cause of the distress now existing in England.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Continue to Enjoy the blessing of God on their London work. Night after night the monster hall is filled to overflowing, and available chapels in the locality have been utilized for overflow meetings. Mr. Scroggie, who helped the evangelists very largely in Scotland, is rendering excellent service again, and many have been led to Christ through his instrumentality. A special effort has been made for the reclamation of drunkards, and Mr. Moody has formed a "Mizpah Band" of those who have been brought to the knowledge of Christ during the mission, which has already commenced operations. The Bible lectures have also been well attended. Many interesting incidents have taken place, which must greatly cheer the hearts of all who are desirous of the success of the mission. One evening an atheist stood up, and publicly proclaimed that his was a false belief, and he visited Mr. Moody in his room for private conversation, which led to his conversion.

Mr. H. M. Stanley, the American Explorer of Africa, is thus referred to in a letter written by Dr. Sims, of the Livingstone Inland Mission, to Mrs. Grattan Guinness, of Harley House, London. He says: "His methods are very kind, wise, and patient. He is working excellently in the interests of the expedition. Without Stanley's expedition, the interior would be, humanly speaking, unopened and dark as ever, as it will yet be if he fails. He works under serious disadvantages, and has much trouble. During the time he has been here, our intercourse has been extremely pleasant. He is so kind, and has given us much important help."

BAKER PASHA—A Scene in the Battle of Teb, in the Soudan.

BAKER PASHA.

The commander of Egyptian troops, of whom an outline portrait appears this week on the first page of The Christian Herald, is said to be the best cavalry officer in Europe. German, French, and Russian officers have all spoken in his praise. His skill, bravery, and gallantry have excited their admiration. He was formerly the colonel of a regiment in the British army, but about ten years ago, he was dismissed, for cause. While travelling in a railroad carriage he insulted a young lady, who was the only person in the compartment beside himself. For this offence he was arrested. He put in a plea of guilty, and was sentenced to pay a fine and to undergo a year's imprisonment. The judge who passed the sentence remarked that he considered it a just sentence, to which any other penalty should not be added. The meaning of his remark was made clear at the end of Colonel Baker's term of imprisonment, when he was dismissed from the army, thus losing an appointment worth more than $5000 a year. It was done, as was publicly stated, at the direct command of the Queen, who was indignant at his conduct. She stated that she would allow no officer, however distinguished, to remain in her service who could be guilty of an act such as that Colonel Baker had committed. It was stated that her uncle, the Duke of Cambridge, who is Commander-in-chief of the British army, begged her to abandon her resolution, as Baker was the finest officer in the army; her son, the Prince of Wales, also pleaded with her on the same ground, but Her Majesty was immovable. So Colonel Valentine Baker was notified that "the Queen had no further occasion for his services." He left England, and offered his sword to the Sultan of Turkey, who readily accepted it. Baker was received with delight by the Turkish monarch, who gave him an important command, and made him a pasha. Since the outbreak of the Egyptian war Baker has served the Khedive of Egypt, by whom he is highly honored.

THE BATTLE OF TEB.

The region of Africa in which the conflict, which occupies so large a space in the newspapers at the present time, is being waged, is called the Soudan. The name bears different meanings, according as it is used by the Arabs or by Egyptians. The former apply it to designate the interior of Africa generally, and, following them, the geographers of Europe have given this name to all the countries along the southern edge of the Great Sahara, from Senegambia and Sierra Leone on the west, to Darfur on the east. Etymologically, Soudan means simply "the Blacks," and is a corruption of the Arabic name Balad-us-Sûdân, "the country of the Blacks."

As employed, however, by the Egyptians, and as referred to in the numerous telegrams lately received from Egypt, "the Soudan" means not the immense tract of Africa just described, but a tract to the east of it, which comprises the countries, except Abyssinia, on both sides of the Nile, south of the second cataract, which have during the last sixty years been formed into an Egyptian province bearing that name.

The dependent province or empire—for, be it understood, the Soudan is not Egypt, any more than Algeria is France—comprises much of Nubia, all Sennaar, all Kordofan, and all Darfur, and has really any length and any breadth that the Pashas can reach. A report recently made, gave its length from north to south, or from Assouan to the Equator, at about 1650 miles, its width, on the same authority, from Massowah, on the Red Sea, to the western limit of the Darfur Province, is from 1200 to 1400 miles. It probably, therefore, does not fall far short, if at all, of the dimensions of India. It is inhabited by two totally distinct races, the northern half by almost pure Arabs, most of them nomad tribes, professing some form of Mohammedanism, and the southern half by negroes, who, though officially classed among Mussulmans, are really pagans, and are, roughly speaking, all sedentary and agricultural.

Up to 1819 the Soudan was divided into a number of petty kingdoms and chieftaincies; but in that year Muhammad Ali, the then Khedive, sent his son Ismail to conquer the country. From that time to the present the Egyptians have gone on extending the borders of their nominal sovereignty, but have never yet managed to obtain an undisturbed footing in any part of the vast territory they claim. The seat of the provincial government is at Khartoum, which can be reached from Cairo, from which it is some 1500 miles distant, by the Nile—the railway stopping short at Assiout, less than 300 miles from Cairo—but the quickest route is by the Red Sea from Suez to Souakim, which may be regarded as the seaport of the Soudan, and thence by a caravan route of about 280 miles to Berber, where the Nile is touched, and from that point southward for about the same distance to Khartoum.

El Mahdi has excited the hopes of the Arabs of the Soudan by representing himself as the deliverer whom the prophecies of the Koran said would appear about this time. They flocked to his standard with enthusiasm, and he has hitherto been able to defeat every army sent against him. General Hicks and his men were massacred, and one stronghold after another fell into his hands. The Khedive sent General Baker to endeavor to relieve Tokar, which the Mahdi was besieging, but Baker was defeated when only one day's march toward Tokar from the sea. The battle in which the Mahdi routed his forces is known as the battle of Teb.

DESCRIPTION BY AN EYE-WITNESS.

The special war correspondent of a leading daily journal thus describes the attack and route of the army:

"Upon the evening of Sunday, February 3d, our force (i.e., the Egyptian force led by Baker Pasha), three thousand six hundred strong, encamped two miles from Trinkitat, the ground having been carefully chosen, and a vigilant watch being kept up all night against surprise. On Monday morning the troops were paraded, and at half-past seven our three hundred baggage camels were ready to move forward. The guns moved in advance of the column, the infantry following them, and the greater part of the cavalry were scattered round in a circle of skirmishers, a half mile or so from the column, thus effectively protecting it from any sudden attack. The Turkish cavalry were in reserve.

"The country was open, but scattered here and there were patches of scrub and thorn, mimosa and other prickly shrubs, which should be at least as impenetrable for naked savages as for well-clad men. The scrub grew thicker as we advanced, but the ground was still open enough for the operations of cavalry, Shortly after eight o'clock parties of

THE MAHDI'S TROOPS WERE SIGHTED.

These retired slowly upon the approach of our cavalry skirmishers, but showed more and more thickly as we advanced. At half-past eight the column halted. A Krupp gun was brought forward and unlimbered, and a few rounds of shell were fired. It was hardly to be expected that any execution would be done upon the scattered parties of the Soudanese, but the effect was to cause them again to fall back.

"The morning was dull, with heavy showers, and just at this time a rain storm burst upon us and greatly obscured our view of the country in front. This was an advantage for the Arabs, who probably regarded it as an interposition of God in their favor, and they now gathered thickly and advanced toward us, and at nine o'clock showed in considerable force on some slightly-rising ground, near the water springs, while on our left front I could see partially concealed amid the hillocks and bushes.

"Our guns again opened fire; but the shell seemed to me to pass over the Arabs' heads. The force was now ordered to advance; but as soon as they got into movement the clumps of spears were no longer to be seen. When our cavalry skirmishers, however, reached the spot they were soon engaged, and could be seen firing wildly in all directions from the saddle.

"Presently about a dozen Arabs, riding bare-backed on wiry little horses, appeared from behind a hillock, and coolly galloped round our right flank, within three hundred yards of our cavalry on that side, running the gauntlet of the latter's fire. They passed scatheless, and as they still kept along parallel to our column, with the evident intention of gauging its strength and disposition, the general ordered the Turkish cavalry to charge them and cut them off. After a hot chase the daring Arab cavalry escaped, but as the Turks rode back again toward the column, they again appeared, and this time galloped across our front, and round to the left.

"While our attention was distracted from the front by this incident, a sudden commotion arose in the midst of our cavalry skirmishers on our left flank. The Mahdi's soldiers must for some time have been lying concealed close to them, and they now sprang to their feet, and with wild cries charged the Egyptian horsemen. These at once turned rein, and came galloping in in a wild and very disorderly fashion.

"Just before this I had ridden along by the infantry column, and saw that it was advancing in the most disorderly manner. There was no sign of discipline or of steadiness; it was tramping along. I at once determined that if the Arabs attacked I would not trust myself among them, for I was convinced that they would break at the first charge. To this resolve I probably owe my life. As the cavalry rode wildly in, the order was given for the infantry to form square—a manœuvre in which they had been daily drilled for weeks. At this crisis, however, the but half-disciplined mass failed to accomplish it. Three sides were formed after a fashion, but on the fourth side two companies of the Alexandria Regiment, seeing the Arab spearmen coming on leaping and brandishing their spears, stood like a panic-stricken flock of sheep, and nothing could get them to move into their place.

"Into the gap thus left in the square the Arabs hotly poured, and at once all became panic and confusion. The troops fired indeed, but for the most part straight into the air. The miserable Egyptian soldiers refused even to defend themselves, but, throwing away their rifles, flung themselves on the ground, and grovelled there, screaming for mercy. No mercy was given, the Arab spearmen pouncing upon them and driving their spears through their necks or bodies. Nothing could well surpass the wild confusion which the mass presented—together, soldiers firing in the air, with wild Arabs, their long hair streaming behind them, darting among them hacking and thrusting with their spears. Cavalry, infantry, mules, camels, falling baggage, and dying men were crushed into a struggling, surging mass. Men were loading and firing into the air or into one another, without aim or object; all were madly shrieking and groaning in abject terror, hardly attempting to run away, but struggling madly to shelter themselves one behind another, and passing into the centre of the square. Shrieks and prayers, soldiers bellowing, camels' screams, mules and horses joining in the deafening noise, the firing and hooting of the rebels, added hideously to the horror of the scene in the square.

"Colonel Sartorious, aided by Maxwell and Bewley, sought to inspire some courage into the soldiers. I saw also for a brief moment Morice Bey and Dr. Leslie side by side. Morice had his revolver ready in his raised hand; Leslie's sword was raised above his head, as though about to strike. Captain Walker was seen on foot struggling, and had been apparently wounded and separated from the guns.

"When the charge had been made by the Mahdi's troops on the left flank, General Baker ith his staff were out with the cavalry in front. Upon riding back they found that the Arabs ad already got between them and the column. hey at once charged them and ut not without several being killed, among iem Abdul Rusac, the chief Egyptian staff fficer. His horse was hamstrung, and as it fell e was instantly speared by the Arabs. On earing the square the general had to run the auntlet of the fire of the Egyptians in front, ho, regardless of what was going on around iem, were blazing away in their front. When ie general reached the square the Arabs had lready broken it up, and it was clear that all as lost.

"It now became a total rout, the shattered olumn streaming across the plain toward rinkitat, preceded by the flying cavalry, the Mahdi's troops pressing hotly on the rear of the nfantry, and slaughtering at will. All mounted ien unable to ride well were dismounted by the ush of the flying horsemen, and killed. When ist seen, Dr. Leslie, Morice Bey, and Captain Walker, with drawn swords and pistols, were anding in a group, surrounded by the rebels, ose to the guns, in the front face of the quare. There also the Turkish Battalion and irty-six Italian policemen were annihilated, arce one escaping. For five miles ere kept up. The Massowah black battalion ehaved well, and for a portion of the distance etired steadily, firing volleys into the Sou anese. Zobeir's blacks were undrilled and hard able to fire their rifles, not having arrived long nough before the advance to enable the officers o get them into any shape. They therefore olted for their lives as promptly as did the gyptians.

"When the earthwork was reached where we ad encamped the night before, the general ade great efforts to protect the rear of the fly ng fugitives by a charge of the Turkish cavalry, ith a few Egyptian horsemen whose flight had een stopped by the officers, but nothing could nduce them to charge. Half a regiment of Ind an cavalry would have swept the plain of the cattered Arabs with the greatest ease. How ver, although the general could not induce the urks to charge, he got them to form in line at he earthwork, and to halt

FACING THE MAHDI'S MEN.

The pursuit then ceased, the Arabs doubtless eing afraid of the fire of the ships, which they uspected were near at hand, but, in fact, no gun oat was in the harbor, the admiral having rdered away the Decoy on the previous day.

"When the pursuit ceased, the weary fugi ives, horse and foot, with many riderless orses here and there among them, made their ay across the two intervening miles of deep nud to Trinkitat. On reaching the shore they ould have crowded into the few boats there nd swamped them, had not the English officers, evolver in hand, kept them back. Then they tood huddled together on the beach like a lock of sheep, and had the Arabs come on, the hole would have been butchered as easily and ith as little resistance as so many sheep might ave been.

"Gradually, as it was found that the Arabs ad really ceased in their pursuit, the panic sub ided.

THE WORK OF EMBARKATION

continued all night long, the general, the Euro pean officers, and the crews of the English ships working unceasingly in getting on board the men, horses, and baggage. Not one Egyptian officer lent his aid to keep order or to help in the work of embarkation.

"By morning all were on board, and we were then able to see what the loss really was. Of the English officers Morice Bey, Dr. Leslie, Captains Forrester, Walker, Carrol Smith, and Watkins, the last named having only joined the day before, were missing, also some ten other foreign officers. Colonel Hay, Majors Harvey and Giles, with Bewley and Burnaby, are safe. Melton Prior, the special artist, was, fortunately, owing to an accident, in hospital, and did not accompany the force. The four guns and the two Gatlings are lost, and so sudden and rapid was the Arabs' onset that the guns and Gatlings could fire but one round; the Egyptian gunners then bolting instantly. The whole of the baggage was lost. The number of is officially estimated at fifteen hundred, but I think that it will be found larger, for, if the Egyptians cannot fight, they can certainly run. Still, the loss cannot be much under two thousand men.

"A good many of the Arabs fell before the revolvers and swords of the European officers, and the Turkish battalion and Italians made a stout fight, and killed a good many of their assailants before they were overpowered. Still, the total must be small indeed in comparison with the loss we have suffered. The enemy's loss is estimated at 600 men.

MANY VERY GALLANT ACTIONS

were done by the European officers, who were all engaged in hand-to-hand struggles with the Mahdi's spearmen. Major Harvey saved his European servant, when exhausted in the fight, by placing him on his horse and running himself on foot beside it.

"The Arabs betrayed the most profound contempt for Egyptian troops, and clearly regarded themselves as invincible. One man would fall upon a score of Egyptian infantry, and a mounted Arab rode single-handed at a troop of our cavalry. He slashed on the back and severely wounded the Egyptian commander, who was too frightened even to attempt to defend himself; but was at last shot by an English officer.

"After such an experience no one here will ever trust themselves in action again with Egyptian troops, except, indeed, with bodies of well-drilled blacks, who only under such circumstances can be relied upon. The Mahdi had not three thousand men in the field, but it must be owned that these came on with all the pluck and gallantry of the Moslems of old. Those of us who saw their long line charge down through the scrub at a steady pace, after uttering a wild whoop, will not soon forget the sight."

ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

In the following incidents, the strictest adherence to facts has been preserved, and it is because these facts have given in the mind of the writer beauty and vivid forcefulness to the Scripture teaching, that he relates them in the hope that they may help to establish the faith of some, and create, under the blessing of God, the same faith in others.

THE WORKMEN'S WAGES.

It was Wednesday night. On Saturday at two o'clock the men must be paid, and though there was plenty of work in hand, it so happened that on none of it could "a draw on account" be made. The young master was much perplexed and troubled, for hitherto he had been helped to keep things going for his mother, who had been bereaved of her husband a year before; but now it began to look like disaster and defeat. True, he had often prayed about other things; but was prayer any use in such prosaic matters as finding workmen's wages? He would try. Laying bare the case before God, he earnestly pleaded that somehow, he knew not how, the needed money might come. Thursday came and still no answer was seen; faith began somewhat to waver, while Satan whispered, "God hath forgotten you." But with desperateness born of dread, prayer was offered again. Friday came, and still no reply, while the thought of Saturday two o'clock and the file of men waiting for their wages began to loom up as a chilling, ghostly possibility. By Friday night torturing fear and tossing doubt struggled with a weak hope that yet God might hear and send relief in time; and again with much of trembling distress he prayed that help might be sent. By the last post on Friday night there came and with foreign postmark. Glancing at it with curiosity, he saw that it had come from Sweden, and had been five days on its way; but when he opened it and saw the contents, what was it that made him go deathly pale and then flush with excitement, his eyes filled with tears?—an order for goods from a perfect stranger of whom he had never heard, and enclosed was a draft for payment beforehand, more than sufficient to cover the wages of the men on the morrow. Was it any wonder that as it flashed upon him that the money had started on Monday though his first prayer for it had not been offered until Wednesday, there burned into his soul as with letters of fire, photographed on his heart as with words of tender, pearl-like light, this text so richly illuminated by the divine faithfulness, "Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear?"

A LETTER IN STRANGE HANDWRITING

RECONCILIATION OF THE MINISTER'S ENEMY.

As a pastor sat in his study busy with letters and thoughts about his work, the cloud of care and sometimes fear might have been seen passing over his face; while now and again, as though agitated by some special anxiety, he would rise from his chair and pace the room, half muttering to himself, half praying to God, "I hope the Lord will overrule all this, and work good out of seeming evil." One of his congregation, taking sudden offence at too outspoken a declaration against sin, too Nathan-like a home-thrust about wrong-doing, had gnashed his teeth in anger, and roundly asserted that the minister "should repent of having so attacked him." Had he left the place and renounced his sitting, there might have been pain at his departure; but it would soon have been over; but no, his power to wound, to malign, to annoy by his very presence would have been gone had he left; and so he stayed, listening only to carp and criticise—stayed to mingle with the people only to undermine the preacher's influence. It was this that sent flitting over the pastor's face, and often the shadows of foreboding falling on his spirit.

It was bad enough for Hezekiah to have Rab-shakeh's letter; but to see Rab-shakeh in the pew, and to know that he mingled with the people, wounding by tongue, and look, and hint, the pastor's character and influence was no small trial. What should the preacher do? Preach at him, and make it too hot for him? Or, remembering his Master's precept, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in doing so thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head;" should he hear and endure, leaving

HIS DEFENCE IN CHRIST'S HANDS?

He resolved upon the latter course, and waited.

One day, meeting another member of the congregation in the street, the pastor was shocked to learn that his old enemy was lying seriously ill, having met with a terrible accident, which it was feared would prove fatal. He hurried away to the house, and was admitted, but the sick man was too feeble and prostrate to be seen; so a message was left promising to call another day. He went with curious, half-fearful feelings, wondering how he would be received, and to his joy found the old anger and hatred were gone, killed by his readiness to help in time of distress. Do you marvel that now the pastor says that in all the Book there is no word, even to him, more lovingly true, more glorious with divine brightness than this, "When a man's ways please the Lord, He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him."

Cyclones are Dreaded Less than Liquor Saloons in a town in Iowa. The Hon. J. B. Grinnell, for whom the town of Grinnell was named, recently said: "In Grinnell there are no sallons, and no one has been sent to jail, to the poor-house, or to the penitentiary for twenty-five years. We can stand a cyclone occasionally, if you will keep whiskey away from us."

TRAGEDY OF TRAGEDIES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 2, 1884.

"And sitting down, they watched him there."—Matt. 27 : 36.

A Murderous Mob—Three Victims—The Scene of the Tragedy—The Spectators—The Soldiers—Nobility of a Soldier's Life—The Dregs of the Army—Their Ruffianly Conduct—The Precious Coat—The Soldiers Raffling it—Official and Clerical Spectators—Judges who Forgot their Dignity—Ministers Taunting a Dying Man—Animosity still Survives—The Railing Thief—His Descendants—Sympathetic Spectators—His Mother—A Sick Child's Request—His Friend Simon—No One Need Bear a Whole Cross—The Penitent Thief—A Group of Friends—An Indian Chief Dying for his Son.

THERE is nothing more wild or ungovernable than a mob. Some of the older people in the audience may remember the excitement in New York during the riot, when the people went howling through the streets at the time Macready stood on the stage of the Astor Place Opera House. Those of you who have read history may remember the excitement in Paris during the time of Louis XVI., and how the mob rushed up and down frantically.

There is

going through the streets of Jerusalem. As it passes along it is augmented by the multitudes that come out from the lanes and the alleys, to join the shouts and the laughter and the lamentation of the rioters, who become more and more ungovernable as they get toward the gates of the city. Fishermen, vagabonds, rude women, grave officials, merchant princes, beggars, mingle in that crowd. They are passing out now through the gates of the city. They come to a hill white with the bleached skulls of victims—a hill that was itself the shape of a skull, covered with skulls, and called Golgotha, which means the place of a skull.

Three men are to be put to death—two for theft, one for treason, having claimed to be King of the Jews. Each one carries his own cross, but one of them is so exhausted from previous hardship that He faints under the burden, and they compel Simon of Cyrene, who is supposed to be in sympathy with the condemned man, to take hold of one end of the cross and help Him carry it. They reach the hill. The three men are lifted in horrid crucifixion. While the mob are howling and mocking and hurling scorn at the chief object of their hate, the darkness hovers and scowls and swoops upon the scene, and the rocks rend with terrific clang, and the choking wind, and moaning cavern, and dropping sky, and shuddering earthquake declare in whisper, in groan, in shriek, "This is the Son of God."

THE SPECTATORS OF THE TRAGEDY.

I propose to speak of the two kinds of spectators around the cross—antagonists and adherents. Among the antagonists were the Roman soldiers. Now, it is a grand thing to serve one's country. There is not an Englishman's heart but thrills at the name of Havelock, brave for Christ and brave for the British Government. When there was a difficult point to take the officers would say, "Bring out the saints of old Havelock." I think if Paul had gone into military service he would have eclipsed the heroism of the Cæsars and the Alexanders and the Napoleons of the world by his bravery and enthusiasm.

There is a time to be at peace and there is a time when a Christian has to fight. I do not know of a graver or braver thing than for a young man, when it is demanded of him, to turn his back upon home and quiet and luxury and, in the service of his country, go forth to camp and field and carnage and martyrdom. It was no mean thing to be a Roman soldier, it was no idle thing. You know what revolutions dashed up against the walls of that empire. You know to what conquest she devoted herself, flinging her war-eagles against the proudest ensigns. But the noblest army has in it sneaks, and these were the men who were detailed from that army to attend to the execution of Christ. Their dastardly behavior puts out the gleam of their spears and covers their banner with obloquy. They were cowards.

THEY WERE RUFFIANS.

They were gamblers. No noble soldier would treat a fallen foe as they treated the captured Christ.

Generally there is respect paid to the garments of the departed. It may be only a hat or a coat or a shoe, but it goes down in the family wardrobe from generation to generation. Now that Christ is to be disrobed, who shall have His coat? Joseph of Arimathea would have liked to have had it. Mary, the mother of Jesus, would have liked to have had it. How fondly she would have hovered over it, and when she must leave it with what tenderness she would have bequeathed it to her best friend! It was the only covering of Christ in darkness and storm. That was the very coat that the woman touched when from it there went out virtue for her healing. That was the only wedding garment He had in the marriage at Cana, and the storms that swept Galilee had drenched it again and again. And what did they do with it? They raffled for it. We have heard of men who gambled away their own garments, who gambled away their children's shoes, who gambled away the family Bible, who gambled away their wife's last dress; but it adds to the ghastliness of a Saviour's humiliation and the horror of the crime, when I hear Jesus in His last moments declaring, "They parted my garments among them, and for my vesture did they cast lots."

THE OFFICIALS AND CLERGY.

In this antagonistic group around the cross also were the rulers and the scribes and the chief priests. Lawyers and judges and ministers of religion in this day are expected to have some respect for their offices. In this land, where the honors of the judiciary sometimes come to besotted politicians and men noted for drunkenness—even in this land where we live, it is an unheard-of thing that a judge comes down from the bench and strikes a prisoner in the face. No minister of religion would scoff at or mock a condemned criminal. And yet the great men of that land seemed to be equal to any ruffianism. They were vying with each other as to how much scorn and billingsgate they could cast into the teeth of the dying Christ. Why, the worst felon, when his enemy has fallen, refuses to strike him. But these men were not ashamed to strike Jesus when He was down.

So it has been in all ages of the world, that there have been men in high positions who despise Christ and His Gospel. What tyrants have issued their anathemas! What judgment seats have kindled their fires! What Inquisitions have sharpened their swords! "Not this man but Barabbas. Now, Barabbas was a robber." Against the Christian religion have been brought the historical genius of Gibbon, and the polish of Shaftesbury, and the kingly authority of Frederick of Prussia, and the brilliancy of John, Earl of Rochester, and the stupendous intellect of Voltaire. Innumerable pens have stabbed it, and innumerable books have cursed it, and that mob that hounded Christ from Jerusalem to "the place of a skull" has never been dispersed, but is augmenting yet, as many of the learned men of the world and great men of the world come out from their studios and their laboratories and their palaces and cry, "Away with this man! Away with him!" The most bitter hostility which many of the learned men of this day exercise in any direction they exercise against Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, without whom we will die forever.

In this group of enemies surrounding the cross I also find

THE RAILING THIEF.

It seems that he twisted himself on the spikes; he forgot his own pain in his complete antipathy to Jesus. I do not know what kind of a thief he was. I do not know whether he had been a burglar or a pickpocket or a highwayman; but our idea of his crimes is aggravated when we hear him blaspheming the Redeemer. Oh, shame indescribable! Oh, ignominy insupportable! Hissed at by a thief!

In that ridicule I find the fact that there is a hostility between sin and holiness. There cannot be, there never has been, any sympathy between honesty and theft, between purity and lasciviousness, between zeal and indolence, between faith and unbelief, between light and darkness, between heaven and hell. And when I see a good man going out to discharge his duty, and he is enthusiastic for Christ, and I see persecution after him, and scorn after him, and contempt after him, I say, "Hark! another hiss of the dying thief!" And when I see Holiness going forth in her white robes and Charity with great heart and open hand to take care of the sick and help the needy and restore the lost, and I find her lashed with hypercriticism and jostled of the world and pursued from point to point and caricatured with low witticisms, I say, "Aha! another hiss of the dying thief!"

It is a sad thing to know that this malefactor died just as he had lived. People nearly always do. Have you never remarked that? There is but one instance mentioned in all the Bible of a man repenting in the last hour. All the other men who lived lives of iniquity, as far as we can understand from the Bible, died deaths of iniquity. If you live a drunkard's life you will die a drunkard; the defrauder dies a defrauder; the idler dies an idler; the blasphemer dies a blasphemer; the slanderer dies a slanderer; the debauchee dies a debauchee. As you live you will die, in all probability. Do not, therefore, make your soul believe that you can go on in a course of sin and then in the last moment repent. There is such a thing as death-bed repentance, but I never saw one, I never saw one. God in all this Bible presents us only one case of that kind, and it is not safe to risk it, lest our case should happen not to be the one amid ten thousand.

SYMPATHETIC SPECTATORS.

But there were rays of light that streamed into the crucifixion. As Christ was on the cross and looked down on the crowd of people He saw some very warm friends there. And that brings me to the remarking of the group of adherents that were around the cross. The first in all that crowd was

HIS MOTHER.

You need not point her out to me. I can see by the sorrow, the anguish, the woe, by the upthrown hands! That all means mother! "Oh," you say, "why didn't she go down to the foot of the hill and sit with her back to the scene? It was too horrible for her to look upon." Do you not know when a child is in anguish or trouble it always makes a heroine of a mother? Take her away, you say, from the cross. You cannot drag her away. She will keep on looking; as long as her son breathes, she will stand there looking. What a scene it is for a tender-hearted mother to look upon! How gladly she would have sprung to His relief! It was her son. Her son! How gladly she would have clambered up on the cross and hung there herself if her son could have been relieved! How strengthening she would have been to Christ if she might have come close by Him and soothed Him!

There was a good deal in what the little sick child said, upon whom a surgical operation must be performed! The doctor said, "That child won't live through this operation unless you encourage him. You go in and get his consent." The father told him all the doctor said, and added, "Now, John, will you go through it? Will you consent to it?" He looked very pale, and he thought a minute, and said, "Yes, father, if you will hold my hand, I will!" So the father held his hand and led him straight through the peril.

O woman, in your hour of anguish, whom do you want with you? Mother. Young man, in your hour of trouble, whom do you want to console you? Mother. If the mother of Jesus could have only taken those bleeding feet into her lap! If she might have taken the dying head on her bosom! If she might have said to Him, "It will soon be over, Jesus, it will soon be over, and we will meet again, and it will be all well." But no; she dared not come up so close. They would have struck her back with their hammers. They would have kicked her down the hill. There can be no alleviation at all. Jesus must suffer and Mary must look.

I suppose she thought of the birth-hour in Bethlehem. I suppose she thought of that time when, with her boy in her bosom, she hastened on in the darkness in the flight toward Egypt. I suppose she thought of His boyhood when He was the joy of her heart. I suppose she thought of the thousand kindnesses He had done her, not forsaking her or forgetting her even in His last moments; but turning to John, and saying, "There is mother, take her with you. She is old now. She cannot help herself. Do for her just as I would have done for her if I had lived. Be very tender and gentle with her. Behold thy mother!" She thought it all over, and there is no memory like a mother's memory, and there is no woe like a mother's woe.

There was another friend in that group, and that was the Cyrenian. He was a stranger in the land, but had been long enough there to show his favoritism for Christ. I suppose he was one of those men who never can see anybody imposed upon but he wants to help him. "Well, Simon," they cried out, "you are such a friend to Jesus, help Him to carry the cross. You see Him fainting under it." So he did. A scene for all the ages of time and all the cycles of eternity; a cross with Jesus at the one end of it and Simon at the other, suggesting the idea to you, O troubled soul, that no one need ever carry a whole cross. You have only half a cross to carry. If you are in poverty, Jesus was poor and He comes and takes the other end of the cross. If you are in persecution, Jesus was persecuted and He comes and takes the other end of the cross. If you are in any kind of trouble, you have a sympathizing Redeemer.

Oh, how the truth flashed upon my soul this morning! Jesus at one end of the cross and the soul at the other end of the cross; and when I see Christ and Simon going up the hill together, I say we ought to help each other to carry our burdens. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." If you find a man in persecution or sickness or in business trouble, go right to him and say, "My brother, I have come to help you. You take hold of one end of the cross and I will take hold of the other end of the cross, and Jesus Christ will come in and take hold of the middle of the cross; and after awhile there will be no cross at all."

"Shall Jesus bear the cross alone,
And all the world go free?
No; there is a cross for every one,
And there is a cross for me."

THE PENITENT THIEF.

But there was another marked personage in that friendly group. That was the penitent malefactor. He was a thief, or had been—no disguising that fact. What was he to do? "Oh," he says, "what shall I do with my sins upon me?" and he looks around and sees Jesus and sees compassion in His face, and he says, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." What did Jesus do? Did He turn and say, "You thief! I have seen all your crimes and you have jeered and scoffed at me; now die forever"—did He say that? Oh no; Jesus could not say that. He says, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

I sing the song of mercy for the chief of sinners. Murderers have come and plunged their red hands in this fountain and they have been made white as snow. The prodigal that was off for twenty years has come back and sat at his father's table. The ship that has been tossed in a thousand storms floats into this harbor. The parched and sun-struck soul comes under the shadow of this rock. Tens of thousands who were as bad as you and I have ever been have put down their burdens and their sins at the feet of this blessed Jesus.

"The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day;
And there may I, as vile as he,
Wash all my sins away."

A GROUP OF FRIENDS.

But there was another group of adherents. I do not know their names—we are not told; but we are simply told there were many around the cross who sympathized with the dying sufferer. Oh, the wail of woe that went through that crowd when they saw Jesus die! You know the Bible says if all the things Jesus did were recorded, the world would not contain the books that would be written. It implies that what we have in the Bible are merely specimens of the Saviour's mercy. We are told that one blind man got his eyesight. I suppose He cured twenty that we are not told of. When He cured the one leper, whose story is recorded, He might have cured twenty lepers. Where He did one act of kindness mentioned, He must have done a thousand we do not know about.

I see those who received kindnesses from Him standing beneath the cross, and one says: "Why, that is the Jesus that bound up my broken heart!" And another, standing beneath the cross, says: "That is the Jesus that restored my daughter to life." Another looks up and says: "Why, that is the Jesus who gave me my eyesight." And another looks up and says: "That is the Jesus who lifted me up when I was sick; oh, I can't bear to see Him die!" Every pelt of the hammer drove a spike through their hearts. Every groan of Christ opens a new fountain of sorrow.

They had better get on with that crucifixion quickly, or it will never take place. These disciples will seize Christ and snatch Him from the grasp of those bad men, and take those ringleaders of the persecution and put them up in the very place. Be quick with those nails! Be quick with that gall! Be quick with those spikes, for I see in the sorrow and the wrath of these disciples a storm brewing that will burst on the heads of those persecutors.

To-day we come and

of adherents. Who wants to be on the wrong side? I cannot bear to be among the antagonists. I want to join the other group. We come while they are bewailing, and join their lamentations. We see that brow bruised; we hear that dying groan; and while the priests scoff and the devils rave and the lightnings of God's wrath are twisted into a wreath for that bloody mount, you and I will join the cry, the supplication of the penitent malefactor, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into thy kingdom." Oh, the pain, the ignominy, the ghastliness, the agony, and yet the joy, the thrilling, bounding, glorious hope! Son of Mary! Son of God! Is there one here who will reject this atonement made for the people—not for one man here and one man there, but for all who will accept it?

There was a very touching scene among an Indian tribe in the last century. It seemed that one of the chieftains had slain a man belonging to an opposite tribe, and that tribe came up and said: "We will exterminate you, unless you surrender the man who committed that crime." The chieftain who did the crime stepped out from the ranks and said: "I am not afraid to die; but I have a wife and four children, and I have a father aged and a mother aged whom I support by hunting, and I sorrow to leave them helpless." Just as he said that his old father from behind stepped out and said: "He shall not die. I take his place. I am old and well stricken in years. I can do no good. I might as well die. My days are almost over. He cannot be spared. Take me." And they accepted the sacrifice. Wonderful sacrifice, you say. But not so wonderful as that found in the Gospel; for we deserved to die, ay, we were sentenced, when Christ, not worn out with years, but in the flush of his youth, said: "Save that man from going down to the pit.

I AM THE RANSOM!

Put his burdens on my shoulders. Let his stripes fall on my back. Take my heart for his heart. Let me die that he may live." Shall it be told to-day in heaven that, notwithstanding all these wounds and all that blood and all those tears and all that agony, you would not accept Him? O Lord Jesus, we accept Thee! We accept Thee now. There is no hand in all this audience lifted to smite Thee on the cheek now. No one will spear Thee now. No one will strike Thee now. Come in, Lord Jesus! Come quickly!

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Revolvers in School.—An Illustration of the pernicious effects of the dime-novel class of literature is reported from Philadelphia. On February 28th the teacher of a school in that city called up a boy ten years old from his desk. As he passed through the school one after another of the boys, about his own age, said to him, "Remember your oath." The teacher asked the boy to give her his pistol, and at length succeeded in obtaining from him a seven-chambered revolver. His companions were similarly armed, and some of them added a bowie-knife to their accoutrements. They had formed an oath-bound organization, which they called "the Philadelphia Cow-boys." It was their intention to move westward in the summer to kill Indians and capture treasure. They held their meetings in the cellar of a house belonging to the parents of one of the boys. The parents were visiting in New York, and in their absence the boys had constructed tents in the cellar out of the blankets from the beds, and they practised shooting, throwing the lasso, and hurling knives at a mark. One of the boys was suspected of treachery, and the captain of the gang, a boy ten years old, held a loaded revolver to his head until he promised to reveal nothing. The boys wanted to be heroes, and they were preparing to follow the examples held up for their admiration. It is a pity that such boys were not led to aspire to moral heroism. There is a fine sphere for that in the world (Prov. 16 : 32).

An Aged Man Frozen in the Rigging of a sunken schooner was dragged off by main force by a party of gallant rescuers on February 29th. The schooner struck the rocks off New Haven, Conn., late on the previous night, and the crew climbed into the rigging for refuge. There, with the thermometer almost at zero and with a bitter wind blowing, which deluged them every few minutes with icy water, they passed the night. The next morning they were seen from the shore, and a tug was sent to their relief. The tug went as near the rocks as the captain dared, and then a yawl was lowered and rowed by four brave men to the wreck. The yawl was skilfully guided between the masts of the wrecked schooner, and one after another the poor creatures in the rigging dropped into it as the waves carried it under them. One man alone remained, but he did not drop into the yawl. Fearing that all the lives might be sacrificed if they waited longer, the crew of the yawl pulled for the tug, leaving the man, a poor, white-haired old fellow, seventy years of age, still in the rigging. He cried bitterly against their deserting him, but as he did not jump they were obliged to leave him. At a later hour a larger yawl was sent with eight men in her, and then it was found that the man was frozen to the rigging and had to be dragged off, being powerless to liberate himself. Some souls are similarly saved. Satan holds them so firmly that they have not power to fall into the arms of Jesus, but they cry to Him, and He releases them (Luke 4 : 35).

THE POINT OF APPEAL.

(From the Episcopal Recorder.)

IT must be manifest to every intelligent student of the Word of God that its point of appeal is not the certainty of death, but the Lord's second coming. We suppose that every clergyman of much experience could very safely indorse the pointed testimony of a faithful and honored minister of Christ, made to us some years ago, that he was never conscious of making "so little headway in proclaiming the truth as when death and the certainty of death was his theme."

It was a striking declaration. And one which at first thought, we would scarcely expect. One would think that the appeal would be resistless.

But we do not find it so. Men's hearts grow cold beneath it, and they sullenly close them against its touch. On the other hand it is the second coming of the Lord that is everywhere used as the instrument of arousing careless souls, and of comforting the believer.

If the Master asks, "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" or, "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" the reason assigned is,

"For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels, and then shall He reward every man according to his works." (Matt. 16 : 26–27.)

Are men commanded to repent? It is "because He appointed a day in which He will judge the world in righteousness."

Are believers exhorted to holiness of life? It is because "that when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming." "Ye come behind in no gift waiting for the coming of the Lord from heaven!"

Everywhere this is the point of appeal. The position of this great truth is of great and commanding importance. It stands alone in its power to arouse the careless, to comfort the mourner, to incite to purity and holiness of life, and to exalt the Saviour and His cross!

And we cannot substitute death for this glorious hope of the coming of the Lord; for between no two things could there be a greater contrast. Even to the believer death is a humiliation. Of the body of every one who goes down to the grave it is said, "It is sown in dishonor." Death is a season of unnatural separation between the body and the spirit within it; but the coming of the Lord is a time of blessedness and glory. It puts an end to this separation. It brings body and spirit together again, but not as they were before. It unites a sinless soul to a new and glorified body.

There is hope in the believer's death. There is the future of blessedness and glory for him at the coming of the Lord. The one event frees him from toil. The other introduces him to the "inheritance of the saints in light." Death breaks the chains of sin, while the coming of the Lord makes him perfect in his Saviour's likeness. The one event puts a period to his warfare. The other gives him a crown. One sees his body laid in the tomb, while the other finds it made like unto Christ's glorified Body. The grave, the spade, and the worm attend the one, while light, and glory, and blessedness, the glory of the Saviour's presence, and the companionship of His saints, are the incidents of the other. They can no more change places in the believer's regards, than the one can be substituted for the other in the Word of God. He has put them asunder, and no man can bring them together.

Nor will it do to say as so many do say, "Well, practically it makes no difference. For death is the coming of the Lord to each one of us!"

Now this is an equivocation, and not the honest statement of a truth. Death is not the coming of the Lord to any one. And to take refuge in a subterfuge like that, is to place ourselves out of harmony with the truth, cut ourselves off from its enlightening, comforting and strengthening power, and think and speak and live in opposition to it. Death is the penalty of sin, and the coming of the Lord is the season of its perfect overthrow! How then can any one think of them, or speak of them, as practically one event?

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Wife's Dying Testimony.—At a Recent meeting a man rose and said: "I had the joy of leading my young wife to Jesus; she is now with Him and seeing Him face to face. I stood over the bed as she was passing away. I had read many anecdotes of dying testimony for Jesus, and longed that she would give some sign that she was resting in Jesus. I prayed that God would grant me this boon. Hardly had I opened my eyes, and put my hand on the bed, than she said, while a sweet smile lighted up her face, 'I see it! I see it! farewell to the world,' and my wife went to be with Jesus. As I went down the stairs for the undertaker, I praised the Lord with my whole heart, though my eyes were blinded with tears. Though all my children follow her, I will still praise the Lord."

A Fast Young Man's Career Changed.—The Rev. M. Ewing relates: "In one of our after-meetings some short time ago, I dealt personally with a young man who had been going on in the brutal life of 'a man about town,' though I did not know it at the time. He refused to pray for mercy, and professed that he didn't believe in anything about God's love or Christ's salvation. While I was speaking, the Holy Spirit strove with him, and he broke down, as though God had taken the iron will of the young man and snapped it in two. He cried out, 'God, be merciful to me a sinner!' in loud tones of deep anguish. His misery was something awful to witness. His pride and nonsense were knocked out of him. God heard his agonized prayer, and enabled him to enter into peace through faith in Christ as his Saviour and Lord."

"A Lazy Lamp-Post Loafer was Spoken to by a Christian worker, who said, 'Are you going to heaven or hell?' 'I am not going to heaven, that's sure,' was the answer. 'Then you must be going to hell?' 'Yes; but I want to go to heaven, though.' 'Are you willing to turn from your sins?' 'Yes, if I am able to do it.' 'You have not strength to do it yourself; but God has promised to give you grace and strength to enable you to give up everything for Christ's sake.' 'How am I to get it?' was the anxious, almost agonized, inquiry. 'In the same way as you get any other gift, by accepting the pardon of your sins.' Before they parted, the man had decided for Christ. Three weeks previously his wife had unreservedly given herself to the Lord. They now began family worship, and still carry it on, and enjoy it greatly.

A Passionate Lover of Pleasure has Become a lover of God, and says: "Two years ago I entered Glasgow, intending to have my fill of pleasure, as I would be free from the restraints of home and friends. I tried every theatre in the city, and these beginning to pall upon me, I went to the ball rooms; but although the hours passed quickly and I was in a state of pleasurable excitement in these places, yet the languid weariness which followed was the reverse of pleasant. I got acquainted with another young man in the shop, who invited me to his home. His parents were godly people, and often spoke of Jesus to us, though I always wished I was anywhere but in their house when they spoke of Him. They were not content with speaking, but at meetings sent in requests for prayer on our behalf, and got their son and myself to attend the meetings. My companion was the first to surrender himself to Christ; and then he spoke to me about his conversion, and urged me to give my heart to Christ. I was now in a very troubled state of mind, and was almost yielding. One night after the usual meeting, a workingman spoke to me. I went home to my lodgings, shut my room door, threw myself on my knees, and pleaded with the Lord to have mercy upon me. That night the peace of God came upon me through believing, and since then I know what it is to be happy indeed. I have the joy of the Lord's salvation."

A Once Deluded Man, who has Been Cured of his delusion, thus testified: "Eighteen months ago I never prayed. I felt afraid of being a Christian; the devil preventing me by saying that only hypocrites pretended to be Christians. I was roused to a knowledge of my state, and became very anxious, till I decided for Jesus. The morning after, I wakened from my sleep quite calm in mind. Before my conversion, if anything went wrong with me I used to throw the chairs about the house, and cut up rough generally. On going to my work I heard a laboring man, as he was entering the gate, swear dreadfully. On the impulse of the moment I said to him, 'You are early at that work this morning,' and then I preached Christ crucified. From that time to this I never had a rough word said to me about my religion, because all see that I am not ashamed of the Gospel. The men in the works, both Catholics and Protestants, will do anything for me; they know I am their friend."

Effect of the Doctor's Verdict.—"I Have Seen a mother stretched on a sick-bed with her children all round her. The doctor called, made a few inquiries, felt her pulse, shook his head, and looked doubtful. The patient, with quick intention, read the signs and inquired, 'Well, doctor, what do you think of me to-day?' 'Well, ma'am, it's my duty to inform you that you cannot last beyond ten days or even a much shorter time.' What do you think was the mother's first thought? About herself? No, it was 'How can I so live and act during my last hours that my children may be impressed with the name of Jesus, that they may associate my name with His, and so connect us, that when they think of one they will think of the other.' This dying mother showed the true spirit of Christ in forgetting self in her deep love for the Saviour and her children."

A Sceptic's Idle Vaunt.—The Rev. Mr. Ross related: "An infidel and a Christian had occasion to meet together, and began to discuss the Bible. The Christian had a son who had gone far astray, to the great grief of his parent. The sceptic, after a little, began, 'So, you do really believe all the Bible teaches?' 'Yes.' 'You have a son whom you trained in what you think is the right way?' 'Yes.' 'Your son has gone wrong?' 'Yes, I am sorry to say that he has.' 'Then the Bible is not true, for it says, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it" (Prov. 22 : 6). What do you say to that? You trained your son right, yet he has gone wrong.' The Christian was silenced, but far from convinced. Meeting a wiser Christian next day, he told the story of his defeat by the sceptic, adding, 'The worst of it is that he went away thinking there was no answer possible.' His friend said, 'Read the verse again, "Train up a child in the way he should go."' What way should he go? from sin to salvation, from darkness to light. Is that not it?' 'Oh yes, I see it now, my son has never been converted.'. The boy has since been drawn to Christ as his Saviour, and is a living refutation of the sceptic's folly."

A Highlander's Prayer in a Quarry.—An earnest Christian says: "I was born in the West Highlands of respectable, God-fearing parents. When I was still a mere boy I ran away from home, and joined the army. In a short time I imbibed infidel views, and held on to them for fourteen years. When I got my discharge from the army, I lived an awful life. Often I had not a stitch of clothes to put on my back, and what is worse, I did not require any. In course of time I got married, and picked myself up for a time. I joined the 'Good Templars,' and was pretty sober for awhile; but I went among my old companions, and fell away till I was as bad as ever, if not worse. One day my little girl went out in perfect health, to all appearance, but was brought home to her mother a corpse. When I saw the dear girl's body lying in the stillness of death, I said, 'If there is a God, He is a cruel God, or He could not take away my little girl.' After that I went to pieces with drink, and was so far gone that my wife left me. One Sunday I met a friend, who advised me to come with him to Miss Todd's meeting in Glasgow. I went, and after the meeting Miss Todd spoke to me personally. Her words stuck to me, so that I could not get rid of them. On my way home I went across some fields, when all at once I saw the truth quite plain. Being near an old quarry, I rushed into it, and, falling on my knees, prayed to God. Blessed be the Lord, I felt my sins were washed away in the precious blood of Christ."

CHRIST'S KINGDOM A LITERAL KINGDOM.

By Rev. J. Denham Smith.

The Saviour the Predicted Deliverer—Stumbles in Interpretation—The Only True Principle—Important Distinction in Periods—The Error of the Jews—Corresponding Error of the Church—The Inquiry of the Disciples—The Kingdom yet to Come—The Order of Events—A Literal Return of the Jews—Their Present Condition—The Husband of the Nation.

THE Deliverer to come out of Zion is none other than the Messiah-Saviour, whose whole course, as such, though extending over thousands of years, is told in a few words in Isa. 9 : 6, where it is said, "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given : and the government shall be upon His shoulder : and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." How is it that so many stumble as to the true principle of interpreting prophecy? Some looking to the first portion of this passage, say, "Oh, that has been accomplished—literally so!" but regard the latter part of the passage as having a spiritual and not a literal fulfilment. But no ; why make the difference? All, I believe, will be literally accomplished. Christ's kingdom will be a literal kingdom. The literal is of interpretation ; let any one think how everything of prophecy hitherto fulfilled has been fulfilled literally. But not all at once. What is so plainly predicted in this verse is for different periods. Already near two thousand years have intervened between "the Child born" and the times when "the government shall be upon His shoulder."

The ancients had a saying, remarks Hugh McNeile, "Distinguish the periods and the Scriptures will harmonize." The Jew had so fastened his attention on one portion of the prophecies that he saw but one period—the glorious period of Messiah's reign ; and the Church has for centuries so fixed its attention on one part of the prophecies only that it saw but one period—the coming of the Messiah to be crucified. Jewish prejudices arose from partial attention to the prophecies, and Christian prejudices have arisen from partial attention to the prophecies. It should be our privilege to and while we maintain, as Christians, the literal fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy of the Virgin's Child, and the birth at Bethlehem as foretold by Micah, and therefore that the Messiah has come, we ought to maintain also, with the Jews, the literal interpretation of Isaiah's prophecy, that the Messiah shall reign at Jerusalem ; and the prophecy of Micah, that Jerusalem shall be chief of the nations, and therein to believe with the Jews that the Messiah shall come.

CHRIST HAS COME, AND HE SHALL COME.

Surely this was the real nature and genius of what the angels said to the disciples, as may be read in Acts 1. The disciples in astonishment saw their divine Master carried up into the air from them, and disappearing in the cloud ; and, while they were looking up in amazement, two angels appeared, and said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?"

THIS SAME JESUS SHALL SO COME

as ye have seen Him go." Was that calculated to abate their astonishment at the miracle which had taken place? Nay, but it was to assert another miracle. How then shall we interpret the incident? What was the basis and ground of their astonishment? I think it very plain and instructive. They had learned unmistakably that Jesus was the Messiah ; they were present when they heard Peter's confession and the remarkable approbation which was expressed of it by the Lord Jesus ; they knew then that He was the Messiah, the One that was to come, and they expected great things for their nation ; they knew that a number of the prophecies, still unfulfilled, were connected with the Messiah's name ; they were looking for them, and when He was taken from them, and put to death, their expectations were dashed to the ground.

When, however, they saw Him again after the resurrection, their expectations revived, and they said, "Wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?"—Wilt Thou finish it all now? And when He had given them an answer, not, indeed, to reject their idea that the kingdom would be restored, but only to tell them the time was not for them to know—when He had done this, He was suddenly taken up from among them, and they were

What were they ready to say within their own minds and hearts? "After all, is He not the Messiah? Is it possible that we were wrong? And if He be, How can He have gone away, leaving so much undone that was predicted of the Messiah? He has done enough to assure us that He is the Messiah. He has fulfilled some prophecies—at His word the deaf man heard ; at His word the tongue of the dumb man sang ; at His word the lame man leaped for joy ; at His word the dead has come to life. He must be the Messiah ; and yet He is gone! no kingdom restored to Israel! no reigning at Jerusalem! There was ground for astonishment, and in that state of astonishment the angels addressed them—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" as if He had left undone what had been promised. Do not imagine that all is to be done at one time. "Distinguish the periods." He is gone, it is true, but He is not gone forever. That same Jesus whom you have seen go "shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

Hence the kingdom will yet come. As to what will be the several steps toward its formation are : First, "The Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left" (Isa. 11 : 11). Note, they have never yet been restored a "second time." He "shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth" (Isa. 11 : 12). Note again, they were never in the four corners of the earth until the time of this dispensation. "And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord" (Amos 9 : 15). This obviously is not yet. The planting of them is still future, when it shall be said, "The King of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee : thou shalt not see evil any more" (Zeph. 3 : 15).

Wonderful to a simple student of the Word that such a one as Macaulay should have said, as if it were something strange : "The Christian believes, as well as the Jew, that at some future period the present order of things will come to an end. Nay, many Christians believe that the Messiah will reign visibly over a kingdom on the earth. The number of people who hold it is much greater than the number of Jews residing in England, many of them distinguished by rank, ability, etc. They expect that the kingdoms of the earth will be swallowed up in one divine empire." Certainly! No intelligent Christian could read prophecy without seeing that He who suffered would reign, and that as the sufferings were literal, so also the reign.

The question is, How do we read? and what is

THE OBJECT OF PROPHECY?

We do not read prophecy that we may subject it to our own opinion. No ; all its ideas are absolute ; the splendors and shades of heaven and hell are in them, not as candidates for our opinion, but for our acceptance. Nor do we read to put, each one, a construction of our own on what we read, or to see that God is true ; we know He is true. We read that we may learn His ways and know His will, so as to have our minds, our lives, and expectations all adjusted thereto. Yet much that God has foretold of the Jewish people is history now, and so His unchanging truth is obviously and unmistakably seen. It was foretold that Messiah would be "cut off" (rejected), "and," as to His kingdom at His first Coming, "have nothing ;" it was foretold that His people in the last days should be scattered over all lands ; that their existence as a nation should cease, their temple be thrown down, their city lie in heaps. This is what we see in each particular.

Before our eyes, in every land under the sun, the Jews are seen, a homeless and, often just now, a suffering people—a people distinct from, and as not belonging to, any one nation in which they are exiles. They form a sort of international nation, an element inassimilable by the European and other nations among which they dwell. They mix with the people of all lands over the face of the whole earth, but are not of them. Truly they are living witnesses of the foreknowledge, the truth, and the righteousness of God, and of how the literal is the only true principle for interpreting what God has said concerning them. Agreeable to what other prophets have said, our seer sings of a time far different to the present—the time of

A COMING GLORY.

He says, "I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her"—that is, He will speak to her heart—"and I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope ; and she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt."

But in those days it will not be as a mere Master that He will reveal Himself to them. He says, "It shall be at that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call me Ishi" (that is, "my Husband") ; "and shalt call me no more Baali." Baal (my Lord) by which title that false god was known. God says He will put into her mouth the tenderer word of love—Ishi—literally "my man," the title of love for one who is a husband (chap. 2 : 16). And He will never rest till they know His desire, and are to Him all that His heart could conceive. And what His heart has conceived is thus tenderly told : "Thou shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more. For thy Maker is thy Husband ; the Lord of hosts is His name. . . . The Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God. . . . Oh, thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, in righteousness shalt thou be established." "Thus saith the Lord, I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals."

"I AM MARRIED UNTO YOU."

All this respecting the nation and kingdom on the earth, not in disagreement with, but in contrast to, the glory of the kingdom which is heavenly, and which will be possessed by raised and glorified saints, who will in another aspect of blessedness form the Bride, the Lamb's wife, whose scene will be, as we shall see, not on the earth, but in the heavens. She will come down from God out of heaven. Let any one read Hosea 2 : 14 ; Isa. 60 ; Rev. 3 : 12 ; 21 : 2–10, and 22, and they will see this blessed, ineffable, bridal love applied not only to the nation in its Millennial blessedness, but also and especially to the glorious risen saints, whose home at that time will be in the city in the heavens.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Important Changes are to be Made in Mr. Morrison's Tariff bill before it is reported to the House. A well-informed Washington correspondent telegraphed to his journal on Friday that Mr. Morrison is disappointed with the reception his bill has met with in the country. Although in offering to extend the free list so as to include many raw materials which it was believed the manufacturers would be glad to get free of duty, there has been no response from the men whom this change was intended to benefit. In view of this apparent indifference, and as the users of raw material are those to be most directly affected by the extension of the free list proposed by the bill as introduced, Mr. Morrison has concluded to include all the articles named in his free list among the other articles upon which the twenty per cent reduction is to be operative, and to add only coal, salt, and lumber to the free list. Both Democrats and Republicans appear to be afraid, as a party, of adopting the tariff issue. The question to be decided is whether duties shall continue to be levied on importations from foreign lands for protective purposes, or for revenue only. That is to say, whether an article manufactured abroad and brought here, shall be sold to the people at the importer's price, or whether the government shall, by imposing a duty upon it, compel him to sell it at a higher price. The inducement to adopt the latter course is the hope that the public will buy domestic manufactures rather than the foreign article, which, having paid the cost of transportation and custom-house duties, must be sold at a higher price than the article manufactured here.

The President Sent the First Report of the Civil Service Commission to Congress on February 29th. It makes a bulky volume of sixty-seven pages, the commissioners explaining that they thought the first report from a new branch of the executive service, the purpose and methods of which are by many misunderstood, should present all the facts and explanations needed for a correct judgment. The commissioners express their own gratification at the result of their labors. They think the general acquiescence in the new system will render the future enforcement of the statute easy. They report that the clauses of the law relating to political assessment have only been violated in two or three instances. The prediction that college boys would get all the places is falsified by the statement that more than half of the applicants for examinations were educated in the common schools, and that the average age of those who stood the test of the examinations was thirty-two years. On the whole, the commissioners think no change is needed in the Civil Service act for fairly testing the new system. In closing, they say: "It is proper for the commission to declare that in every stage of its work it has had the constant and unwavering support of the President." With the report, the President sent to Congress a message in which he said: "The report is transmitted together with communications from the heads of the several executive departments of the government respecting the practical working of the law under which the commission has been acting. Upon the good results which that law has already accomplished, I congratulate Congress and the people, and I avow my conviction that it will henceforth prove to be of still more signal benefit to the public service. I heartily commend the zeal and fidelity of the commissioners and their suggestions for further legislation, and I advise the making of such an appropriation as shall be adequate for their needs."

The Senate Passed, without Debate, the Following joint resolution on February 26th, thanking the British Government for the gift of the steamer Alert: "Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives, That the act of Her Britannic Majesty's Government in presenting to the United States Government the Arctic steamship Alert, which will be used in the contemplated expedition to relieve Lieutenant Greely and his party, is recognized as opportune and generous, and is deeply appreciated by the Congress and people of the United States. That the President be, and he is hereby requested to communicate a copy of this resolution to Her Britannic Majesty's Government." The same resolution was introduced in the House, but it was tabled, as an objection was entered by Mr. Robinson, a man whom Brooklyn sends to represent her in Congress.

A Flurry in Financial Circles was Caused last week by the shipments of gold. The following explanation of it is given by a leading financial authority: "The unsafe policy of continuing to manufacture silver dollars, which nobody wants, at the rate of $28,000,000 a year has brought us to the verge of a disturbance of the currency. During the past eleven months the banks have taken from the Sub-Treasury $146,344,000 in gold certificates. But one third of the current payments of customs dues at this port are in silver certificates. Thus, while the outflowing stream is gold, the source of supply is contaminated with the undesirable silver. This has brought the Sub-Treasury to a condition where the payment of silver certificates to the banks is already being informally talked about, and is looked to as inevitable unless the silver coinage act of 1878 is repealed or modified." If this coinage continues and lies unused as it now does in the vaults of the government, the coins must inevitably depreciate in the end to eighty-five cents, which is their intrinsic value.

The Progress of the Indian Schools, which the public is beginning to believe hold in their hands the solution of the vexed Indian question, continues unabated. The government inspector, Mr. Haworth, has just returned to Washington from a trip through the West, having established three industrial schools since January 1st. The one at Chilocco, Indian Territory, was opened January 21st, and has 174 scholars. The building at Lawrence, Kan., will be completed in April, when 300 children will be received. The contract for the new school building at Albuquerque, New Mexico, will be completed in July. There are now 83 industrial schools in operation in the Indian country, and 117 day schools. The enrolment of children in these schools now numbers 10,247, which, Mr. Haworth states, is one fourth of the number of Indian children of school age. When all the schools now projected and those recommended to Congress are completed, this number will be increased to 12,000. The proportion of Indian children attending school to the entire number of school age is about the same as among the white population of the United States. The House of Representatives has passed a joint resolution appropriating $150,000 to be expended among the Indians for educational purposes.

The New York Assembly Voted on the Prohibition question on Thursday, Feb. 28th, when Mr. Olin's amendment, which prohibited the manufacture and sale of beer and liquors, went to the vote. It received sixty-one votes, which was four less than the number required. Nine Democrats voted with the Republicans for the amendment, and eighteen Republicans voted with the Democrats against it. Of the seventy-two Republicans in the House fifty-two placed themselves on record in favor of the amendment. Of the fifty-six Democrats forty-five voted against it. Four members were absent from Albany. They were not paired, but they would have voted, two for, and two against. Had they been there the amendment would have been lost all the same. Mr. Roosevelt's high license bill, which will soon come before the House, appears to excite more strenuous opposition among the liquor dealers than the prohibition amendment. They probably think it is more likely to be carried and executed than entire prohibition.

The Lower House of the Iowa Legislature passed the Kennedy Temperance bill on March 1st. When it came up to be read the third time, the Speaker ordered a vote, which was taken amid breathless silence, and resulted in the passage of the bill. The announcement that the bill had passed the House was then duly made, amid intense excitement, and the Speaker found it impossible to repress the applause in the galleries, and Republican members rushed from their seats to exchange congratulations. A large number of ladies were present, and they expressed the liveliest satisfaction at the result. The number of negative votes cast was forty-one.

The Contributions toward the Cost of Erecting a statue to the memory of the late Hon. William E. Dodge already amount to $15,000. It has been decided that the statue shall be of bronze, and the contract has been awarded to J. Q. A. Ward, the well-known sculptor. The statue, when completed, will be placed in the small park on Thirty-second Street, New York, between Broadway and Sixth Avenue.

The Congregational Ministers of Chicago have formally resolved at their regular meeting that in no case will they marry a divorced person, unless the divorce has been procured for the cause sanctioned by Scripture. Statistics of marriage and divorce in Cook County, presented to the meeting, showed that in 1882 there were 9607 marriages in the county and 1048 divorces. Last year there were 10,046 marriages and 986 divorces.

The Hospital Saturday and Sunday Colleclections in New York realized a total of $42,803.69 last year. The accounts now finally made up and published show that these figures are an increase over those of 1882 of about $12,000. This, in spite of the general depression in financial circles, which doubtless curtailed the contributions of the wealthier class. The published details of receipts are thus summarized by the committee: Churches and synagogues, $27,040.50; auxiliary trade associations, $6661.97; other trade collections, $1412.75; exchanges, $3021.95; benevolent orders, $495.50; miscellaneous contributions, $4170.02.

Salmi Morse, the Author of the Passion Play, was found drowned in the North River, near Harlem, N. Y., on February 22d. There being no evidence to prove that it was a suicide, the coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned." The circumstances disclosed, show that Mr. Morse's last days were sad ones. His attempt to produce his play in New York some time ago aroused considerable antipathy to him, but his most bitter opponents did not wish him such an end. Christians, rather, desired for him that he might be brought to see in the scene he attempted to depict, the basis of reconciliation between God and man, and make for himself personal application of it.

A Wave of Revival is Passing over the State of Maine. A correspondent of the Observer, in the course of a lengthy account of the blessed harvest, mentions particularly Gardiner, Minot, Vassalboro, and Deer Isle as places beside the large cities, in which the awakening has occurred. The city of Auburn has been thoroughly laid hold of. Not only in Congregational churches, but in others many have begun the Christian life. The little Sixth Church has suddenly grown to large numbers; but behind the fruitage has been some very earnest sowing by the pastor. At Vassalboro one church, which has not had an addition by profession for almost a quarter of a century, has received several, with the promise of continued additions. The State is quickened in all sections, and adult men and women seem to be unusually thoughtful.

The New Morning Star, the Children's Missionary ship, has been ordered from the New England Ship Building Company of Bath, Me. She is to be built and ready for her cargo at Boston about September 20th, and will sail for Honolulu about November 1st. Her tonnage is to be 425; she will have auxiliary steam power, and is estimated to cost about $45,000. The children's twenty-five-cent subscriptions have already aggregated $25,000, and are still flowing in. One dime annually from each twenty-five-cent subscriber will pay running expenses.

Statements Made at an Important Meeting held in Washington, D.C., recently, indicate that the national issues which are to be fought out in this country at no distant date, will be such as will stir the heart of every Christian citizen. The fact is recognized not only by Christians, but by the opponents of Christianity. The meeting referred to, was that of the sub-executive committee of the Citizens' National Protective League, an organization formed to counteract the Prohibition movement. At the meeting the members of the committee expressed themselves strongly in favor of keeping the public buildings, libraries, and parks open on Sunday for the benefit of working people. Referring to the proposed preamble of the league a member of the committee said, "It will be the second declaration of independence." During a discussion on the various propositions a member remarked that "the Protestant Church, which is the basis of this temperance agitation, is the most intolerant corporation in the United States, and that if they succeed in the present fight free men will yet be compelled to go to church against their will." To this another committee man responded: "Yes, we must attack the Church as the basis of these temperance societies."

The Young Women's Christian Association in New York is making an effort to increase its accommodation and means of usefulness. The managers propose to spend $10,000 in putting an additional story on the building, No. 7 East Fifteenth Street, and in extending the facilities connected with the place so as to meet the continually increasing demands on its resources. The association not only endeavors to supply its members with instructive and pleasant reading matter, but to find for them situations in which they can support themselves and to prepare them for self-support by needed instruction. The daily newspapers and current periodicals are furnished, and the library circulates nearly eighteen thousand volumes annually. There is a weekly Bible class, with a membership of five hundred and forty-four and a transient attendance of eight hundred. Last year free educational classes afforded instruction to four hundred and twenty women, special attention being given to type-writing, phonography, book-keeping, and other studies that fit women for practical work. The Employment Bureau is free not only to applicants for places but to employers also.

Temperance Progress is Reported from Canada. On February 25th a by-law was passed in Toronto abolishing the licenses grocers hold for the sale of intoxicating liquor, and a mass meeting was held at night to rejoice over the new departure. A despatch on the same day from Ottawa reports that a strong effort is being made to have prohibitory legislation introduced this season. Fifteen supporters of the movement, who hold seats in the Senate and House of Commons, met this morning and drafted a resolution, which will be introduced in Parliament on Thursday, with a view to prohibiting the importation, manufacture, and sale of liquor used for beverage purposes. There will be strong opposition to the resolution being adopted by the House of Commons.

A Pathetic Incident was Related by Judge Noah Davis, of the Supreme Court in New York, last week. He said that the mother of a rum-crazed wife-murderer had come to his house to plead for her son. He was obliged to sentence that murderer to a long term of imprisonment. The wretch's little children pleaded for him in the court-room more eloquently than he could plead for himself. "I told that man," said the speaker, "that if he could give me the name of the rum-seller who sold him liquor while he was drunk I would remit a good portion of his sentence. The saloon-keeper who would sell a drunken man liquor ought to be dealt with according to the fullest rigor of the law." The judge said he wanted to see the dramshops closed forever by absolute prohibition. He did not want to attack any class of men, but his twenty-nine years' experience as a judge had taught him that of all the causes of misery, destitution, crime, and death, intoxicating liquor stood forth the unapproachable chief.

The Rapid Progress of Prohibition Sentiment in all parts of the country is attracting general attention. The Rev. Stephen Merritt says "the movement is gaining in strength every day, the vote at the New York State last election, according to the returns, was about twenty thousand, but I am convinced that we polled a much larger number. The people of this country are beginning to wake up to the fact that the temperance question is the most important political, social and moral question of the day. The press and the pulpit are discussing it as never before Kansas and Iowa have taken the lead in the matter, and I hope that the day is not far distant when others will follow."

A Visitor to Mr. Moody's Home at Northfield, Mass., gives a glowing account of the success of his boys' schools. She states that the five new brick edifices bought and dedicated just before Mr. Moody returned to England last fall, are now filled with boys gathered from the North, East, South and West. Nearly all nationalities are represented, and a more unfortunate, hopeful, bright, homeless, happy lot of boys could hardly be found the whole world over, than these seventy-five lads, ranging in age from eight to sixteen. A few of them may have homes, and friends who support them here; but by far the greater number have no homes and few friends, save those who have been raised up to them through the school. Some come from homes broken up by the demon drink; others have been "picked up" in the streets of our larger cities; but all alike find a friend in the large-hearted founder of the school, whom they love and reverence as they would a father. In No. 1 House, called "The English House," are the twelve English orphan boys Mr. Moody picked up in Manchester and Liverpool.

AN ASTOUNDING MIRACLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And they went into Capernaum; and straightway on the Sabbath day He entered into the synagogue, and taught. And they were astonished at His doctrine: for He taught them as one that had authority, and not as the Scribes. And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit," etc.— MARK I: 21–28.

The Power in Christ's Teaching—In What it Consisted—I. A Most Unhappy Person—One Possessed—Hope for Such—A Disreputable Demon—Nothing Good to Begin upon—II. A Firmly Intrenched Enemy Encountered—The Devil's Rule in Action—III. Our Lord Conquered—His Entrance the Signal for Combat—An Offer Proposed—A Sharp Order — Obeying Like a Dog—IV. A Great Wonderment—No Faith Required of Demoniacs—Victory by a Word.

YOU will find the same narrative in Luke, at the fourth chapter, from the thirty-first to the thirty-seventh verse. It will be handy for you to be able to refer to the second passage, from which I shall quote one or two matters.

These two evangelists commence the narrative by telling us of the singular authority and power which there was about the Saviour's teaching—authority, so that no man dare question His doctrine; power, so that every man felt the force of the truth which He delivered. "They were astonished at His teaching, for His word was with power." Why was it that the Saviour's teaching had such a remarkable power about it? Was it not, first, because He preached the truth? His manner was truthful as well as His matter Moreover, our great Exemplar delivered His teaching as one who most heartily believed what He was speaking, who spake what He did know, yea, spoke of things which were His own. Jesus had no doubts, no hesitancy, no questions, and His style was as calmly forcible as His faith. Our Lord spoke as one whose life supported all that He taught. Well might He speak with great assurance when He could say, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" He was Himself as pure as the truth which He proclaimed. Consequently, for all these reasons, and many besides, Jesus spake as one that had authority; His tone was commanding, His teaching was convincing.

Now, when the Scribes were beginning to perceive this authority in His Word, our Lord determined to prove to them that there was real of His teaching, that He had a right to use such authority, for He was Jesus Christ the Son of God, clothed with divine authority and power. It occurred to Him to display before their eyes the fact that as there was power about His speech, there was also power about Himself, that He was mighty in deed as well as in word; and hence He wrought the miracle now before us.

I. First, then, to show forth this power and authority, our Lord selects on whom to prove His power. This person was, first, one possessed. A devil dwelt within him. We cannot explain this fact any more than we can explain madness. Many things which happen in the world of mind are quite inexplicable, and for the matter of that so are many facts in the world of matter. We accept the recorded fact—an evil spirit entered into this man, and continued in him. Satan, you know, is God's ape; he is always trying to imitate Him, to caricature Him; so, when God became incarnate, it occurred to Satan to become incarnate too; and this man I may call, without any misuse of words, an incarnate devil; or, at any rate, the devil was incarnated in him. He had become like a devil in human form, and so was in a certain manner the opposite of our Lord Jesus.

I wondered, when thinking this over, whether a person of whom this man is the emblem would come into the congregation to-day; for I have seen such people. I have not dared personally to apply such an epithet to any man, but I have heard it applied; I have heard disgusted friends and indignant neighbors, worn out with the drunken profanity, or horrible filthiness. of some man say, "He does not seem to be a man; he acts like the evil one." Or when it has been a woman, they have said, "All that is womanly is gone; she seems to be a female fiend." Well, if such shall come within sound of my voice, or within reading of this sermon, let them take note that there is help, hope, and health even for them. The power of Jesus knows no limit. Upon one who was did our gracious Lord display His authority and power in connection with His Gospel teaching; and He is not less able now than then.

This man, further, was one whose personality was to a great extent merged in the Evil One. Read the twenty-third verse: "There was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit;" the rendering might be equally accurate if we read it, "A man in an unclean spirit." See you that? Not only a man with an unclean spirit in him, but a man in an unclean spirit. The phrase is simple enough; we speak of a man being in drink. For liquor to be in a man does not mean half so much as for a man to be in liquor. To give a more pleasant illustration, we speak of a person's being "in love;" he is absorbed in his affection; we should not express a tenth as much if we said that love is in the man. A man can be in a rage, in a passion; and even so was this man in an evil spirit.

He was completely ruled of the evil one. The poor creature had no power over himself whatever, and was not himself actually responsible; in all that I say of him I am not condemning him, but only using him as a type of human sin. Please do not forget this. As far as the narrative is concerned the man himself scarcely appears; it is the unclean spirit that cries out, "Let us alone; I know Thee who Thou art." These are words spoken by the man, but they are the sentiments of the demon who used the man's organs of speech according to his own will. The man was scarcely a man with a will or wish of his own; in fact, you do not notice him till you see him flung down into the midst of the synagogue; you only see the proper man when the Saviour raises him up before them all unharmed and rational. Until the miracle is wrought the man is lost in the unclean spirit that dominates him.

Have you never seen such men? You say sometimes, and you say truly,

"ALAS, POOR WRETCH!

The drink has the mastery over him; he would never do such things as he does if he was not in drink." We do not mean to excuse him by such an expression, far from it. Or it may be the man is a gambler, and you say, "He is quite besotted by gaming; though he impoverishes his wife and children, yet he is possessed by that spirit so completely that he has not the mind nor the will to resist the temptation." Or it may be that such another person is carried away with unchaste affections, and we say, "How sad! There was something about that man which we used to like; in many points he was admirable, but he is so deluded by his bad passions that he does not seem to be himself." We almost forget the man, and think mainly of the dreadful spirit which has degraded him below the beasts. The type and emblem of such a person as that our Lord selected as the platform whereon to show His power. I wonder whether this voice of mine will reach one of that sort.

I sincerely hope that none of you are in such a condition; but if you should be, still there is hope for you in Christ Jesus; He is able to deliver such as are led captive at the will of Satan. Though you seem wholly given up and utterly abandoned to the dominion of a terrible sin, to which you yield a willing obedience, yet Jesus can break off the iron yoke from your neck and bring you into the liberty of holiness. It will be an awful thing for you to die in your sins, and you surely will unless you believe in the Lord Jesus; but if you look to Him, He can make you pure and holy, and create you anew.

Note further, for we must show you how our Lord selects the worst of cases, it was a man in whom the evil spirit was at his worst. Kindly look at the fourth chapter of Luke, verse thirty-three, and you will see that in this man there was "the spirit of an unclean devil." Think of that. The devil is never particularly clean at any time; what must an unclean devil be? The ruling spirit in the man was not only a devil, but an unclean devil. Satan sometimes cleans himself up, and comes out quite bright and shining, like an angel of light; but do not mistake him; he is still a devil, for all his pretended purity. There are glittering sins, and respectable sins, and these will ruin souls; but this poor man had in him, a spirit of the foulest, coarsest, and most abominable order. I suppose this foul spirit would incite its victim to filthy talk and obscene acts. The evil one delights in sins against the seventh commandment. If he can lead men and women to defile their bodies he takes special delight in such crimes. I doubt not that this poor creature was reduced to the most brutal form of animalism; I can well believe that in his body he was filthy, and that in his talk, in all the thoughts that hurried through his poor brain, and in all his actions, he went to a pitch of uncleanness upon which we need not permit a conjecture. If we were to say of such a character as this man pictures, "Let us turn out of the way," who could blame us? Yet, now, see it and wonder, our blessed Lord and Master fixed His eye of old on the man with the unclean devil in him, and to-day He fixes His eye of mercy on the basest and vilest of mankind, that in their conversion He may show the power and authority of His Word.

In this man there did not not seem to be anything for the Lord to begin upon. When you are trying to bring a man to the Saviour you look over him to see where you can touch him, what there is in him that you can work upon. Perhaps he is a good husband though he is a drunkard, and you wisely attempt to work upon his domestic affections. If a man has some point of character upon which you can rest your lever, your work is comparatively easy. But with some people you look over them from top to bottom, and you cannot find a spot for hope to rest upon; they seem so utterly gone that there is neither reason, nor conscience, nor will, nor power of thought left in them. Of all this the possessed man in the synagogue is for when the Lord comes into the synagogue the poor wretch does not begin to pray, "Lord, heal me." No, his first cry is, "Let us alone." He does not seem to resist this cry of the evil spirit in him, though it was so much to his own injury, but he goes on to say, "What have we to do with Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art Thou come to destroy us? I know Thee who Thou art."

The possessed man seems wholly lost in the dominating spirit of evil which permeates his entire being. Now I look upon this, though it be negative, as a very glaring part of the difficulty; for I do not care how far a man has gone in outward sin, if he has some point left in him of common honesty, or love to his family, or generous heartedness, you know where to commence operations, and your work is hopeful. But in those outcasts of whom I am now speaking there is neither lodgment for hope, nor foothold for faith, nor more than a bare ledge for love. As the man in the synagogue was shut up within the demon's influence, so are some men encompassed by their iniquity, blocked up by their depravity. Yet the great Upraiser of the fallen can rescue even these; He is able to save unto the uttermost.

One other matter makes the case still more terrible: he was a man upon whom religions observances were lost. He was in the synagogue on the Sabbath, and I do not suppose that this was anything unusual. Yet how sad it was that the influences of religious worship had altogether failed to rescue this man from his thraldom! They sang in the synagogue, but they could no sing the evil spirit out of him; they read th lessons of the day in the synagogue, but the could not read the foul spirit out of him; the gave addresses from passages of Scripture, bu they could not address the unclean spirit out c him; no doubt some of the godly prayed fo him, but they could not pray the devil out c him. Nothing can cast out Satan but the Wor of Jesus Himself. His own Word, from Hi own lip, hath power and authority about it, bu everything short of that falls to the ground. O Divine Redeemer, let Thine omnipotence be dis played in turning great sinners into sincere peni tents!

You see, then, what a terrible case the Maste selected. I have not exaggerated, I am sure Oh, the comfort which lies in the thought tha He still chooses to save persons, of whom thi wretched being is the fit emblem and representa tive! O ye vilest of the vile, here is hope fo you!

II. Let us now look a little further and ob serve that our Lord encounters

A FIRMLY-INTRENCHED ENEMY.

The evil spirit in this man had ramparted an bulwarked himself against the assault of Christ for as I have said, he had the man fully at hi command, he could make him say and do what ever he pleased. He had that man so at hi command that he brought him to the synagogu that day, and he compelled him to become a dis turber of the worship. Quietness and orde should be in the assemblies of God's people, bu this poor soul was egged on to cry out and mak horrible noises, so as to raise great tumult in th congregation. But see, the Lord Jesus deals wit this disturber; this is the very man in whor He will be glorified. So have I seen my Lor convert His most furious enemy, and enlist unt His service the most violent of opposers.

The evil one compelled his victim to beg to b left alone; as we have it here, "Let us alone." In the Revised Version of Luke the same ren dering is put in the margin, but in the text w have "Ah!" While the Lord Jesus was teach ing there was suddenly heard a terrible "Ah! A horrible, hideous outcry startled all, and thes words were heard: "Ah! What have we to d with Thee?" It was not the voice of supplica tion; it was distinctly the reverse; it was prayer not for mercy, but against mercy. Th translation is however quite good if we read "Let us alone." Is it not a horrible thing tha Satan leads men to say, "Do not trouble us wit your Gospel! Do not bother us with religion Do not come here with your tracts! Let u alone!" They claim the wretched right to pe ish in their sins, the liberty to destroy their ow souls. We know who rules when men spea thus; it is the prince of darkness who make them hate the light.

The foul spirit made the man renounce all in terest in Christ; he coupled him with himsel and made him say, "What have we to do wit Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth?" This was disclaimer of all connection with the Saviou He almost resented the Saviour's presence as a intrusion. The voice seems to cry to Jesus, " have nothing to do with you; go your way an leave me alone; I do not want you; whatev you can do to save or bless me is hereby refuse Only let me alone." Yet even when Satan ha led a man this length the Lord can drive hi out. He is mighty to save. He can chang even the hardest heart.

A further intrenchment Satan had cast up he made his victim yield an outward assent to th Gospel. "I know Thee who Thou art," said th spirit, speaking with the man's lips, "the Hol One of God." Of all forms of Satan's device this is one of the worst for workers, when me say, "Yes, yes, what you say is very proper! You call upon them and talk about Jesus, an they answer, "Yes, sir. It is quite true. I am much obliged to you, sir." You preach th Gospel, and they say, "He made an interestin discourse, and he is a very clever man!" Yo buttonhole them, and speak about the Saviou and they reply, "It is very kind of you to talk to me so earnestly; I always admire this sort of thing. Zeal is much to be commended in these days." This is one of the strongest of earth-works, for the cannon-balls sink into it, and their force is gone. This makes Satan secure in his hold on the heart. Yet the Saviour dislodged this demon, and therein displayed His power and authority.

III. We have something more pleasant to think upon as we notice that in a most signal manner. The conquest began as soon as the Saviour entered the synagogue, and was thus under the same roof with the devil. Then the evil one began to fear. That first cry of "Ah," or "Let us alone," shows that the evil spirit knew his Conqueror. Jesus had not said anything to the man. No, but the presence of Christ and His teaching are the terror of fiends. Now, as soon as ever one of you shall go into a house with the desire to bring the inmates to Christ it will be telegraphed to the bottomless pit directly. Insignificant person as you may think yourself, you are a very dangerous person to Satan's kingdom if you go in the name of Jesus and tell out His Gospel.

The next sign was that the devil began to offer terms to Christ, for I take it that is the reason why he said, "I know Thee who Thou art, the Holy One of God." He did not confront our Lord with the hostile doubt, "If Thou be the Son of God;" but with the complaisant compliment, "I know Thee who Thou art." "Yes," the false spirit said, "I will allow this man to say his creed, and avow himself one of the orthodox, and then perhaps I shall be let alone. I am quite willing to admit it all," says the devil, "only let me stop in the man; do not meddle with me, and this man's lips shall confess the truth." And so, when Jesus comes in His power, and men hear His word, this deceitful compromise is often proposed and attempted. The sinner says, "I believe it all. I deny nothing. I am no infidel; but I mean to keep my sin; and I do not intend to feel the power of the Gospel so as to repent and have my sin chased out of me. I will agree to the Gospel, but I will not allow it to control my life." Men will accept anything rather than renounce their sin, their pride, their ease.

Then came our Lord's real work on this man. He gave the evil spirit SHORT AND SHARP ORDERS.

"Silence! Come out!" That is exactly what Jesus means that the devil shall do when He delivers men from him. He says to him, "Come out of the man; I do not want pious talk and orthodox professing; hold your peace and come out of him." It is not for evil spirits, nor yet for ungodly men, to try to honor Christ by their words. Traitors bring no honor to those they praise. Liars cannot bear witness to the truth; or if they do they damage its cause. "Be still," says Jesus; and then, "Come out." He speaks as a man might call a dog out of a kennel, "Come out." "Oh," says the unclean spirit, "let me stay, and the man shall go to church; he shall even go to the sacrament." "No," says the Lord, "Come out of him. You have no right within him; he is Mine, and not yours. Come out of him!" I pray that the Master may give one of His mighty calls at this moment, speak to some poor besotted creature, and say to the devil in him, "Come out of him!" O sinners, sin must quit you or it will ruin you forever; are you not eager to be rid of it?

Now see the conquest of Christ over the unclean spirit. The fiend did not dare to utter another word, though he went as near it as he could. He "cried with a loud voice." He made an inarticulate howling as he left the man. As he came out he tried to do his victim some further injury, but in that also he failed. He tore at him, and threw him down in the midst of the synagogue, but Luke adds, "He came out of him, having done him no hurt." From the moment when Jesus bade him "come out," his power to harm was gone; he CAME OUT LIKE A WHIPPED CUR.

See how Jesus triumphs. As He did this literally in the man in the synagogue, so He does it spiritually in thousands of cases. The last act of the fiend was malicious, but fruitless. I have seen a poor creature rolled in the dust of despair by the departing enemy, but he has soon risen to joy and peace. Have you not seen him in the inquiry-room, weeping in the dismay of his spirit? But that has caused him no real harm, it has even been a benefit to him, by causing him to feel a deeper sense of sin, and by driving him quite out of himself to the Saviour.

IV. Lastly, the Saviour raises by what He did

A GREAT WONDERMENT.

The people that saw this were more astonished than they generally were at the Saviour's miracles, for they said, "What thing is this? What new teaching is this? for with authority commandeth He even the unclean spirits, and they do obey Him." The wonder lay in this: here was man at his very lowest; he could not be worse. I have shown you the impossibility of anybody being worse than this poor creature was. I mean not that he was evil morally, for, as I have hinted before, the moral element does not actually enter into the man's case; but he is the instructive picture of the worst man morally; utterly and entirely possessed of Satan, and carried away to an extreme degree by the force of evil. Now, under the preaching of the Gospel the worst man that lives may be saved. I speak now what I do know, because I have seen it in scores and hundreds of cases, that the least likely persons, about whom there seemed to be nothing whatever helpful to the work of grace or preparatory for it, have nevertheless been turned from the power of Satan unto God.

Notice, in this case, that Jesus worked entirely and altogether alone. In most of His other miracles He required faith. In order to salvation there must be faith; but this miracle before us is not a parable of man's experience so much as of Christ's working, and that working is not dependent upon anything in man. When a man is commanded to stretch out his withered hand, or told to go to the Pool of Siloam and wash, he does something; but in this case the man is ignored; if he does anything it is rather to resist than to assist; the devil makes him cry, "Let us alone; what have we to do with Thee?" The Lord Jesus Christ here displays His sovereignty, His power, and His authority, utterly ignoring the man, consulting neither his will nor his faith, but sovereignly bidding the fiend, "Be silent and come out." and the man is delivered from his thraldom or ever he has had time to seek or pray.

THE THING IS DONE,

The miracle seems to me to teach just this, that the power of Christ to save from sin does not lie in the person saved, it lies wholly in Jesus Himself; and, further, I learn that though the person to be saved be so far gone that you could scarcely expect faith of him, yet the Gospel coming to him can bring faith with itself, and do its own work, ab initio, from the very beginning. What if I say that the Gospel is a seed that makes its own soil! Oh, the marvel of this miracle! I was never led more greatly to admire the splendor of the power of Christ to rescue men from sin than at this hour.

And, to conclude, I notice our Lord did nothing but speak. In other cases He laid His hand upon the diseased, or led them out of the city, or touched them, or applied clay, or used spittle; but in this case He does not use any instrumentality; His word is all. He says, "Hold thy peace, and come out of him;" and the unclean spirit is

The Word of the Lord has shaken the kingdom of darkness, and loosed the bonds of the oppressed. As when the Lord scattered the primeval darkness by the fiat, "Light be," so did Jesus give the word, and its own intrinsic power banished the messenger of darkness.

The name of Jesus is high over all, in heaven, and earth, and sky, therefore let us preach it with authority and confidence; not as though it were an invention of men. He has said He will be with us, and therefore nothing is impossible. The Word of the Lord Jesus cannot fall to the ground; the gates of hell cannot prevail against it. The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand. The Lord shall bruise Satan under our feet shortly.

I have gone to great lengths in this sermon because I would reach sinners who have gone to great lengths. Oh, that they would accept this message of amazing mercy! He who has come to save sinners is God, and this is the surest ground of hope for the very worst. Hear ye this I pray you; it is the Lord your God who speaks to you, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and here is none else."

CAPTAIN PHILIP J. DE CARTERET,

The Gospel Temperance Evangelist of Jersey.

Philip John de Carteret, whose portrait appears on page 156, was born in Jersey, the little island off the coast of France, March 26th, 1825, and is now nearly fifty-nine years of age. He is descended from a long line of courtly ancestors, some of whom were earls, baronets, and knights, who fought and bled in the wars of history.

With the blood of a martial and high-spirited race coursing in his veins, the young Philip resolved to join the army. His father resolutely opposed his doing so, but his thirst for handling arms was partially satisfied by obtaining a commission in the Second Regiment of Royal Jersey Militia, which he held for many years as captain, adjutant, and musketry instructor.

In the year 1847 he married Miss Mary Nicolle, daughter of Major Nicolle, of Jersey. At the death of his father, in 1860, he threw up his commission, and came to America, intending to take part in the war, but circumstances intervened which induced him to return across the Atlantic. He spent a short time in London on his way, where George Cruikshank, the renowned artist and temperance reformer, was raising a corps of volunteers. Mr. de Carteret obtained a captain's commission, and served as musketry instructor and acting adjutant for four years. His roaming disposition, however, led to another change, and he returned to his native island as restless and dissatisfied as ever.

Through the decease of a relative, a fortune of $150,000 fell to his lot, which he speedily squandered. Fortune wasted, reputation lost, health shattered, a slave to his appetite for liquor, which had all along been his ruin, he was induced to attend some Gospel Temperance meetings then being held in Jersey by Mr. W. Noble, of Blue Ribbon fame, and there he was led to sign the pledge and don the blue ribbon. Mr. de Carteret was soon after led, through the instrumentality of William Dyne, who took him to the Friends' meeting-house, Bunhill Row, to trust his soul to Christ as his Saviour.

When Mr. Noble decided on commencing a Blue Ribbon mission in England he invited Mr. de Carteret to assist him. The invitation was accepted. He consequently assisted at the inauguration of the work in England, at the Standard Theatre, Shoreditch. Three months later Mr. de Carteret founded the "Blue Ribbon Army" in Jersey, and it was carried on there by Mrs. de Carteret till March, 1882, when Mr. de Carteret left his work in London, and devoted himself to the cause in Jersey, with the result that in eighteen months more than four thousand persons had signed the pledge and donned the blue.

On the 28th of October, 1883, Miss Laurie McLatchie, the well-known Scotch preacher and lecturer, accepted Mr. de Carteret's invitation to visit Jersey, and lend her powerful aid to the movement which was in progress. She consented, and it was at once evident that the Lord had sent her, as many souls were saved through her instrumentality, and Jersey was moved from its centre to its circumference by the influence of her graceful oratory. The largest buildings were obtained, and the people crowded in such numbers to hear her that she had frequently to repeat her addresses and lectures a second time. Mr. de Carteret and his family largely contributed to the success of her meetings.

The impetus given by Miss McLatchie's labors to the temperance cause in the Channel Islands is not likely to subside, as Captain de Carteret, who commenced the mission, is still prosecuting it with undiminished ardor. It is his beloved sphere of labor. There he was once notorious for his profligacy, and there his temperance efforts have been crowned with the most abundant success. Like Mr. John B. Gough and many other successful temperance workers, Captain de Carteret has known and felt the power of the liquor passion, and is consequently able, with patience and sympathy, to guide those who are still struggling under its yoke to liberty and safety.

THE DYING SOLDIER.

(See Illustration.)

An evangelist who did good service during the war relates the following incident: It was my lot to stand by the bedside of a fatally wounded soldier. The dying man exclaimed, "Stay with me till I die." The man shook as he said, "I am afraid of death; it is hard to die here alone, away from mother and from home."

"Well," said I, "Jesus will help you; I cannot help you. Christ will be with you and give you strength, if you will only put your trust in Him." The dying man shook his head.

"It is too late now. He has striven with me; the Holy Spirit has often come to me, and has striven with me; but I have grieved Him away, and now I have to die alone."

I prayed with him long and earnestly, but all I could get from him was, "It is too late; I have put it off until it is too late."

The man lying next to him asked for water, and I rose to get it. When the dying man saw that I was leaving him, he cried, "Don't leave me. Death will come while you are gone; I am afraid to meet it." I said, "I will be back in a few minutes."

He took hold of my wrist, but I took his hand from mine, and laid it by his side, and went to get the water for the sufferer in the next cot.

When I came back he had thrown the blanket over his face; he was so affrighted that he had attempted to hide himself, as it were, from death. I drew the blanket down; his teeth were firmly set, his fists were clenched, and a horrible expression was on his countenance. He was gone! He had died in his sins, unforgiven, having postponed making provision for eternity until too late.

GRACE MAYLING'S FRIEND.

The snow lay thickly on the ground, and the sky was lowering, while a bitter north-east wind swept over hill and dale. A more cheerless day for out-of-door people it was difficult to imagine. But while it was cold and bleak without, there was plenty of warmth and good cheer in Colonel Gardiner's home—a large, old-fashioned house in the neighborhood of St. Louis. It was the birthday of the colonel's eldest son, and some thirty of his young friends were assembled to do honor to the occasion. Fun and merriment reigned supreme, and the pleasure of the morning was to culminate in a ball in the evening.

Apart from the other guests were two young men who had strolled into the library, and were chatting amicably together over their cigars.

"Though I have been in America ten years," one of them said, "and mean to stay here all my life, I have a strong liking for the old Scotch accent, and am always drawn toward any one whose voice has it. Tell me about your coming out. I have lost none of my interest in the country of my birth."

"I too am glad," said the tall, aristocratic-looking Scotchman, whose name was Alec Garth, "to meet a fellow-countryman unexpectedly. I intend making my home in America, after a few years, as you have done. You know I have been so happy as to win the love of Grace Mayling, and after our marriage we mean to live a few years in Edinburgh and then settle down here. I am delighted with the country and the people. Take our host now; where in any country could you find a finer, more genial, gentleman?"

"Yes, he is a noble fellow, but he has seen trouble. This is the first entertainment he has given since the shadow fell on his house five years ago."

"I have heard nothing about that; what was it? I should have thought he and trouble had never had even a nodding acquaintance."

"If you were to go into one quarter of the house, you would find a room, the door of which has not been unlocked for five years; and if you looked in the family Bible, you would see in the family register a name erased by two broad black lines. The name was Lottie. She was the pride of the old man's heart. A young scoundrel from New York, a son of a wealthy banker, won her affection and induced her to elope with him. The old colonel was at first amazed and heart-broken, but afterward, when he found his daughter rejected his invitation to return, he grew indignant, locked up her room, cut her name out of his will, and, to complete the act of renunciation, crossed her name out of the family Bible. By the way, the young lady to whom you are engaged came very near quarrelling with the family about that matter. She was Lottie's most intimate friend, and even after her flight she would not join in the hue and cry against her. The old colonel was indignant when Grace Mayling told him he was heartless in casting his daughter off."

"Bless her for her sweet compassion," said the other.

"Ah! but people did not see it in that light. The general opinion was that Miss Mayling would have acted more consistently as an honorable and virtuous young lady, by showing a little more indignation at her friend's conduct."

"Yes," said Alec, "but then the market for censure seems to have been pretty well supplied. There were, according to your account, plenty of stones being thrown, as there generally are, in such cases. Miss Mayling showed a Christian spirit anyhow."

At that moment a lady passed the library window, walking rapidly through the snow.

"There is Grace," said Alec; "where can she be going alone and with no umbrella?" He hurried into the hall, and, snatching up his ulster and Glengarry cap and an umbrella, was soon striding after her. As he overtook her, his surprised inquiries met with unsatisfactory replies. The young lady walked right on, looking straight before her, and scarcely noticing her lover as he walked beside her trying to protect her from the snow, now falling heavily.

"Tell me what has happened, Grace? It must be something serious to make you leave the party so suddenly and without telling me."

"It is too long a story to tell you now," said Grace; "besides, I am too agitated to tell it. But go back, please; I will write you. It may change all our future."

"No," said Alec, "I am going to exercise my rights by anticipation. You will not walk alone on such a day as this. I will not be inquisitive, but I mean to accompany you."

After walking some distance in silence, and when they were near the city, Alec said: "Forgive my breaking in on your thoughts. I have been guessing at the motive of this extraordinary journey. I have just been listening to the story of Lottie Gardiner; has your journey any connection with it?"

"It has," said Grace curtly. "Lottie was my dearest friend, and though every one in the world spoke ill of her, I would love her still in spite of her sin and shame."

"You will hear no reproach from my lips," said Alec; "I think you acted nobly and like a true Christian in that matter."

Grace made no reply in words, but she took one of her hands from the pocket of her ulster, and put it gently on Alec's arm.

A block or two of city pavement was passed, and Grace turned off from Washington Avenue, in the direction of the east side. Then she said: "I am going to her." She referred to a scrap of paper in her pocket, and looked around. She said: "There is the place, that hotel. Lottie is there. She sent a boy just now with a note telling me of her being here, and begging me to come to her at once."

"Go you to her room, then," said Alec; "I will wait for you in the lobby."

He waited two hours, and then Grace came back. "I can do nothing," she said. "Lottie is in deep sorrow and remorse, but she will not go home unless she is assured of a welcome, and I know her father would not receive her."

"Would she allow me to see her?" asked Alec.

"I do not know, and I do not see that you could do any good; but I will ask her, if you like."

"Do so, please; I wish to see her."

Grace returned, and came back with permission for Alec to visit the wanderer. He entered the room, and greeted the poor sinner respectfully.

"I suppose Grace has told you who I am, Miss Gardiner," he said. "I know your story and your present difficulty. I would not have intruded, but that, perhaps, I, of all men, may be best able to solve it. Grace has made me happy by promising to marry me in a few weeks, and we are going to our home in Scotland. Will you allow me, in her name, to offer you a share of it?"

"Ah! sir, you do not know me, or the life I have been living, or you would not make such an offer."

"Excuse me, madam, it is because I do know and because, speaking with all humility, I am a follower of Jesus that I make that offer, and most earnestly beg you to accept it. It is too sudden for you to decide at once, perhaps, but I am going to leave you and Grace alone together now; and I think when she has talked to you you will decide as I wish."

"Alec," said Grace, "I love you. You could not have done anything that could have given me half the pleasure."

When Grace once more rejoined her lover it was all arranged. The repentant sinner, spurned from the home she had disgraced, hesitating between suicide and a life of profligacy, was rescued by the two young people whom the life and teachings of Christ had led to pity the fallen. Lottie is now the honored wife of a Scottish lawyer, who knows her early history, and who, like his friends the Garths, has no stones to throw at those who, under fierce temptation, fall in life's slippery ways. Happily, Lottie, was more fortunate than many who sin as she sinned; at the crisis of her life she found friends who endeavored to follow their Master in loving the sinner while hating the sin. She too loves much because she was forgiven much.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Summary of the Story.

JOHN MORLEY, a studious bookseller, a widower with one child, Hester, becomes attached to a lady much younger than himself, a teacher in a school. He asks her to become his wife, and she, being weary of her scholastic duties, consents. She expects that Mr. Morley, being wealthy and devoted to her, will let her have her own way in everything. Being introduced to Hester as the child's second mother, Hester promises solemnly to love and honor her as long as she lives. Mr. Morley being a deacon in a church, his pastor, Mr. Watson, and his fellow-deacon, an aristocrat, Mr. Waldron, warn him against marrying an unconverted lady. After the marriage the young wife is disappointed in her lot. Her husband allows her to renovate one room in the house, but no others. He spends his days in reading, and does not give her the gay pleasures she expected. He too is disappointed and troubled at the thought that one so near him is in danger of perishing eternally. He asks his pastor to visit his wife and try to impress her with the necessity of a change of heart. The pastor requests Miss Waldron, a young lady full of worldly and spiritual pride, but an active worker in the church, to undertake the task. From this point the story proceeds.

A Pharisee.

"I RECOLLECT," said Mr. Waldron, "Mrs. Morley has the manner of a lady; and very pretty she is, too. John Morley has a sweet-looking little girl by his first wife; I like to see that child in chapel. Miss Waldron, I think your only way of getting at her will be to call upon her. You might invite her to return your call. It would do you no harm, and, under God's blessing, might do her a great deal of good."

Miss Waldron mused with an impenetrable face.

"Do, my dear young lady," urged the minister eagerly, seeing a possible avenue by which Gospel influences might reach Rose Morley's benighted soul; "your rank and position would give you consequence in her eyes; she is a girl to be touched by them."

"Mr. Watson," she said, with some severity, "we belong to different spheres altogether."

"I know you do," he hastened to say.

"And," she continued, lifting her hand to enjoin silence while she finished speaking, "there would be a danger of fostering her pride; but I will be on my guard against that. I do not desire to shrink from any cross, and I will call upon her. What else can be done for her soul may occur to me; and it is possible I may go so far as to invite her here for conversation with me upon her spiritual welfare. But that is in the future. For the present you may leave the young person in my hands."

Mr. Watson bowed, and thought it would be judicious to say no more upon this subject.

"Your son," he said, in a hesitating and deprecating tone, as if anxious to express his interest in him, yet doubtful how the great man would take it, "is all well with Mr. Robert Waldron?"

The father's face clouded at the mention of this name, but there was no anger against the timorous minister in his reply.

"No, no, my friend," he answered, frankly. "I did wrong in sending my boy to Eton and Oxford. There never was a more hopeful lad, full of good intentions and desires, before he went from home. There were as many signs of grace in him as in Miss Waldron; but the saying is fulfilled, 'One shall be taken and the other left.' Yet in part, if not altogether, it is my sin."

"It will be all well with him yet," said the minister, in a gentle tone of encouragement; "our prayers will not be unanswered, though the answer tarry. Is he with you?"

"We expect him, but only for a few days," said Mr. Waldron; "our household ways are too strict for him, and his habits are such as I cannot tolerate under my roof. Yet he is only gay, not vicious, I trust. But let us talk about something else; my son is no pleasant theme to me."

About an hour later, Mr. Watson, passing by John Morley's shop, looked in for a few minutes to announce to him the arrival of the Waldrons and their expected appearance at chapel the next day—intelligence which made so much impression upon John Morley that he remembered to repeat it to his young wife as she sat moping and dull at the tea-table. It came as a little gleam of light from the outer world, and the effect produced by it would have been astounding to the abstracted husband could he have been made aware of it. Rose had retained a lively impression of the great man whom she had seen and spoken to before her marriage; and she had often cast furtive glances at his large, empty pew in the chapel, to which she accompanied her husband twice every Sunday. Mr. Waldron was by far the greatest man she had ever seen.

The next morning Rose made a very careful and elaborate toilet; and even John Morley, in the midst of his anxious Sabbath thoughts of her as one still upon the brink of eternal peril, could not check the pleasant and flattering admiration which her beauty produced in him. He felt inclined to believe, against all reason and revelation, that she was too fair to be doomed to any misery either in this world or the world to come. With her hand resting on his arm, he walked proudly up the old-fashioned street. The close carriage from Aston Court passed them by; and both he and Rose caught the eye and the hurried salutation of the great Mr. Waldron from his seat beside his daughter, who looked neither to the right hand nor to the left. The chapel was better filled than ordinary, and the minister preached with more than usual animation. At the end of the service, while all the congregation were standing up, but hanging back till the owners of Aston Court should take their departure, Mr. Waldron presented Mrs. Morley to his daughter, and said, in a voice loud enough to be heard half through the place, "Miss Waldron intends to call upon you at half-past eleven o'clock precisely on Tuesday morning next."

At half-past eleven o'clock precisely on Tuesday morning, Miss Waldron, attired in a gown of some dark brown stuff, with a brown bonnet and shawl to match, opened the door of John Morley's shop with such a jerk as to set the little bell tinkling furiously. It caused Mrs. Morley to jump up nervously in her costly and tasty drawing-room on the floor above. She had dressed herself and Hester in very becoming and very light morning dresses, of a pale tint, which would not have been unfit for the handsomest room in Aston Court; and, thus prepared, she awaited the announcement of her distinguished visitor. But Miss Waldron positively declined to penetrate further into a tradesman's abode than the room which opened out of the shop. It was only because a religious conversation might be liable to interruption in the shop itself that she did not insist upon Mrs. Morley receiving her call there, as a protest against the wild supposition that there was anything like equality between them. But Miss Waldron had taken up her cross this morning, and was willing to bear it even into John Morley's back parlor.

Rose entered the dark, dull room to which she had been summoned with a pretty bashfulness, half matronly and half girlish; and Miss Waldron met her with an awkward embarrassment, for fear of this young person feeling too free with her. When the first stiff courtesies had been exchanged, Miss Waldron took her seat uncomfortably upon the edge of a chair, and looked steadily, almost sternly, into the smiling face of Rose Morley.

"I have called upon you," she said, in an exhortatory voice, "at the united request of my father, who is a deacon, and Mr. Watson, who is the pastor of the church at Little Aston. They desired me to see if anything could be done for you. You do not attend any of my meetings, so I have come to see you here."

"I did not know that you had any meetings," answered Rose, apologetically; "but I do not think I should feel at home in any of them. I was not brought up to going to chapel."

She spoke nervously, and seemed on the verge of shedding tears. Miss Waldron felt satisfied that her very first words had made an impression upon this frivolous object of Mr. Watson's pastoral solicitude.

"Ah!" she said, "then my duty is clear. A very eminent minister told me that, by my birth and rank, I am set as a candle upon a candlestick, and not put in a secret place, or under a bushel, that they which come in may see the light."

She paused, and looked down into her satchel with a sigh, as if exhausted with shining too brilliantly; while Rose, puzzled and shy, could not think of anything to say in response, and Hester, from her usual seat in the old arm-chair, listened and looked inquisitively at their visitor. "Ah! my dear young"—she was about to say "person," but her eyes fell upon Rose's sweet face and elegant dress, and she checked herself, leaving a blank in her address—"I came here to-day, not out of idle compliment to you or your husband, but to awaken you to the danger of your condition. It has been well said that we who have the bread of life should not only invite our fellow-sinners to partake, but should carry it to them and compel them to eat. You are perishing, you are famishing before my eyes for lack of food, and I must force you to take from my hands what will save you. It is a necessity which is laid upon me."

Rose's trouble and perplexity were increased indefinitely by this speech, and she looked from Miss Waldron to Hester, and back again to Miss Waldron.

"I scarcely understand," she said, blushing deeply; "I never heard any one talk in this manner before. I am sure you are very kind, but I don't understand clearly about the bread and the light. I am very stupid I know, but I scarcely understand you."

"Do you feel no unsatisfied cravings of your immortal soul?" asked Miss Waldron.

"I don't know," answered Rose, with increasing shamefacedness; "there are a good many things I am not satisfied with. We never have any friends to come in and see us, and we never go out anywhere, except to Mr. Watson's. I expected to be a great deal happier, and more free, when I was married; but I am not so. Mr. Morley has no taste for company, and I am shut up here day after day, till I feel more lonely than I could tell you."

"But do you not feel the load of your sins?" pursued Miss Waldron.

"I am sure I'm not very sinful," she said, pouting a little; "I'm not idle, or ill-tempered, or cross. Little Hetty knows that. Oh, no! Miss Waldron, I don't break the Sabbath, or steal, or kill, or—or anything else that breaks the Commandments. No; if I had any sins I would own them. But I am only silly. Yes; I know I am not the clever person Mr. Morley thought me before he married me; and he is disappointed, and I am very dull. I could not bear it but for little Hetty. Little Hetty, my darling, come and kiss me this minute."

In the presence of this strange visitant, who eyed her so coldly and rigidly, the poor, silly, little soul of Rose Morley felt a sudden need of having the warm arms of the child round her neck, and her fond young lips pressed to her mouth. Hester slipped down from her chair and kissed her stepmother affectionately; then standing beside her, she turned her face toward Miss Waldron.

"Indeed she does not understand," she said, quaintly and confidentially; "we two have talked about it often and often, and she does not feel like being a very great sinner. We know we are, because we've been taught it over and over again; but she does not. If we hadn't been taught it so often, we shouldn't have believed it all in a minute. You wouldn't believe you were the chief of sinners if nobody had taught you so, would you?"

A dull red flush suffused Miss Waldron's cheek and brow as she listened to Hester's explanation of her stepmother's benighted state. She could not meet the clear frank gaze of the child.

"I was once a sinner," she answered, "when I was a little girl like you; but I became a member of the church before I was much older than you are. Ever since I have had one single object in life—the good of my fellow-creatures."

She remained silent for a minute or two, with closed eyelids; while Hester, stroking her stepmother's hand gently, looked with a child's steady gaze into Miss Waldron's face. Rose Morley felt more bewildered and embarrassed than ever; and dismissed from her mind all idea of offering her guest any refreshment.

"I am going now to my tract district," said Miss Waldron, recalling herself to the present moment. "I trust you will think over seriously what I have said to you; and may the thorns not choke the good seed. Yours is a very interesting case. I have here a small book, written by myself, which gives an account of a young woman who died of a broken heart, but whom I visited on her death-bed, and brought to repentance. I will present it to you, Mrs. Morley. I am about to order a book from your husband, which you can bring down to Aston Court yourself, when it arrives. It will be a nice walk for you and Hester; and we can converse again upon this subject. I am always at home till eleven o'clock in the morning, for I employ two hours after breakfast in reading and meditation."

She rose to take her leave, offering her hand condescendingly to Mrs. Morley, who was in a flutter of amazement and timidity. If there was any doubt as to Rose's silliness there could be none as to the sweetness of her temper. She could pout a little, and she lost her buoyancy in the dull atmosphere of her new home; but there was no canker of ill-humor or pride in her nature. She was quite unconscious of any impertinence in her visitor, and was perfectly willing to carry anything down to Aston Court for her. In her simple heart she gave Miss Waldron credit for being as saintly as she claimed to be; and with a real hope that she might find in her a guide and friend, who would make clear to her the mysteries of her husband's creed, she looked forward eagerly to the opportunity of meeting with her again.

Whether Hester or Rose Morley felt the most childish pleasure in the prospect of a visit to Aston Court it would be difficult to say. The latter, with her sweet temper and imperturbable self-complacency, could not be sensitive to any impertinence which did not take the form of an open insult; so that she looked forward with delight to the moment she would find herself received upon any terms in the mansion of Mr. Waldron. Hester had been there two or three times at the annual treat of the Sunday scholars, and her imagination had been struck with the larger dimensions and greater magnificence of the house as compared with her own home, which she so rarely quitted.

The memorable morning came—a soft morning toward the end of September, with a fine and tender film of mist hanging about the autumnal trees, and hiding the distant prospect. Already the dark green of the foliage, which had grown almost sombre with the summer's sultry heat, was beginning to brighten with the tints of autumn. A thick, fine dew spangled the grass.

The shadows cast by the trees were less clear and sharp than when the sun had shone through a drier atmosphere. There was a brisker activity among the birds, who no longer screened themselves from the heat amid the innumerable leaves, but fluttered busily about; while the rooks from their rookery amid the trees which surrounded Aston Court were winging their way in battalions toward the corn-fields, many of which were already cleared of their harvest sheaves. Here and there, from among the short stubble, started up a covey of birds, with a whirr of wings and a swift flight out of danger; while the hares crept timidly along the tall grass, which had shot up again in the rich soil of the park since the hay harvest in June.

To Rose and Hester, coming from the dusty heart of the town, which was nearly as close and crowded as the centre of some populous city, this park was a very garden of Eden; and they entered it with buoyant steps. The face of John Morley's young wife had put on its sweetest smile and fairest grace. There was not a line upon it to betray the weariness and growing discontent she felt with her dull life. In fact, she did not feel it dull at that moment, and she was the creature of the moment. Her husband, and the new home of which she was mistress, were as completely blotted out of her mind as though they had no existence. The world consisted only of herself and Hester, and this beautiful park, bathed in the soft light of a September sun. She sang aloud and blithely as she trod lightly along the path, with Hester, as happy as herself, tripping at her side.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

S. S. Lesson for March 16, 1 Thess. 4 : 13–18; 5 : 1–8. Golden Text, Mark 13 : 33. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Last Message—The Last Enemy—The Sowing and the Reaping—God's Husbandry—Natural Anxiety to Know the Time of His Coming—Clear Signs of Christ's Coming—Returning Jewish Prosperity—The Universal Preaching of the Gospel—Our Position—The Great Tribulation—Those who Fear—Grounds for Fear.

THE last message which our beloved Lord spoke in revelation to His people was, "Behold I come quickly," and the answer of the beloved disciple was, "Even so; come, Lord Jesus." Blessed be God, He has set before us the Lord's coming to be not only of His living people, but their great comfort for those who have died. Our blessed Lord has partaken of death "that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, even the devil; and deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. 2 : 14). But "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (1 Cor. 15 : 26), and although we see provision in Christ's redemption for the healing of the sick, we do not yet see the sentence reversed, "It is appointed unto men once to die" (Heb. 9 : 27). But when Jesus comes, death will receive a blow such as it has never before received.

Paul wrote to the Thessalonians, "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope." Then he showed them that Christ's resurrection is the pledge and guarantee of their resurrection who sleep in Jesus, and that those who die in the Lord shall be the first to rise, and Jesus shall bring them with Him, "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Which is the most blessed, to die, and be the first to rise and meet Jesus when He comes—or to live, and be caught up to meet Him and all our loved ones without dying? It is an almost impossible choice; it is chosen for us. But the same blessed transformation which Peter, James, and John saw in Jesus on the mountain, and also in Moses and Elias, must take place in all of us, whether we have first died or not. The Moravians so fully realize this that they speak of their dead as sown in corruption to be reaped in incorruption, sown in dishonor to be reaped in glory, sown in weakness to be reaped in power, sown a natural body, reaped a spiritual body—this is God's husbandry, this is life out of death, the natural sown for the harvest of the divine and supernatural. That which some of us have experienced by faith will then become sight. We, weak in ourselves, in our human bodies, have lived and worked in a strength which was ours only by faith, but faith will be done away when we enter upon our inheritance. Then there will be a radical change of state, "This I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (1 Cor. 15 : 50–53).

"For this cause the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1 John 3 : 8). While sin, sickness, death can raise their heads, Jesus has not yet reaped the full fruit of His redemption work, but when He comes again, and brings His saved and sanctified ones with Him, fully delivered from all sin, entire in spirit, soul, and body; with no vestige of sin or its consequences—misery, sickness and death—then "Death shall be swallowed up in victory," then shall Jesus be fully glorified, then men and angels shall understand all which is meant by redemption, all which is included in salvation. Thus the Lord's coming, while it is God's appointed comfort for those who mourn departed friends, is at the same time the prospect of greatest glory for the Lord Himself.

It was no wonder that the Thessalonians, with such a blessed hope before them, were very anxious to know when the Lord would come, and they were not singular. Hundreds of writers have attempted to discover the time of the Lord's coming. Some have thrown great light on many Scriptures, and have led Christians to study their Bibles on this subject, but still with regard to the times and the seasons there is very little real steady light among Christians. Perhaps the most helpful way of studying this subject is to take various features, and study them apart, such as which in the Old Testament generally refers to the time of "great tribulation" (Matt. 24 : 21, 22); see Isa. 2 : 12; 13 : 6; Zeph. 1 : 7–9, 18; 2 : 2, 3; Joel 2 : 31; Amos 5 : 18; Zech 14 : 1; Joel 3 : 14; Mal. 4 : 5. In the New Testament it includes the coming of Christ to take vengeance on His enemies, and His subsequent reign on earth (1 Thess. 5 : 2; II Pet. 3 : 10; II Thess. 2 : 2; 1 Cor. 5 : 5; II Cor. 1 : 14). Then again take the great tribulation (Isa. 24; 66 : 15–24; Jer. 25 : 30–33; Ezek. 39; Dan. 12 : 1; Zech. 14 : 2–15, etc.), and then the great Antichrist or man of sin (II Thess. 2 : 3–10; Isa. 14 : 12–14; Dan. 7 : 25; 8 : 25; 11 : 36, 37; Rev. 13 : 5, 6). But when we have it clear in our minds that there will be a time of trouble unparalleled in its terrors, when we see clearly how the Antichrist will arise and have power over the nations, when we see the blessed promises to the Church of Christ, still there is much which is left in mystery and which we can only understand fully as events transpire.

SOME SIGNS

of the Lord's coming are blessedly clear. First of all the state of the Jewish people. Crushed, persecuted, often almost decimated, God has said of them, "Israel shall blossom, and bud, and fill the face of the earth with fruit" (Isa. 27 : 6). Never since the time of their dispersion have the Jews been so prosperous as now. Financially they have the destinies of Europe in their hands, politically they are high in power; in all branches of learning they excel. Added to this the persecution in Russia is driving them southward in fulfilment of the prophecy in Jer. 16 : 14–16. Slowly but surely Palestine is being peopled, and many Jews are returning thither. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled" (Luke 21 : 24); surely the "times of the Gentiles" are near their close.

Then again, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come" (Matt. 24 : 14). The witness is being borne, nations are being opened up to the Gospel as never before, and although we expect to see a much greater outpouring of the missionary spirit, yet, thank God, signs of it are appearing. What then is

OUR POSITION?

Paul tells us exactly. He shows how those who are the children of the night and of the darkness shall be startled with the suddenness of Christ's coming; "When they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, . . . and they shall not escape." The Lord Jesus says to us, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord" (Luke 12 : 35, 36). Paul says: "Let us, who are of the day, be sober (or watchful, keeping our eyes open), putting on the breastplate of faith and love." If we are living only for Jesus, and are ready at any time to have our plans upset, our purposes changed, our opinions turned upside down, if the Lord so wills, then the Lord's coming will be a bright hope and a great joy to us, the one goal of all our hopes, the brightest spot of all the bright future. We shall long to see Him recognized by all, to see the Jews look on Him whom they have pierced, to see a nation born in a day, to see death defeated and Satan's power wrested from him.

But what of all the horrors of that time of tribulation? Some may say, Thank God "for the elect's sake those days will be shortened," but it will be true then as it ever has been, "when Thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness" (Isa. 26 : 9). There will be, no doubt, more conversions during that time of trouble than at any other time, and more glorious manifestations of God's love and mercy.

There are many who fear the coming of the Lord; does not this fear come from a feeling that they are not fit to be among those who shall be taken away? They cannot say that they have kept the word of His patience and therefore cannot claim to be kept from the hour of tribulation (Rev. 3 : 10); they do not account themselves "worthy to escape all these things which shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man." Are not they and judging themselves, and condemning themselves as though Jesus were not equal to the task? Who but He can decide such questions? All these fears, except where known sin is the hinderance, proceed from an expectation of something in ourselves which God shall approve, a longing to have a holiness which we can look at and approve of and be satisfied with; it is quite contrary to that life of momentary dependence on Jesus which honors Him. If our breastplate is to be faith and love, then we depend on Him for every thought and word and deed, doing nothing of ourselves, as Jesus did nothing of Himself, and expecting nothing of ourselves. This begets love to Jesus through the continual surprises of love and faithfulness which He gives us, thus our lives can remain guided, thus our lights can be always burning for He trims them and keeps them filled with oil. Let us all cry from the heart, "Come, Lord Jesus."

Another Dynamite Explosion has Taken place in London. Shortly after one o'clock on the morning of February 26th a terrible explosion occurred in a cloak-room at the Victoria Railway station in London. The explosive agent was declared by experts to be caused by Atlas powder, which is a form of dynamite. It blew off a large portion of the roof, and nearly all the glass work in the station was destroyed. Seven men were sent to the hospital with severe injuries, and extensive damage was done to surrounding property. Two reports accompanied the explosion, the noise being like that of the discharge from a cannon, and was followed by an immediate rushing of flames. The booking-office, cloak-room and waiting-room were completely shattered, and are a confused mass of débris. All trains had ceased running, and only a few persons were about the station, or the destruction of life would have been very large. The other railway stations in and near London were promptly searched, and at three of them—Paddington, Charing Cross, and Ludgate Hill—dynamite packages were found, having within them an apparatus for discharging them by clockwork. There appears to be no doubt that the outrage was the work of Irishmen from America. The machinery was made in America, and in one of the packages was an American journal of recent date. English journals are urging the government to make such representations to the American Government as may prompt it to put a check on the unconcealed conspiracy against a friendly power. The newspapers remind the government that in the Alabama difficulty America blamed England for a negligence of a similar kind. It is stated, but not authoritatively, that Lord Granville, the English Secretary of State, will appeal to Washington on the subject.

A Victory over the Army of the Mahdi under Osman Digna, has been achieved by General Graham, commanding the British expedition despatched to the Soudan. The battle was fought on February 29th near the spot where Baker Pasha was defeated three weeks ago. The Mahdi's troops are reported to have fought desperately, and not until more than a thousand of them had been killed did they show signs of flight. The battle lasted more than one hour, which the British commander declared to have been an hour of the fiercest fighting he had ever witnessed. The British fought with the troops in the form of a hollow square. As they moved forward, firing as they advanced, the Mahdi's soldiers, armed with spears and huge crosshilted swords, rose within two hundred yards of the advancing lines and rushed against the British at breakneck speed, heedless and fearless of death. The Arabs fell right and left, though some of the brave fellows reached within five paces of the square. None of them bolted; they only fell back sullenly when they were forced. When the British gained possession of their works the Arabs retired slowly, and were not pursued by the victors. The victory was decisive, but uneasiness still prevails in Egypt, as the way in which the Mahdi's troops fought indicates that much hard fighting will be involved before he is subdued. On Saturday the British force marched to Tokar and recaptured that position, which had been surrendered to the Mahdi by the treacherous commander.

A Bust of the Poet Longfellow has been placed in Westminster Abbey as a mark of English homage to the great American bard. It was unveiled on March 1st. The ceremony was performed by the British Secretary of State, Lord Granville, who was accompanied by Sir Hugh Childers. Our minister, James Russell Lowell, Alice Longfellow, and Annie Longfellow (daughters of the poet), Mary Anderson, Moncure D. Conway, and Sir Theodore Martin were among the distinguished persons present. The Prince of Wales sent a letter expressing regret that he was necessarily absent. Earl Granville in his speech eulogized the character of the American poet, and dwelt on the refinement, which was the chief charm of this illustrious man. He referred in a feeling manner to the presence of Longfellow's daughters and of Minister Lowell, also a distinguished poet. Mr. Lowell also made a speech, in which he said that Longfellow's was a nature which consecrated this ground, into which no unclean spirit could ever enter. In conclusion he accepted the tribute to his memory—this placing of his memorial in the Poets' Corner, between the busts of Chaucer and Dryden—in the name of the American people.

The Death of the Hon. William H. Hunt, our Minister to Russia, is announced by cable. He died on February 27th. He was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1824. His first office was Attorney-General of Louisiana, to which he was appointed in 1876. Two years later he was made a judge of the Court of Claims, which office he continued to hold until 1881, when President Garfield called him to his cabinet as Secretary of the Navy. On the accession of President Arthur he was offered and accepted the office of Minister to Russia.

The Extension of the Franchise in the British Isles was proposed by Mr. Gladstone on February 28th. In spite of those who distrust Ireland, Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues propose to give the same privileges to that country as to England and Scotland. It is not intended to increase the number of representatives, but to give more people the right to vote for the members of Parliament. At present certain cities and towns elect members to represent them. Beside those there are members who represent the inhabitants of villages and smaller towns grouped together in counties. In the cities every householder and the better class of lodgers have the right to vote, but in the counties only those can vote who own real estate, or who live in houses, the rent of which is about $100 a year. It is now proposed to give every householder a vote, whether he lives in city or village. Mr. Gladstone said this measure, by greatly extending the franchise and placing the votes of boroughs and counties upon an equal footing, would increase the voting power of the United Kingdom by about 2,000,000. Of this number England would furnish 1,300,000, Ireland 400,000, and Scotland 200,000.

A New Speaker was Elected last Week by the British House of Commons. The late Speaker, whose duties have been rendered more than commonly arduous by the obstructive tactics of the Irish members, resigned, and, according to custom, was rewarded for his services by a pension and a peerage. Mr. Gladstone showed his gratitude to his old friend and mentor, the late Sir Robert Peel, by nominating for the vacant office the youngest son of that statesman, and he was elected without opposition. Mr. Arthur Wellesley Peel, the new Speaker, is fifty-five years of age, and has represented the little borough of Warwick in the House of Commons during the past nineteen years. He is a man of considerable ability and learning. His eldest brother, the present Sir Robert Peel, is not now a member of the House; he is remarkable for his wit and levity rather than for his statesmanship.

The Impeachment of the Chief Cabinet Minister of the King of Norway has resulted in his dismissal from office, and an order to pay a fine worth $5000. The New York Herald publishes the following account of the affair: "The king has hitherto appointed his own cabinet without regard to the policy of the Norwegian Parliament; but in 1872 the liberal party brought in a bill to enact that ministers of state should take part in the proceedings of the Storthing or legislative chamber. The government saw in the proposed reform the threatened introduction of the Parliamentary system, with the prospect of their own fall, as they would have to depend upon a majority in the Storthing to maintain their position. Three Storthings, after three successive elections, carried the bill in its present shape, each time by an increased majority of votes—the last time, in 1880, by the overwhelming majority of ninety-three out of one hundred and thirteen. It was generally expected that the king and his government would at length comply with the wishes of the people, but he finally, by the advice of his ministers, refused his sanction to the bill, declaring at the same time that his right to the absolute veto was "above all doubt." The president, however, brought the question to a prompt issue by proposing to the Storthing that the bill, which had now been passed three times, should be declared, without the king's sanction, to be the law of the country. This proposal was carried by a large majority on June 9th, 1880, but the king and his ministers, in reply, declared that they would not recognize the validity of the resolution." The Storthing then determined to impeach each secretary separately, commencing with the Secretary of State. His trial is just concluded with the result mentioned.

The Queen of Madagascar is Reported to be preparing active opposition to the French forces in the island. Telegrams from Mauritius state that the Hovas have succeeded in secretly landing in Madagascar a number of Krupp cannon and other munitions of war, and have gone to protect Tananarivo, the capital. An English colonel named Willoughby has obtained the leading command of the Malagassy army, and a number of other Englishmen hold minor commands. The arsenals are busy in the interior of the island, and the Hovas hope soon to be able to make an attack upon Tamatave, now held by the French. Advices from Madagascar state that fever is rife among the Frenchmen at Tamatave.

SIR SAMUEL BAKER, the Explorer of the Soudan—Scenes in his Life.

SIR SAMUEL W. BAKER,

Formerly Governor of the Soudan.

THE remarkable man whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is a man whose life has been full of the most romantic adventures. He has attained eminence as the founder of a colony, as an explorer, and as a governor. His chief fame rests on the work he was able to accomplish in the Soudan, that vast region in Africa which is now attracting the attention of the whole world. Egypt fixed her longing eyes on that land, but she was unable to bring it into absolute subjection. The Khédive Ismail, the father and predecessor of the present Khédive, conceived the idea of placing the Soudan under the administration of an Englishman of ability. He had heard of Sir Samuel Baker's interest in Central Africa and of his indomitable perseverance and courage. Finally, he invited him to his court, and propounded to him his views for establishing some organized and settled government over the province.

It was a magnificent offer, but its magnificence did not weigh with Baker. There was, however, another consideration connected with it which did move him, and that powerfully. During his explorations he had witnessed the barbarities inflicted on human beings who, having been seized by slave hunters, were being hurried to the coast. Baker's heart bled for them, and when Ismail offered him the supreme command of the Soudan, it seemed to him a providential interposition calling upon him to labor in the cause of suffering humanity. His administration of the Soudan has made its mark in the history of that unhappy land. A pious, earnest, God-fearing man, loving righteousness and hating cruelty, oppression and iniquity, Baker ruled without fear or favor, and had he continued to receive the necessary support from the Khédive, his achievements would have been still greater than they were. For what he did accomplish and for what he tried to accomplish, thousands of tongues render homage to his name.

Sir Samuel White Baker, Pasha, F.R.S., M.A., is the eldest son of the late Samuel Baker, Esq., of Lypiatt Park, Gloucestershire, England. He was born in London, on June 8th, 1821, so that he is now in the sixty-third year of his age. His elementary educational training was conducted at a private school. He was sent afterward to a university in Germany, where his industry and proficiency won for him the cordial esteem of his fellow-pupils and the golden opinions of his tutors.

IN CEYLON.

In the year 1843 he married Henrietta, a daughter of the Rev. Charles Martin. Four years afterward, in 1847, he went to the beautiful island of Ceylon, where he spent about eight years. There he established an agricultural settlement and sanatorium at Newera Ellia, in the Singhalese Mountains, at an altitude of six thousand two hundred feet above the sea level. To this he devoted considerable labor and capital. At great personal cost he, together with his brother, conveyed emigrants from England, and, to facilitate their operations and encourage them in their efforts, he imported the best breeds of cattle and sheep, and in other ways labored for the success of the mountain colony. The impulse given by his enterprise secured the assistance of the British Colonial Office, and with the increasing prosperity of Ceylon, Newera Ellia became a resort of considerable importance. It has recently largely increased its wealth by the cultivation of the valuable Cinchona plant, now so extensively used as a tonic medicine.

TURKEY AND THE CRIMEA.

Sir Samuel retired from Ceylon in 1854, after eight years' residence there, and at the death of his wife in 1855 he proceeded to the Crimea, where hostilities were then being conducted against Russia by the allied forces of England, France, and Turkey. At the expiration of the campaign, not long afterward, Sir Samuel was engaged by the Turkish authorities to organize the first railway in that inert and unenterprising country. This task was ultimately executed with complete success.

SEARCH FOR THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.

In 1860, Sir Samuel Baker married a second time, the lady being Florence, daughter of M. Finnian von Sass. The following year he commenced an enterprise entirely at his own cost in the interests of humanity, civilization, and commerce, its immediate object being the discovery of the Nile sources, hoping that in the course of his undertaking he would meet the expedition sent out by the English Government under the command of Captain Speke, who had started from Zanzibar for the same purpose. Throughout this arduous journey he was accompanied by his wife.

Leaving Cairo on April 15th, 1861, he reached on June 13th the junction of the Atbara with the Nile. For nearly a year he diligently explored the regions of Abyssinia, from whence comes the Blue Nile, and in June, 1862, descended to of which we have heard so much recently. The town itself is situated at the junction of the Blue and the White Nile, hence its importance as a commercial centre, and for military and strategical purposes. There he organized a party of ninety-six persons to explore the course of the last-named river.

They set out in December, 1862, and reached Gondokoro in February, 1863. There Sir Samuel had the gratification of meeting Captain Speke and Captain Grant, who had by dint of strenuous perseverance succeeded in reaching the Lake Victoria Nyanza, which they believed to be the source of the Nile.

Sir Samuel says: "Gondokoro is about seven hundred and fifty miles in a direct line from Khartoum. It is a miserable place, consisting of a number of grass huts, occupied only at one season by the traders' people, when they return from the interior with their slaves and ivory. The soil is poor, but the country is pleasantly diversified with evergreen trees and native villages, while the distant mountains, toward the south and east, produce an exhilarating impression after the tedious White Nile marshes.

"I had been fifteen days waiting at Gondokoro, when suddenly I heard guns firing in the south, and my men rushed into my cabin, saying that the traders' party had arrived with two white men in their company, who had come from the sea! It is impossible to describe that moment. Quixotic dreams that I had cherished were now realized, and in a few minutes later I met those gallant explorers Captains Speke and Grant marching along the river's bank; arriving in honorable rags, careworn, haggard, but proud of having won."

DISCOVERY OF LAKE ALBERT NYANZA.

Sir Samuel having resolved to supplement their explorations, supplied them with the necessary vessels for the voyage to Khartoum, and himself started from Gondokoro by land, March 26th, 1863, without either interpreter or guide, in defiance of the opposition of the slave-hunters who attempted to bar his progress. On March 14th, 1864, he came in sight of a great fresh-water lake, till then unknown, which he named the Albert Nyanza. After partially navigating the lake, he set out on his homeward journey early in April, 1864, but owing to illness and the disturbed condition of the country, he did not reach Gondokoro until March 23d, 1865.

THREE YEARS' EXPERIENCE.

On June 21st he wrote home from Khartoum: "There is no longer any mystery connected with the Nile, nor any necessity for expeditions on that head, unless it be desired to explore the great lake I have discovered—the Albert Nyanza. This can only be done by building a vessel for the purpose on the lake. I shall never undertake another expedition in Africa. For the last three years I have not had one day of enjoyment; nothing but anxieties, difficulties, fatigue, and fever. I should not have been contented to see a foreigner share the honor of discovering the Nile-sources with Speke and Grant; it happily belongs to England." On his return to England in 1866, the Royal Geographical Society awarded him its Victoria Gold Medal, he was created M.A. of the University of Cambridge, and received the honor of knighthood.

AN EXPEDITION TO CENTRAL AFRICA.

In September, 1869, in spite of the resolution above recorded, he undertook the command of an expedition to Central Africa under the auspices of the Khédive of Egypt, who placed at his disposal a force of fifteen hundred picked Egyptian troops, and intrusted him for four years with absolute and uncontrolled power of life and death. He undertook to subdue the African wilderness, and to annex it to the civilized world; to destroy the slave-trade, and to establish regular commerce in its place; to open up to civilization those vast African lakes—Victoria and Albert Nyanza—which are the equatorial reservoirs of the Nile; and to add the whole of the countries which border on that river to the kingdom of the Pharaohs. He left Cairo on this gigantic business on December 2d, Lady Baker accompanying him. It occupied him for three years. In 1873 he returned and reported the complete success of the expedition.

Those three years were a period full of adventure. His difficulties arose principally in his efforts to suppress the cruel practices of the officials and capitalists who were in the habit of entering isolated villages and carrying off by force the women and children into slavery. From the records of that period we select a few out of many such which throwlight on the daring and vigor of this humane ruler.

One day Baker met the Govenor of Fashoda, on the White Nile, who had with him some brass guns, some cavalry, and some infantry. He said that he was "collecting the taxes." It was soon discovered that he not only seized upon the cattle of the natives, but annually captured a large number of women and children. At first the Governor denied with looks and words of horror any complicity in, or sympathy with, the slave traffic; but to test the value of his indignant protestations, which Sir Samuel heard with incredulity, he sent his aide-de-camp to visit the Governor's vessels, which were lying in the river close by.

"In a few minutes," says Sir Samuel, "I heard the voice of my officer angrily expostulating with the crew of the vessel, who had denied that there were any slaves on board. Al most at the same time a crowd of unfortunate captives emerged from below, where they had been concealed, and walked singly along the plank to the shore, being counted by the officer according to sex as they disembarked. The Koordi governor, who was on shore with me, puffing away at his long pipe, looked very uncomfortable at this disclosure; but I simply expressed a wish to have

A WALK ROUND THE ENCAMPMENT.

"Having passed through the place of bivouac, I thoroughly examined the spot. I came suddenly upon a mass of slaves, who were squatted upon the ground and guarded by a number of soldiers, who, at first, seemed to think that my visit was one of simple curiosity. Many of the women were secured to each other by ropes passed from neck to neck. A crowd of children, including very young infants, huddled up among the crowd of women and older children, and all kept a profound silence, and regarded me w. great curiosity." (See frontispiece.)

In the boat no fewer than seventy-one slaves had been discovered, and eighty-four on shore guarded by sentries; in all, one hundred and fifty-five, including sixty-five girls and women, eighty children, and ten men.

Sir Samuel says: "I ordered the ropes, irons, and other accompaniments of slavery to be detached; and I explained to the astonished crowd of natives that the Khédive had abolished slavery, therefore they were at liberty to return to their own homes. The women immediately took up their little infants (one had been born during the night), others led the small children by the hand, and, with a general concert, they burst into the long, quavering, and shrill yell that denotes rejoicing. I watched them as they retreated over the plain to their desert homes, and I took a coldly polite farewell of the Koordi."

ATTACKED BY A HIPPOPOTAMUS.

One night, just at the entrance of the White Nile, Sir Samuel's diahbeeah, or vessel, was moored. He himself always slept on the poop-deck. It was cold, but the moon was clear and bright. Every one on board except the sentry was wrapped up in warm blankets, and fast asleep. "I was sound asleep," says Baker, "when I was suddenly awoke by a tremendous splashing close to the diahbeeah, accompanied by the hoarse wild snorting of a furious hippopotamus. I jumped up, and immediately perceived a hippo, which was apparently about to attack the vessel. I called to my servant, Suleiman, for a rifle, but before he could hand me one, the hippopotamus dashed at us with indescribable fury. With one blow he capsized and sank our zinc boat with its cargo of flesh meat. In another instant, he seized the dingy in his immense jaws, and the crash of splintered wood betokened the complete destruction of my favorite boat." He was ultimately shot dead in a shallow flat of the river. (See frontispiece.)

Sir Samuel found that the crocodiles in the neighborhood of Gondokoro were exceedingly ferocious. As the natives were much in the habit of swimming to and fro with their cattle, the wily creatures had no lack of food, which sometimes consisted of a human being and at other times of a cow or calf. One of Sir Samuel's soldiers, while engaged with many others in water only hip deep, was seized by a crocodile. The man, being held by the leg below the knee, made a good fight, and thrust his fingers into the creature's eyes; his comrades at the same time assisted and rescued him from absolute destruction; but the leg-bone was so mashed and splintered in many places that he was obliged to submit to amputation. (See frontispiece.)

An exciting and perilous incident occurred at Fabbo, in the Shoolti country, Central Africa. Sir Samuel and some of his attendants went out one day on purpose to shoot some game for meat. Just after he had brought down a leucotis, or antelope, he saw a long yellow tail rise suddenly from a green hollow, and an instant later he saw a fine that had evidently been disturbed by the firing of the rifles. A minute later and the fierce animal saw Baker and his party, and with her brilliant eyes fixed, she advanced slowly toward them. The sequel is thus told by Sir Samuel: "Not wishing to make a closer acquaintance, I aimed at her chest. She rolled completely over, backward, and three times she turned convulsive somersaults, at the same time roaring tremendously; but to my astonishment she appeared to recover, and I immediately fired another barrel. At this she charged in high bounds straight toward my two boys. I had just time to snatch up my spare gun, and fire a charge of buckshot, when she disappeared in the high grass upon my right. I now heard her groaning in a succession of deep gutteral sounds, within fifty yards of me.

"Some natives proposed to go up close and spear the lioness in the grass, if I would back them up with rifles. We arrived at the supposed spot, and after a search we distinguished a yellowish mass within some withered reeds. A man named Shooli now proposed that he should throw his spear, upon which the lioness would certainly charge from her covert, and afford us a good shot. I would not allow this, but I determined to fire at the yellow mass to bring her out. Lieutenant Baker was on my right. I fired. The immediate reply was a determined charge, and the enraged animal came bounding toward us with tremendous roars. The natives threw their spears, but missed her. I fired again, and the bullet lodging in the back of her neck, she dropped down dead." (See frontispiece.)

The character of the man, his estimate of the value of his own work, and may be realized by the following remarks, which Sir Samuel Baker penned at the close of his expedition. He says:

"At the commencement of the expedition I had felt that the object of the enterprise—the suppression of the slave-trade—was one for which I could confidently ask a blessing. My faith in God and dependence on His guidance and support has not been unrewarded. In the midst of sickness and malaria we had strength; from acts of treachery we were preserved unharmed; in personal encounters we remained unscathed. In the end every opposition was overcome; hatred and insubordination yielded to discipline and order. The territory within my rule was purged from the slave-trade. The White Nile, for a distance of sixteen hundred miles from Khartoum to Central Africa, was cleansed from the abomination of a traffic which had hitherto sullied its waters. Every cloud had passed away, and the term of my office expired in peace and sunshine. In this result I humbly trace God's blessing.

"A firm, honest, just government would render the slave traffic impossible. But the people are sunk in barbarism and steeped in ignorance. This alone should make us desire the speedy multiplication of Christian missions. The Gospel must be preached to these tribes in the Soudan, and Egypt, Africa, and Abyssinia, that from every kindred, and nation, and people, and tongue, some may be gathered out to join the great multitude before the throne! The missions which are now proclaiming the Gospel in these long-neglected and benighted regions are hastening the coming of the fast-approaching day of Christ; for 'this Gospel must first be preached among all nations, and then shall the end come.'"

THE BOYHOOD OF JOHN B. GOUGH.

(From Wide Awake.)

HIS life had been a peculiarly bitter one. Born in a very humble home at Sandgate, on the English coast, gleaning with his mother and sister after the reapers, that they might have bread to eat, or cleaning knives and shoes in the gentleman's house where his father was a servant, there was little to make a boy's life bright. When he was twelve, a family offered to bring him to America if his parents would pay fifty dollars for his passage. It was difficult to earn this, but his mother thought, after the manner of mothers, "Perhaps in the New World our John will be somebody." So, with tears, she packed his scanty clothing, putting in a little Bible, and pinning these lines on a shirt:

"Forget me not when death shall close
These eyelids in their last repose;
And when the murmuring breezes wave
The grass upon your mother's grave,
O then, whate'er thy age or lot
May be, my child, forget me not."

JANE GOUGH.

Then, again and again she pressed her only boy to her heart, and stole out behind the garden wall, that, unobserved, she might catch a last look of the stage which carried him to London.

The voyage was a long one of nearly two months. The little lad often cried in his cabin, and he wrote back, "I wish mother could wash me to-night," showing what a tender "mother's boy" he was. When New York harbor was entered, and he was eager to see his adopted country, he was sent below to black boots and shoes for the family.

His school days were now over. After two years of hard work in the country, he sold his knife to buy a postage stamp, and wrote his father, asking his permission to go to New York and learn a trade. Consent was given, and, in the middle of the winter, our English lad of fourteen reached the great city, with no home, no friends, and only fifty cents in his pocket. Hundreds passed by as he stood on the dock, holding his little trunk in his hands, but nobody spoke to him. But at last, by dint of earnestness, he found a place to enter as errand-boy and learn book-binding, receiving two dollars and twenty-five cents a week, and paying two dollars out of this for his board. How his employers supposed he could live on one dollar a month for clothes and washing has never appeared.

The first night he was placed by his boarding-mistress in an attic, with an Irishman who was deathly ill. The second night the man died, and the horror-stricken young boy stayed alone with the dead till morning.

Now nearly two painful years more went by. Finally, though he earned but three dollars a week, he sent to England for his mother and sister. When they arrived two rooms were rented; the girl found work in a straw-bonnet factory, and, poor though they were, they were very happy. John was now sixteen, devoted to his mother, and still a noble, unselfish, persevering boy.

At the end of three months, through dulness of business, both children lost their places, and now began the struggles which the poor know so well in our large cities. In vain they looked for work. Then they left their two decent rooms, and moved into a garret. Winter came on, and they had neither fuel nor food. John walked miles out into the country, and dragged home old sticks which lay by the roadside. He pawned his coat that the mother, who had now become ill, might have some mutton broth.

One day he left her in tears, and went sobbing down the street.

"What is the matter?" said a stranger.

"I'm hungry, and so is my mother."

"Well, I can't do much, but I'll help you a little," and he gave John a three-cent loaf of bread.

When the boy reached home, the good woman put the Bible on the rickety pine table, read from it, and then all knelt and thanked God for the precious loaf.

In the spring he obtained employment at four dollars and a half a week, but poverty and privation had fallen too heavily, rested too long, upon the mother. One day while preparing John's simple supper of rice and milk, she fell dead. All night long the desolate boy held her cold hand in his; then, in that Christian city, she was put in a pine box, and, without shroud or prayers, carried in a cart, her two children walking behind it, and was buried in the Potter's Field.

For three days afterward John and his sister never tasted food. Probably the world said "Poor things!" but it is certain that nobody offered to help them.

A Precious Carpet has been Destroyed in San Francisco. It had covered the floor of one of the rooms in the Mint, and had been used for five years. The dust of the precious metals used in the coinage had during that period daily fallen upon it, and when it was taken up the authorities had it cut in small pieces and burned in pans. The ashes were subjected to the process employed with mining dust, and they realized two thousand five hundred dollars. Thus the carpet after years of wear was more precious than when it was new. It is an illustration of the lives of some Christians. The discipline they endure in the world enriches them, and when God tries them they "come forth as gold" (Job 23: 10).

THE GOLDEN CALF.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"And he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strewed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it."—Exodus 32 : 20.

Men's Preference for Gods of their own Manufacture—Where the Gold Came from—The God Made—Destruction of it by Moses—The Fragments not all Used—Their Presence in our Time—Modern Idolatry—The Mighty Calf—Its Temple—Its Altar of Sacrifice—Families Offered on it—The Music of the Worship—The Chorus—The Worship to be Broken up—The Calf Still Made of Borrowed Gold—The Idol Inevitably Doomed—Changed Temples.

People will have a god of some kind, and they prefer one of their own making. Here come the Israelites, breaking off their golden ear-rings, the men as well as the women, for in those times there was masculine as well as feminine decoration. Where did they get these beautiful gold ear-rings, coming up as they did from the desert? Oh, they borrowed them of the Egyptians, when they left Egypt.

These ear-rings are piled up into a pyramid of glittering beauty. "Any more ear-rings to bring?" says Aaron. None. Fire is kindled; the ear-rings are melted and poured into a mould, not of an eagle or a war charger, but of a silly calf; the gold cools down; the mould is taken away, and the idol is set up on its four legs. An altar is built in front of the shining calf. Then the people throw up their arms, and gyrate, and shriek, and dance vigorously, and worship.

Moses has been six weeks on Mount Sinai, and he comes back, and hears the howling and sees the dancing of these and he loses his patience, and he takes the two plates of stone, on which were written the Ten Commandments, and flings them so hard against a rock that they split all to pieces. When a man gets mad he is apt to break all the Ten Commandments! Moses rushes in, and he takes this calf-god and throws it into a hot fire, until it is melted all out of shape, and then pulverizes it—not by the modern appliance of nitro-muriatic acid, but by the ancient appliance of nitre or by the old-fashioned file. He stirs for the people a most nauseating draught. He takes this pulverized golden calf and throws it in the only brook which is accessible, and the people are compelled to drink of that brook or not drink at all.

But they did not drink all the glittering stuff thrown on the surface. Some of it flows on down the surface of the brook to the river, and then flows on down the river to the sea, and the sea takes it up and bears it to the mouth of all the rivers, and, when the tides set back, of this golden calf are carried up into the Hudson and the East River, and the Thames, and the Clyde, and the Tiber, and men go out and they skim the glittering surface, and they bring it ashore, and they make another golden calf, and California and Australia break off their golden ear-rings to augment the pile, and in the fires of financial excitement and struggle, all these things are melted together, and while we stand looking and wondering what will come of it, lo! we find that the golden calf of Israelitish worship has become the golden calf of European and American worship.

THE REMAINS

Pull aside this curtain and you see the golden calf of

MODERN IDOLATRY.

It is not, like other idols, made out of stocks or stone, but it has an ear so sensitive that it can hear the whispers on Wall Street and Third Street and State Street, and the footfalls in the Bank of England, and the flutter of a Frenchman's heart on the Bourse. It has an eye so keen that it can see the rust on the farm of Michigan wheat, and the insect in the Maryland peach-orchard, and the trampled grain under the hoof of the Russian war-charger.

It is so mighty that it swings any way it will the world's shipping. It has its foot on all the merchantmen and the steamers. It started the American civil war, and under God stopped it; and it decided the Turco-Russian contest. One broker in September, 1869, in New York, shouted, "One hundred and sixty for a million!" and the whole continent shivered. The golden calf of the text has its right front foot in New York, its left front foot in Chicago, its right back foot in Charleston, its left back foot in New Orleans, and when it shakes itself it shakes the world. Oh, this is a mighty god—the golden calf of the world's worship.

But every god must have

ITS TEMPLE,

and this golden calf of the text is no exception. Its temple is vaster than St. Paul's Cathedral in England, and St. Peter's in Italy, and the Alhambra of the Spaniards, and the Parthenon of the Greeks, and the Taj Mahal of the Hindoos, and all the other cathedrals put together. Its pillars are grooved and fluted with gold, and its ribbed arches are hovering gold, and its chandeliers are descending gold, and its floors are tessellated gold, and its vaults are crowded heaps of gold, and its spires and domes are soaring gold, and its organ-pipes are resounding gold, and its pedals are tramping gold, and its stops pulled out are flashing gold, while standing at the head of the temple, as the presiding deity, are the hoofs and shoulders and eyes and ears and nostrils of the calf of gold.

Further: every god must have not only its temple, but

and this golden calf of the text is no exception. Its altar is not made out of stone as other altars, but out of counting-room desks and fireproof safes, and it is a broad, a long, a high altar. The victims sacrificed on it are the Swartouts, and the Ketchams, and the Fisks, and the Tweeds, and the Mortons, and ten thousand other people who are slain before this golden calf. What does this god care about the groans and struggles of the victims before it? With cold, metallic eye it looks on and yet lets them suffer.

O heavens and earth, what an altar! what a sacrifice of mind, body, and soul! The physical health of a great multitude is flung on to this sacrificial altar. They cannot sleep, and they take chloral and morphine and intoxicants. Some of them struggle in a nightmare of stocks, and at one o'clock in the morning suddenly rise up shouting, "A thousand shares of New York Central—one hundred and eight and a half! take it!"—until the whole family is affrighted, and the speculators fall back on their pillow and sleep until they are awakened again by a "corner" in Pacific Mail or a sudden "rise" of Rock Island. Their nerves gone, their digestion gone, their brain gone, they die. The gowned ecclesiastic comes in and reads the funeral service: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." Mistake. They did not "die in the Lord;" the golden calf killed them!

The trouble is, when men sacrifice themselves on this altar suggested in the text, they not only sacrifice themselves, but

THEY SACRIFICE THEIR FAMILIES.

If a man by an ill course is determined to go to perdition, I suppose you will have to let him go. But he puts his wife and children in an equipage that is the amazement of the avenues, and the driver lashes the horses into two whirlwinds, and the spokes flash in the sun, and the golden headgear of the harness gleams, until a black calamity takes the bits of the horses and stops them, and shouts to the luxuriant occupants of the equipage, "Get out!" They get out. They get down. That husband and father flung his family so hard they never got up. There was the mark on them for life—the mark of a split hoof—the death-dealing hoof of the golden calf.

Solomon offered in one sacrifice, on one occasion, twenty-two thousand oxen and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep; but that was a tame sacrifice compared with the multitude of men who are sacrificing themselves on this altar of the golden calf, and sacrificing their families with them. The soldiers of General Havelock in India walked literally ankle deep in the blood of "the house of massacre," where two hundred white women and children had been slain by the Sepoys; but the blood around about this altar of the golden calf flows up to the knee, flows up to the girdle, flows to the shoulder, flows to the lip. Great God of heaven and earth, have mercy on those who immolate themselves on this altar! The golden calf has none.

Still the degrading worship goes on, and the devotees kneel and kiss the dust, and count their golden beads, and cross themselves with the blood of their own sacrifice.

THE MUSIC

rolls on under the arches; it is made of clinking silver and clinking gold, and the rattling specie of the banks and brokers' shops, and the voices of all the exchanges. The soprano of the worship is carried by the timid voices of men who have just begun to speculate, while the deep bass rolls out from those who for ten years have been steeped in the seething cauldron.

Chorus of voices rejoicing over what they have made; chorus of voices wailing over what they have lost. This temple of which I speak stands open day and night, and there is the glittering god with his four feet on broken hearts, and there is the smoking altar of sacrifice, new victims every moment on it, and there are the kneeling devotees, and the doxology of the worship rolls on, while death stands with mouldy and skeleton arm beating time for

THE CHORUS—

"More! more! more!"

Some people are very much surprised at the actions of people in the Stock Exchange, New York. Indeed, it is a scene sometimes that paralyzes description, and is beyond the imagination of any one who has never looked in. What snapping of finger and thumb, and wild gesticulation, and raving like hyenas, and stamping like buffaloes, and swaying to and fro, and jostling and running one upon another, and deafening uproar, until the president of the Exchange strikes with his mallet four or five times, crying, "Order! order!" and the astonished spectator goes out into the fresh air feeling that he has escaped from pandemonium. What does it all mean? I will tell you what it means. The devotees of every heathen temple cut themselves to pieces, and yell, and gyrate This vociferation and gyration of the Stock Exchange is all-appropriate. This is the worship of the golden calf.

But my text suggests that this worship has got

as the behavior of Moses on this occasion indicated. There are those who say that this golden calf, spoken of in the text, was hollow, and merely plated with gold; otherwise, Moses could not have carried it. I do not know that; but somehow, perhaps by the assistance of his friends, he takes up this golden calf, which is an infernal insult to God and man, and throws it into the fire, and it is melted; and then it comes out and is cooled off, and by some chemical appliance, or by an old-fashioned file, it is pulverized, and it is thrown into the brook, and, as a punishment, the people are compelled to drink the nauseating stuff.

So, my hearers, you may depend upon it that God will burn and He will grind to pieces the golden calf of modern idolatry, and He will compel the people in their agony to drink it. If not before, it will be so on the last day. I know not where the fire will begin, whether at the "Battery" or Central Park, whether at Fulton or at Bushwick, whether at Shoreditch or West End; but it will be

* As Dr. Talmage did not preach in the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday, we publish this week this sermon by him, which has not before appeared in the Christian Herald.—Ed.

A VERY HOT BLAZE.

All the government securities of the United States and Great Britain will curl up in the first blast. All the money-safes and depositing-vaults will melt under the first touch. The sea will burn like tinder, and the shipping will be abandoned forever. The melting gold in the broker's window will burst through the melted window-glass into the street; but the flying population will not stop to scoop it up. The cry of "Fire!" from the mountain will be answered by the cry of "Fire!" in the plain. The conflagration will burn out from the continent toward the sea, and then burn in from the sea toward the land.

New York and London, with one cut of the red scythe of destruction, will go down. Twenty-five thousand miles of conflagration! The earth will wrap itself round and round in shroud of flame, and lie down to perish. What then will become of your golden calf? Who then so poor as to worship it? Melted, or between the upper and the nether millstone of falling mountains ground to powder. Dagon down; Moloch down; Juggernaut down; golden calf down!

But, my friends, every day is a day of judgment, and God is all the time the golden calf. Merchants of New York and Brooklyn, what is the characteristic of this time in which we live? "Bad," you say. Professional men, what is the characteristic of the times in which we live? "Bad," you say. Though I should be in a minority of one, I venture the opinion that these are the best times we have had in fifteen years, for the reason that God is teaching this nation, as never before, that old-fashioned honesty is the only thing that will stand.

GRINDING TO PIECES

A few years ago, in the panic, we learned, as never before, that forgeries will not pay; that the watering of stock will not pay; that the spending of $50,000 on country seats and a palatial city residence, when there are only $30,000 income, will not pay; that the appropriation of trust funds to our own private speculation will not pay. We had a great national tumor, in the shape of fictitious prosperity. We called it national enlargement; instead of calling it enlargement, we might better have called it a swelling.

IT WAS A TUMOR, and God cut it out; and the nation was sent back to the principles of our fathers and grandfathers, when twice three made six instead of sixty, and when the apples at the bottom of the barrel were just as good as the apples on the top of the barrel, and a silk handkerchief was not half cotton, and a man who wore a five-dollar coat paid for was more honored than a man who wore a fifty-dollar coat not paid for.

The modern golden calf, like the one of the text, is very apt to be made out of borrowed gold. These Israelites of the text borrowed the ear-rings of the Egyptians, and then melted them into a god. That is the way the golden calf is made nowadays. A great many housekeepers, not paying for the articles they get, borrow of the grocer and the baker and the butcher and the dry-goods seller. Then the retailer borrows of the wholesale dealer. Then the wholesale dealer borrows of the capitalist; and we borrow, and borrow, and borrow, until the community is divided into two classes—those who borrow and those who are borrowed of; and after a while the capitalist wants his money and he rushes upon the wholesale dealer, and the wholesale dealer wants his money and he rushes upon the retailer, and the retailer wants his money and he rushes on the consumer, and we

ALL GO DOWN TOGETHER.

There is many a man in this day who rides in a carriage and owes the blacksmith for the tire, and the wheelwright for the wheel, and the trimmer for the curtain, and the driver for unpaid wages, and the harness-maker for the bridle, and the furrier for the robe, while from the tip of the carriage-tongue clear back to the tip of the camel's-hair shawl fluttering out of the back of the vehicle, everything is paid for by notes that have been three times renewed. I tell you, my friends, that in this country we shall never get things right until we stop borrowing and pay as we go. It is this temptation to borrow, and borrow, and borrow that keeps the people everlastingly praying to the golden calf for help, and just at the minute they expect the help the golden calf treads on them.

The judgments of God, like Moses in the text, will rush in and break up this worship; and I say, let the work go on until every man shall learn to speak truth with his neighbor, and those who make engagements shall feel themselves bound to keep them, and when a man who will not repent of his business iniquity, but goes on wishing to satiate his cannibal appetite by devouring widows' houses, shall, by the law of the land, be compelled to exchange the brown-stone front on Madison Avenue or Beacon Hill for the Penitentiary. Let the golden calf perish!

But, my friends, if we have made this world our god, when we come to die we shall see

OUR IDOL DEMOLISHED.

How much of this world are you going to take with you into the next? Will you have two pockets—one in each side of your shroud? Will you cushion your casket with bonds and mortgages and certificates of stock? Ah! no. The ferry-boat that crosses this Jordan takes no baggage—nothing heavier than an immaterial spirit. You may, perhaps, take five hundred dollars with you two or three miles, in the shape of funeral trappings, to Greenwood Cemetery, but you will have to leave them there. It would not be safe for you to lie down there with a gold watch or a diamond ring; it would be a temptation to the pillagers.

Ah! if we have made this world our god, we shall see our idol, when we die, ground to pieces by our pillow, and we shall have to drink it in bitter regrets for the wasted opportunities of a lifetime. Soon we will be gone. Where are the veterans who on the Fourth of July, 1794, marched from New York Park to the "Battery" and fired a salute, and then marched back again? and the Society of the Cincinnati, who dined that afternoon at Tontine Coffee House on Wall Street? and Grant Thorburn, who that afternoon waited fifteen minutes at the foot of Maiden Lane for the Brooklyn ferry-boat, then got in, and was rowed across by two men, with oars, the tide so strong that it was an hour and ten minutes before they landed?

Where are the veterans that fired the salute, and the men of the Cincinnati Society who that afternoon drank to the patriotic toast? and the oarsmen that rowed the boat? and the people who were transported? Gone! Oh, this is a fleeting world; it is a dying world. A man who had worshipped it all his days, in his dying moment described himself when he said, "Fool! fool! fool!"

I want you to

and to give up the worship of this unsatisfying and cruel god for the service of the Lord Jesus Christ. Here is the gold that will never crumble. Here are securities that will never fail. Here are banks that will never break. Here is an altar on which there has been one sacrifice that does for all, for "by one sacrifice hath Christ perfected forever them that are sanctified." Here is a God who will comfort you when you are in trouble, and soothe you when you are sick, and save you when you die. For He has said: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned: neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."

When your parents have breathed their last, and the old, wrinkled, and trembling hands can no more be put upon your head for a blessing, He will be to you father and mother both, giving you the defence of the one and the comfort of the other. For have we not Paul's blessed hope that as Jesus died and rose again, "Even so them also which sleep in Jesus shall God bring with Him."

REUNION.

And when your children go away from you, the sweet darlings, you will not kiss them and say good-by forever. He only wants to hold them for you a little while. He will give them back to you again, and He will have them all waiting for you at the gates of eternal welcome. And He shall say, "Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I have clothed thee with change of raiment; even the spotless righteousness of my only begotten Son." Oh,

WHAT A GOD HE IS!

He will allow you to come so close this morning that you can put your arms around His neck, while He in response will put His arms around your neck, and all the windows of heaven will be hoisted to let the redeemed look out and see the spectacle of a rejoicing Father and a returned prodigal locked in that glorious embrace.

Quit worshipping the golden calf, and bow this day before Him in whose presence we must all appear when the world has turned to ashes, and

> When shrivelling like a parched scroll,
> The flaming heavens together roll,
> When louder yet, and yet more dread,
> Swells the high trump that wakes the dead.

The Steady Growth of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Italy, and especially in Rome, is chronicled by a newspaper correspondent who says: "The Count Enrico di Campello, who left the Roman Communion two years ago, and placed himself under the direction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, has been for some time assisting the Rev. Dr. Nevin, of the American Episcopal Church in Rome. His work has increased so rapidly that a room has been fitted up as the Chapel of San Paolo, in which services are held on every Sunday and holy day. The chapel is also open every night in the week for Christian instruction. Count Campello does not waste his time in denouncing Romanism, as so many others in a like position have done, but aims simply to be the teacher of all who for any reason cannot find in Romanism their religious home. He has visited England, and has been treated with great consideration by the dignitaries of the Anglican Communion. Monsignor Savurese, Doctor of Civil and Canon Law, until recently the Pope's domestic prelate, has just withdrawn from the Roman Communion, and has been received into the Episcopal Church by Dr. Nevin in St. Paul's Church.

The Funeral of a Congo Missionary is Referred to by a colleague in a very touching letter written from Manyanga. He says: "I reached Manyanga on October 16th, to find, to my sorrow, that my dear colleague, Mr. Butcher, had passed away on the previous evening to join Hartland and Doke, whom he had nursed so tenderly and loved so fondly. Mr. Malloney met me on the beach, and it was arranged that we should bury Mr. Butcher that afternoon at four o'clock. On my way up I saw his grave made ready, situated about one hundred and fifty yards from the beach. When I reached the house I took a long look at the body of my colleague, cold and still, and could not but feel bitterly grieved that I had arrived too late for a word to pass between us. At the appointed hour we buried him, amid tears and sorrow, and there he lies in his grave by the waters of the Congo, awaiting the resurrection of the just. There were present three gentlemen connected with the International Belgian Expedition, four or five native chiefs, with many of their subjects, some ten of his schoolboys, and twenty or thirty other native boys, the grand fact of his coming to this far-off land and dying here, in his efforts for Christ and the benefit of the people, being a touching sermon to the natives assembled round his grave; and it was evident to us all how greatly he was mourned."

By J. Alexis Edgren, D.D.

Professor of Biblical Literature in the Union Theological Seminary, Morgan Park, Ill.

A Uniform Decadence in the Church—Accompanying Development of Evil in the World—Uniform Warnings—The Great Periods Comparatively Short—Recurrence of the Two Thousand Year Period—The Effect of Expecting the Second Advent—An Incentive to Labor—A Source of Consolation—Objections Answered.

It is remarkable that humanity under all dispensations of God finally relapses into a state which calls for judgment. So powerful is sin, when aided by Satanic influence! After the fall and God's first gracious revelations to man, humanity so far relapsed that God must send the flood to sweep away nearly the whole race. After the further revelations to Noah, the preacher of righteousness, and the wonderful deliverance through the flood, man would not retain the knowledge of God, but sunk into idolatry, until it became necessary to choose one in whose seed the true knowledge of God might be retained, and of whom the promised Messiah should come. But even this chosen race lost itself in darkness and sin, until it crucified the Lord of glory and must be dispersed in all lands, after the fearful destruction of their capital.

Now Christianity begun to gain its wondrous victories, and the civilized world was filled with real or apparent Christians, until even the State Church system could be established. But how deeply did the majority of professed Christians degenerate! The Reformation sprung up, but how did the churches it left return into worldliness? A great struggle has since been waged against sin and corruption, and the Gospel is widely preached, but still there will, according to prophecy, be a decline even in the church itself, and in the unconverted world, until the Lord by grand personal intervention and judgment puts an end to it and introduces the millennium. And, alas! even the millennium itself will end in the gloom of rebellion and judgment. Thus we see that a sinking of humanity always precedes judgment, and judgment is followed by a higher plane of religious life.

Again, special messages from heaven, and opportunity for repentance precedes every great judgment. So it was before the flood, when Noah preached, so before the dispersion of the ten tribes, for God then sent a cluster of prophets, among whom were Amos and Hosea, who so emphatically warned Israel, and Isaiah, the evangelist of the Old Testament. So also before the Babylonish captivity, when Jeremiah and Ezekiel and others prophesied in Judah. So before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; for then Christ and the apostles by their preaching and works sought to save the Jewish people.

A CLOSING OPPORTUNITY.

So according to prophecy before the pre-millennial judgment, for it will be preceded by an extraordinary period of preaching the Gospel to all nations. This is in all probability the very period in which we live. How long it shall last we know not, but our opportunities are great. Happy he who makes good use of them. If the world in the time of Noah had one hundred and twenty years given it for repentance, perhaps as much, or far more may be given it now, a time of which we have not yet seen a hundred years. In twenty more, or in fifty how widely may the Gospel have been preached, how rich may be the harvest ingathered! And yet the fulfilment may be even nearer; or it may still require centuries. The Word of God furnishes no dates here. The final act of the final judgment will be preceded by the millennium, itself a blessed period of evangelizing work and of salvation on the earth.

We notice finally that

of sacred history have been comparatively short. Not two thousand years from the fall to the flood; a little over two thousand years from the flood to the Roman destruction of Jerusalem; and from that time to the present almost two thousand years have elapsed. If we now remember the predictions of a sudden and unexpected return of the Lord, and how it is said that He will finish the work and cut it short in righteousness; because He will make a short work upon the earth (Rom. 9 : 28), and how the Apocalypse announces the speedy return of the Lord, until in its closing it contains these words: "He which testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly." May it not be that in such utterances is pronounced the fact that the present period also will be comparatively short, somewhat like the others?

But then our æon is far advanced already, and who can tell how soon the evening shades may fall upon the world? The length of the millennium will perhaps be literally a thousand years. Then it also will be a comparatively short period, as others before it. Yet a thousand years may here symbolize a very long period, one to which all the former have been but a short introduction.

What ought now to be the effect of believing in Christ's pre-millennial coming? While the principle which shapes the course of the Christian is the new life he has received from God, aided by the Holy Spirit; yet, as he is not free from the remains of his old nature and the temptations of Satan, he needs often to remind himself of important truths, that he may be wise. He thus reminds himself of the certainty of death, and becomes wiser with regard to his own salvation, and with regard to his work for the salvation of others. But it is a fact that men generally expect to live long, and thus the thought of death does not very effectually prevent even the Christian from seeking worldly advantages for his own temporal enjoyment, in a way essentially selfish. Nay, even if he thinks he will soon die, he may be eager to amass wealth or rear some monument which shall call forth the admiration of after ages, thus seeking pre-eminently glory for his own name in the world, and confining largely his view within the limits of the present.

But could he firmly believe in the possible

of the Lord, he would more readily discover such selfishness in purpose and life, and have an additional powerful motive to live not unto himself, but wholly unto Him who may soon appear in glory. The wealthy would then far better use his wealth, the learned his talent, every one his gift as it might best honor God, and gain most for heaven. There would be little thought of extravagance, and show, and the pleasures and praises of the world, and much thought of moderation, and service, and devotion, and holiness, and faithfulness unto the end.

All this the Scriptures abundantly imply. Thus in the Gospels, the coming of Christ is made a motive to watchfulness (Matt. 24 : 42–44; 25 : 13); in the Acts to repentance (Acts 3 : 19-21); in the Epistles to every Christian virtue (I Cor. 1 : 4-8; Phil. 3 : 20, 21; 4 : 5; I Thess. 3 : 12, 13; 5 : 2-6; II Tim. 4 : 1, 2, 7, 8; Tit. 2 : 11–13; Heb. 10 : 36, 37; James 5 : 7–10; I Pet. 1 : 13; 4 : 7, 8, 13, and many other passages), and is it not the theme of the Apocalypse intended to incite to repentance, faith and hope? Evidently the looking for the Lord Jesus from heaven was of a holy and devoted life in the apostolic age. And it continued to be so for some time after. It cheered the martyrs, who hoped for a share in the first resurrection, and it encouraged the Christians generally, who believed in the pre-millennial coming of Christ, until this belief was lost in the temporal prosperity of a worldly State Church, from the time of Constantine onward. The Paulicians, Waldenses, the Forerunners to the Reformation and the Reformers, though they did not hold the doctrine of the millennium after Christ's coming, yet believed in the near approach of the end of the world, and looked for the coming of the Lord. Luther thought once it might occur within twenty years.

After the Reformation many excellent Christians have held or still hold pre-millennial views, among whom have been or are many of the most active and efficient laborers for the Lord Jesus in the mission fields or in the home-churches of the various evangelical denominations, and also many of the most learned commentators. And the testimony of many of these is, that the pre-millennial view greatly aids them in earnestly living for God and seeking the salvation of souls. If this doctrine of Christ's pre-millennial coming sometimes has been misinterpreted and misapplied, that does not prove it false. Other Bible doctrines have been misinterpreted and misapplied as well.

As to missionary labor the commission to go and preach the Gospel to every creature is as binding as ever. The belief in Christ's pre-millennial coming certainly does not lessen this duty. But it presents additional motives earnestly to perform it. For, if the Saviour's coming may be at hand, we know not how soon for souls may be very short. Then, if we have friends, still unconverted, how ought we to seek their salvation without delay? Again, since we live in the midst of a blessed time of ingathering, perhaps the last before the coming of the Lord, how ought we to work while opportunity is afforded us? How ought the churches of God to use their means and their talents, knowing that the time for all this is short? If we are not faithful, God will call others who shall be, for the fulness of the Gentiles must be gathered in before the end can come. The belief in Christ's pre-millennial coming ought therefore to produce greater personal holiness and more earnest efforts for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

It ought also to be

to the suffering children of God. Suffering need not disappoint them, since the present age must be marked by it until the very last. But in the midst of suffering they may hear the trumpet blast which shall call the righteous dead to life and the living to translation into heavenly glory. At all events, as soon as Christ comes they shall receive their resurrection bodies, and thus enter fully their eternal activity and blessedness, so that the coming of Christ ought to be an event full of blessed hope not only for the living here, but even for the spirits of the just in Paradise.

Again, it ought to be a warning not to become worldly-minded, seeing that prophecy foretells great worldliness and perilous times in the last days. It ought also to be a powerful means of awakening to the unconverted; for as we believe so we testify and preach, and certainly the impending judgment faithfully proclaimed ought to arouse the impenitent to an earnest seeking after God.

It is often alleged that the belief in Christ's pre-millennial coming must paralyze all missionary efforts. On the contrary, since this belief furnishes additional both at home and abroad, it must and actually does, as we have seen, stimulate to more earnest work for the salvation of souls. Again, that it is cruel in God to hasten a judgment in which a great part of humanity must perish. But is it not then rather cruel to allow, as hitherto, generation after generation to pass, mostly by far, unconverted to eternal ruin? Here we are rather ready to exclaim: O Lord, how long? But God has a great number of elect who must be gathered in, ere He sweep away by His pre-millennial judgment the most unrepentant of the last generation of the present æon—and who shall say that God is erring in His providence, or that such a judgment is unjust or cruel? Is it more so than the flood? "Who art thou that repliest against God?"

Another objection is, that according to the pre-millennial view the Gospel is a failure, since the present age must end in apostasy and judgment and be followed by a higher dispensation. Then of course the antediluvian dispensation was a failure; the Mosaic dispensation, too, was a failure; yea, and the millennium itself will be a failure, for even that most glorious exhibition of the power of the Gospel in the world will not prevent the outbreak of an apostasy on a gigantic scale, calling for the absolute final judgment. Reductio ad absurdum! Not God's wisdom, seen in His dispensations; but man's folly, seen in his apostasies, is the failure. Yet, notwithstanding man's deep fall, God will through His appointed means, grounded in the vicarious life and suffering of Christ, save out of the world a great number for His glory and their eternal blessedness. This accomplished, and the end of the dispensations in this present world will have come.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Converted through a Lady's Tears.—Mr. Mabon said at a recent meeting: "Some ladies in Glasgow have consecrated themselves to labor among the fallen in that place. One big, powerful man, who was as far down as Satan could drag him, caused much trouble to all connected with him. One of these devoted ladies went after him to his home. After some conversation, she knelt down and prayed for him with the tears streaming down her cheeks. Then she sang the hymn, 'Take me as I am.' He was much agitated when the hymn was finished, and after some further conversation he took Jesus as his Saviour. A few weeks ago he sat down at the Lord's Table for the first time. What touched this man was, not the speaking, nor the praying, nor the singing, but the tears. The sight of that cultured lady weeping for him was too strong an argument for him to resist."

Deciding Upon a Minister.—"A Highlander had occasion to visit a market to dispose of some cattle. He lived with a Christian man who held closely to the old Cameronian doctrines, and every Sabbath walked nine miles to and from a Cameronian meeting-house. On the Saturday night his guest inquired, 'Where do you worship on Sabbaths?' 'At —— nine miles off.' 'I don't feel inclined to walk nine miles to church. Is there no place nearer?' 'Yes, there is such a place and such another place.' 'Which is the best?' 'They are both good.' 'You speak as though there was a difference, what is it? I want to go where I will get a blessing.' 'Well, I will tell you in confidence.' 'Do so.' 'The one speaks in such a way that you lose sight of himself and everything else but Christ his Master. The other puts himself so much to the front that you forget Jesus and think only of the preacher.' 'The first is the man for me, I want a spiritual blessing.'"

"Nearly in Hell!"—The Rev. Mr. Wilson, speaking of a recent service, said: "I was much interested in one man in the audience, who held quite aloof from the people. But there was a play of intellectual light about his face that drew me to him. While the hymn, 'Take me as I am,' was being sung, it was easy to see his soul was stirred within him; and when I asked those who wanted to be prayed for to stand up, he was among the first to do so. I afterward stepped down to where he was, and asked him to go aside with me. He said he would gladly go anywhere. Without asking, he told me his history. It was so horrible that the relation of it nearly broke my heart. He summed it all up by saying, 'It is a wonder that during the last three years my wife and myself have not stepped into hell for what we have done.' I asked, 'Do you want the Lord?' and he eagerly said, 'Yes.' I invited him to kneel down with me, to ask the Lord for mercy. I have heard many prayers—many marvellous prayers—but I do not think I have ever heard a more thrilling prayer than that man offered; and I believe before we parted, the poor fellow, as he said, 'saw it'—that he yielded himself to Christ. I asked him for his address, saying, I did not live in Edinburgh, and I would like to communicate it to some one who would take an interest in him. He gave it, and then he asked for mine, saying, 'Mind, I am giving myself to Christ to-night, and I want to let you know how He is keeping me.' He subsequently said, 'I want to get home to tell my wife.' That was to me an evidence of reality, and I left the meeting saying to myself, 'Thank God for this meeting to-night!'"

A Reclaimed Drunkard Says: "Eighteen months ago there was not a bigger drunkard anywhere than myself. I spent half of my wages in drink every week, and though I joined many societies when trying to abstain, I never kept sober longer than a week till I joined the Blue Ribbon in Grove Street Hall. I kept sober for three weeks in my own strength, but felt myself giving way. When I heard Mr. Larkins, a converted publican or brewer from Burton-on-Trent, give his testimony, I said to myself, 'If God can save that man, He can save me.' I went home much grieved on account of my sins that night, and in my own room prayed for the first time. Shortly afterward I felt the burden of sin roll off my soul, and I realized the salvation of Christ. At present I am in the employment of a gentleman whose sons own nine public-houses. He does not like his men to get so drunk that they cannot stand, but he does like them to take as much as they can bear. I want to add that when I left it to God to save me, the desire for drink fell from me without any trouble."

What Puzzled the Infidel.—"The Rev. Dr. Hanna, of Edinburgh, when visiting, came upon a man lying ill. The doctor spent some time with the man, and found that he was a sceptic. After speaking and acting very kindly, the doctor prepared to leave, when the man said, 'It's very uncivil in me, after your kindness, to send you away without prayer; you had better engage in it. It won't hurt me!' Gladly complying with the rather ungracious request, the visitor knelt and poured his heart out before God. When he rose, the sick man said, 'You'll come back to-morrow; it's so wearisome lying here alone.' The next day, when the visitor called, the sceptic said, 'Do you believe in the Bible?' 'Yes.' 'In heaven and hell?' 'Yes.' 'Then it puzzles me why you ministers and Christians don't do more than you do for the conversion of others.' I need not say that I sympathize with the idea of that poor sceptic; it is a wonder to me that men and women who profess to have received Christ into their hearts can sit down and look quietly on while their fellows are rushing down to hell. I am glad to say that Dr. Hanna was able to lead the man to the Saviour of sinners."

A Tippling Beggar Converted.—Another man said: "I have spent thirty years of my life in pursuit of the pleasures of the world. I have travelled in many foreign countries, where I saw beautiful scenes which should have drawn my heart to the great Creator of them, but they did not, for it requires sympathy to reach the heart of men, and there is no such thing in the material creation. I found the most degrading vices rioting in the loveliest spots I visited. Wearied with my fruitless search of new pleasures, I went to a lower depth instead of rising to a higher altitude, and made the public house the place where I sought happiness. I thought that the lewd songs, ribaldry, and other unnameable sins constituted pleasure, but they were not. I became a confirmed drunkard, and ready to do anything for strong drink. I sank into such an impoverished condition that, to procure the fluid poison, I turned a beggar. In rags, and destitute, I went one night to an evangelistic meeting, where I heard of the peace of God which passeth all understanding. I returned to the house which should have been my home, and falling on my knees, prayed for a personal assurance from God. Suddenly Christ revealed Himself to me as my precious Saviour, and I sprang to my feet as though shot through the heart—the joy was so great. I thank God daily for keeping me in His grace, and go on trusting Him with all my heart."

PROPHETIC NOTES.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THERE is an explicit prediction in Revelation 16 that the evil spirits of Spiritualism are at the present time to go forth to the kings of the earth. A Vienna correspondent says: "Spiritualism has latterly found many believers here, not only among the more ignorant classes, but also in high aristocratic circles, one of its most prominent supporters having been Baron Hellenbach, who, for some time past, has been glorifying Bastian through pamphlets and other means. It was after reading one of Baron Hellenbach's pamphlets that the Archduke John requested the author to invite Bastian, a noted Spiritualist, to come to Vienna—he was then staying in London — and give some spiritualist séances. Bastian came, and about the end of last month two séances were held in the Archduke John's palace, when the usual tricks of the Spiritualist fraternity were successfully carried out, the performer being allowed every latitude and permitted to carry out his programme of exhibiting 'spirits' and so forth in a perfectly dark room." [His detection and exposure have already been recorded in these columns.]

THE DEVELOPMENT OF SOCIALISM.

We see the tendency everywhere of the present day is toward communism and anarchy. The secret societies (established for socialistic ends) are permeating and "honey-combing" society with such ever-increasing activity and audacity, as to prepare the way for the predicted political great earthquake, of the 7th Vial. Even at present those societies constitute a distinct fulfilment of one of the prophecies of our Saviour, which He uttered as preceding, and as being a sign of, His Second Advent. They are the standing cause of that "perplexity of nations," which, with other "signs of the times," we see prevailing at the present day.

The fact is that the prince of this world has run through his programme with courts and cabinets for the government of the nations; and his last resource to carry on his policy will be the disastrous one of the lodgment of the sovereign power in the hands of an infidel-communistic international alliance.

RISE OF THE PERSONAL ANTICHRIST.

From this state of things the personal Antichrist will ascend from a sea of agitation and commotion, to whom Satan will give his throne, his might, and vast importance; and whom the Lord will destroy by the "breath of His mouth" and the "brightness of His (Second) Coming." The arm of Satan, in the manifestation of this Man of Sin (knowing he hath but a "short time"), will be the complete annihilation of the human race. That Antichrist will be a Napoleon, and first a King of Syria, and will make a seven years' covenant with the Jews.

The Second Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ will, therefore, be pre-eminently in "due season"—at the proper crisis: when the "transgressors" shall have "come to the full," when the "mystery of iniquity" shall have run its length, and is about to explode by a "spontaneous combustion" to the desolation of the whole earth, and the destruction of the very elect; when the policies of Satan for the peaceable government of the nations in sin shall have been entirely exhausted, then the will ravage the earth with such violence that unless those days should be shortened no flesh (no human being) should survive them; but, for the elect's sake (always mindful of His own is Christ) those days "shall be cut short." The period of six thousand years, during which the devil has attempted to devise the constitution of an everlasting kingdom of evil on earth, will close amid the evidences of his utter failure.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Ways and Means Committee Agreed, by a strict party vote last week, to report favorably Mr. Morrison's Revised Tariff bill to the House. Many changes have been made in it since its first introduction, and it has lost much of the simplicity of its character. The result will inevitably lead to delay, as every clause may be debated separately. The changes made in the rates of duty are throughout to lessen the reduction originally proposed. As we predicted at the time Mr. Morrison's measure was first published, his proposal to reduce the duties on cotton goods proved a favorite point of attack, and he has consented to make the reduction only fifteen per cent, providing none of the articles, when the duty is reduced, pay a higher rate than forty per cent ad valorem. On woollen goods the reduction will also be fifteen per cent with sixty per cent as the highest limit. In placing coal on the free list an exception is made that coal from Canada shall continue to pay duty until the Canadian Government repeals the duty on coal from the United States. Other changes will probably be made in the passage of the bill through the House. It will be a critical debate, and members on both sides will find it difficult to "sit on the fence." The indications increase that one way or the other the Presidential election will largely turn on this question.

An Important Decision was Pronounced Last week by the United States Supreme Court on the legal tender quality of the Greenbacks. It is now fourteen years since the court decided, three of the eight judges dissenting, that Congress had no constitutional power to issue the legal-tender notes. The following year the court reversed its own decision, four of the nine judges dissenting. That decision regarded the legal-tender acts as justified by the exigencies of the times in which they were passed, thus implying that in ordinary circumstances Congress has no power to issue the notes. A test case was brought, and last week the court confirmed its second decision, one of the nine judges dissenting. The decision advances on that of 1871; it upholds the constitutionality of the act and decides that either in time of war or peace, whether there is or is not a public exigency, Congress has the power to issue legal-tender notes without limit. The decision excites no little apprehension in business circles, lest at some future time Congress, carried away by inflation ideas, should issue an inconvertible currency.

A Protest against the Continuance of the coinage of the silver dollar has been made simultaneously by the merchants of New York and Boston, and forwarded to the representatives in Congress of both States. It is intended to have a meeting of representatives of the commercial bodies of all the large cities in the country in Washington in order to impress upon Congress the sentiment of the business men relative to the silver question. Memorials to Congress, asking that the silver coinage be suspended for two years, have been printed by order of the New York Chamber of Commerce, and are being extensively signed by the merchants of the city.

An Amendment is to be Offered to the Bill Introduced by Mr. Dorsheimer granting copyright in this country to foreign authors who reside in a country the government of which gives copyright to American authors. When the bill comes up again in the House of Representatives an amendment will be offered providing that all publications entered for copyrighting in the United States under the act shall be printed and manufactured in this country. The amendment will be put in by a Democratic member, and is the production of a number of representatives of a Philadelphia Typographical Union, who have been urging upon Congressmen the necessity of its passage. The publishers generally appear to be indifferent as to the amendment, believing that self-interest will prompt the English author to avoid paying duty by having his books reprinted here instead of trying to sell his English edition.

The Repeal of the Law Limiting the Tenure of office in the civil service to four years has, it appears, the unanimous support of the House Committee on that department. Such a repeal would be consistent with the principles of the Pendleton act, the essence of which is that a position in the government offices shall not be a political reward, but a business arrangement. It implies that the best claim a candidate can have for office is, not a service rendered to a local boss, but efficiency in performing the duties required of a clerk or other official. The logical conclusion, therefore, is that an efficient servant shall be retained until he gives cause for removal. If the civil service act continues to work satisfactorily, and the public find that it tends to purity and efficiency, the repeal of the act limiting tenure to four years will be demanded; but with a Presidential election in the near future, it is not likely that it will be passed by this Congress.

Mr. Thomas L. James Gave to the Springer Committee last week a detailed statement respecting the Star Route trials which excited, in a remarkable degree, public interest. For several months past certain journals and prominent public men have been industriously laboring to show that President Garfield was led reluctantly into the investigation, and was so hampered by his private and personal relations with the accused men that he was anxious to the last to draw back, and dreaded the results for himself and his friends. Mr. James, who is the one living man most likely to know the facts, asserts that in reply to the representations made to the President with the view of inducing him to keep the scandal covered up, his uniform answer was: "No; I have sworn to execute the laws. Go ahead, regardless of where or whom you hit. I direct you not only to probe this ulcer to the bottom, but to cut it out." The public knows the result. The prosecution failed, but it is gratifying to know, as we now do, that the responsibility for the failure did not rest with President Garfield. The suggestion frequently made lately that Mr. Blaine successfully diverted inquiry from other channels in which awkwa discoveries might have been made, does not r ceive from Mr. James confirmation or denial.

Three Witnesses Testified in the Keife Boynton case last week that they had seen t ex-Speaker in friendly conversation with Gene Boynton at a time subsequent to the day which Mr. Keifer states the correspondent ma the corrupt proposal to him. This is importar because Mr. Keifer represented that he was shocked by General Boynton's proposal that cut his acquaintance. Mr. Dunnell, of Minn sota, also directly contradicted another of t ex-Speaker's statements. Whatever may be t report of the committee the public is not much doubt as to the merits of the affair.

A New Political Party may be the Outcor of a conference to be held in New York in M next. The Massachusetts Reform Club, whi is composed of members of both the Republic and Democratic parties, has issued the call f the conference. It invites men of all Stat who earnestly desire civil service reform, the r duction of the rates of revenue, and the cess tion of silver coinage, whether they belong one party or the other, or to no party, to se delegates to the conference, with authority, if should be thought desirable, to nominate can dates for the Presidency and Vice-Presiden This movement is an extension outside of Co gress of the movement said to be going on i side, having for its object an alliance betwe Mr. Randall and his friends on the one pa and the Republicans on the other. It may hoped that Congressmen will appreciate it.

An Independent Prohibition Ticket has be put in the field in Connecticut. A State co vention held in Hartford on March 4th nor nated governor, lieutenant-governor, secreta of State and other officers, and passed reso tions demanding that the manufacture and s of intoxicating liquors be prohibited by law a by constitutional amendment; denouncing t dominant political parties for their subservien to saloon interests, as exhibited in the repeali of prohibitory laws and the enacting of licer laws, and in the refusal to submit the consti tional amendment to the people; also, inviti all members of either political party who belie in prohibition to abandon their parties and un with the Prohibition party.

The Enforcement of the New Prohibitc law in Iowa will be carefully watched and aic by the temperance workers. Mrs. Flore Miller, secretary of the Iowa Women's Christ Temperance Union, says that while that org ization will not resort to the method of the c sade to enforce the new prohibitory law, th will be an active continuous effort to kee vital. The union has the machinery ready, while the members will not be informers the selves, they will assist and encourage other t perance organizations to enforce the law. M Miller says the ladies of the union will see t that ample funds shall be provided to rer nerate attorneys for their services. Her opin is that the law will be well enforced in the ir rior and even in Des Moines. Regarding river cities the union will endeavor to stimul public sentiment, and if without avail they ask the next Legislature for a State constabul

The Captain of the City of Columbus is H responsible for the Gay Head disaster by United States Inspectors. They report to Inspector-General that there was no special p on duty when the ship struck; that Captair E. Wright was the only legal pilot on duty at time of the disaster and for the two hours mediately preceding, and that for at least hour before she struck he was not at the p of duty of the pilot, attending to the ac duties. In conclusion they say: "For illeg delegating the performance of the duties of p to those unauthorized, and for inattention to duties as pilot, his license as master and pilc hereby revoked." The decision was evide reached with reluctance, the inspectors test ing in high terms to the captain's previous ciency and good conduct.

A Gift of $2500 was Declined on Principle by the trustees of the Presbyterian Hospital in Philadelphia last week. It was tendered by the managers of "a charity ball" recently held. The trustees say in their letter declining the gift: "It is our conviction that it would be inconsistent in us to accept means for the support of the work which the church has given us to do, in its name, and under its direction, which the church itself could not accept—which you would neither ask nor expect the church to accept." Churches who are so anxious to raise money that they hold fairs, at which there are lotteries and other objectionable means employed to increase the receipts, may profitably consider the example of consistency set by these hospital trustees.

Mr. Philip Phillips, the Singing Pilgrim, has been called to undergo a mournful bereavement. His son James, whose serious illness was mentioned recently, is dead. Mr. Phillips, writing to a friend on the subject, says: "His sickness and death were so full of hope and triumph that we feel it is almost wicked to mourn. But you can understand how much we miss him. He was not only a dutiful son, but my constant companion and helper in my daily work. Among his many expressions were the following: 'Keep on singing, father; I'll be with you in spirit, and we'll be on time to sing together again in glory.' 'I have seen all I care to in this world, and now would come the struggles of life; I shall escape them all, and go to explore the heavenly world.' 'Tis glorious to die with Christ.' 'Tell everybody I die a Christian.'"

A Successful Series of Revival Services have been recently held at Rossville, Ill., by Rev. George K. Little, of York, Pa. Meetings were held for twenty-three days consecutively in which Mr. Little was assisted by Rev. Job Ingram, the pastor of the M. E. Church. More than ninety additions were made to the Church as the result of the mission, and the quickened spiritual vitality of the Church still continues and increases.

The Rev. John S. Inskip Died at his Residence at Ocean Grove on Friday last. Since his relapse, recently mentioned in these columns, he has been gradually sinking, and though his spiritual strength has been marvellously supported by divine grace, his bodily powers have slowly failed. He was sixty-eight years of age, having been born at Huntingdon, England, in 1816. He came to this country with his parents when five years of age. He received his license to preach in 1835, at the age of nineteen, and has been in active service, preaching and writing, ever since. He held charges successively in New York City, Philadelphia, and Wilmington, Del. Of late years his energies have been devoted to revival services in various parts of the country, to the advocacy of Holiness doctrines, and to editorial work on his journal, the Christian Standard. In 1880 he made a revival tour around the world.

An Earnest Appeal to Medical Students to refrain from prescribing alcoholic drinks, was made by Mr. John B. Gough on Sunday, February 24th, in New York. In the course of his address to the medical students, Mr. Gough said: "To save the life of the body is noble, but to save the soul is nobler. 'I cannot drink one glass,' said a man to me, 'without getting drunk.' 'Then why drink?' 'Oh, I cannot refuse to drink, because it is customary for gentlemen to drink.' Said another, 'I hate drunkenness.' 'Well, then, why not abstain?' 'Because I think teetotalism is cowardly.' How easy to find excuses! Every time a young man falls he gets up weaker than before. Drink has caused the ruin of lawyers, doctors, and ministers. I knew a clergyman, an able man. I knew him well and have sat at his table. He is now a drunken hostler in a stable in Boston. When Moody was in Boston, some brothers went to see this man, and asked him how he had fallen so low. He answered that he was sick and applied to a doctor who gave him alcohol, and from that time the thirst for liquor grew upon him. 'The doctor,' he said, 'saved my body, but damned my soul.' It is a grand thing to save human life. It is a beautiful thing to see a physician with politeness and tenderness ministering to the needs of the sick; but grander than all it is to be instrumental in saving human souls. The physician has opportunities for that, and it is his duty to take advantage of them. To man the life-boat and save the perishing from wrecked vessels is a deed that deservedly wins the applause of men. To man the life-boat and save wrecked souls will win the plaudits of white-robed angels and the approval of the Almighty."

The Revival Services in St. Louis, Mo., Conducted by the Rev. Thomas Harrison are producing fruit as in other cities visited by the same evangelist. God is blessing his labors in a very marked manner. As in other cities, the secular press ridicules the appearance and "antics" of the preacher, but newspapers professing to be religious ought not to join in the jokes or repeat them. The fact is clearly established that already in St. Louis five hundred persons have made a public profession of faith, ascribing their conversion to the blessing of God on Mr. Harrison's meetings. Some of these persons were regarded as among the most unlikely in the city to become Christians.

A Religious Revival is in Progress at Princeton College, N. J. It commenced with the Week of Prayer, and thirty of the students have professed conversion. The work still continues, and is extending into the region around Princeton, where students from the seminary and college have been holding meetings for prayer and exhortation.

Another Instance of Answer to Prayer for colleges is reported from Indiana. A letter received from Hanover College, in that State, says: "Dating from the 'Day of Prayer for Colleges,' Hanover College has been enjoying a gracious visitation of the Holy Spirit. The meetings have been held under the direction of the College Young Men's Christian Association, and have been for the most part in their recently dedicated chapel. Already more than twenty of the students have presented themselves for admission into the Presbyterian Church here, and still the work of grace continues."

Help will be Needed for the Christian churches of Ohio and the flooded districts. Many churches have been completely destroyed by the floods and many more seriously damaged. The members of the churches have been much impoverished by the same calamity, and will not be able to contribute as they otherwise would to rebuild and repair their houses of worship. This is a case in which the Christian churches of other States may show a right spirit in extending a helping hand. A fund will probably be soon commenced for the purpose.

A Grand Centennial Celebration of the Baptist churches of Georgia is to be held in October next, for which preparations are already in progress. It is proposed to signalize the occasion by endowing Mercer University, of Macon, the principal Baptist institution of learning in the State, with $100,000. The institution is named after Jesse Mercer, one of the most eminent of the early Baptists in the South. The university originated in an offer made by a gentleman named Penfield to give the association $2500 for the establishment of a denominational school on condition that the association subscribed as much more. With this $5000 Mercer Institute was organized in 1833. A farm had been offered for the site of the institution in Greene County. A committee was appointed to select the site for the proposed building. They found the lot to be primeval woods. Seeking the shade of a large oak tree, they selected it, and, with uncovered heads, knelt in prayer. Jesse Mercer gave at different times sums amounting to $70,000 to the institution. Professor I. O. McDaniel, the father of the present Governor of Georgia, Henry D. McDaniel, was a member of the original faculty, and is still living. The governor is an Alumnus of the college.

THE ROCKY FORTRESS AND ITS INHABITANT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil; he shall dwell on high: his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks: bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure."—ISAIAH 33: 15, 16.

THERE were terrible times in Jerusalem in the days of Hezekiah. The Assyrian power was exceedingly formidable, and it was ferocious to the last degree. Woe to the unhappy land which fell under the power of this spoiler. Assyria knew not the meaning of "mercy;" it came down "like a wolf on the fold," rending and devouring without pity. The armies of Sennacherib were ravaging the kingdom of Judah, and they had brought it into such a state that the prophet cried, "The earth mourneth and languisheth; Lebanon is ashamed and hewn down; Sharon is like a wilderness; and Bashan and Carmel shake off their fruits." Before the invaders the land was a garden, and behind them it was a desolate wilderness. Yet the Lord had given a promise to His people in Jerusalem on this wise: "Therefore thus saith the Lord concerning the king of Assyria, He shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields, nor cast a bank against it. By the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and shall not come into this city, saith the Lord."

There were godly men in the city, I fear they were not many, who rested content with the sure promise of God, and went about their daily business feeling perfectly safe. They would have felt secure if the whole land had swarmed with Assyrians as the fields with locusts, for they believed the word of the Lord. Their trust was in the living God, and therefore they feared not the multitude of the enemy. But the whole of the inhabitants of Jerusalem were not of this brave order; the unholy were afraid, fearfulness surprised the hypocrites. Their sin and their deceit made cowards of them. They would all be destroyed, they would all perish by the Assyrians! Who was to save them? What power could resist the conqueror of nations? Where were the gods of Hamath and Arphad? The people of those cities had trusted in their gods, and yet none of them had been delivered out of the hand of the invader; how could Jehovah turn back the fierce tyrant now that he had come upon the land like a flood?

THE SINNERS AND THE HYPOCRITES in the time of trial were discovered; the sinners showed their fear, and the hypocrites manifested their unbelief. They began to flee before they were pursued; they trembled though no foeman could be seen from the walls. God in vengeance was come near to the city, the land smoked with all-consuming fire, the flame of the Lord's indignation burned perpetually—how could these men hope to live in such times? As well hope to live amid devouring fires and everlasting burnings. Alas! there are many who dwell among God's people at this day, and have a name and a place among them who are sinners and not saints, hypocrites and not believers; and these will before long be discovered and dismayed.

While all goes well with the church of God you cannot separate the vile from the precious, nor pluck up the tares from among the wheat, nor cast out the bad fish from among the good, which are enclosed in the same net. But trying times come, and days of adversity, and then the false brethren are discerned. Oh, dear brethren, let us not be satisfied with being in Zion, or in the church; let us not rest till we are quite sure that we are not sinners in it, that we are not hypocrites in it; for, mark you, if our religion is not sanctifying and true it will fail us in the hour of trial. If our confidence in God does not make us calm and hopeful in the time of temptation and sorrow, what is the use of it? Yet it is certain that no man shall find his profession to be of use to him in testing times but in it, he that is thorough in it, he that is neither a sinner nor a hypocrite in the sense in which those words are here used. Safety in Zion belongs to those born in her by regeneration, reared in her by sanctification, enfranchised in her by faith in the Son of God, settled in her by fixed principles, confirmed in her by obedience to her laws, and bound to her by intense love of her King and her citizens. Such "shall dwell on high" secure from danger, and only such; the aliens and foreigners within her gates shall ere long be driven forth with shame.

We are going to look this morning at these favored people: First, to note their character; secondly, to observe their security; and to finish, thirdly, by stirring up all present to seek their felicity. Oh, for the aid of the Holy Spirit all the sermon through!

I. First, let us note

THEIR CHARACTER.

They are described in part in the words of our text, but I am obliged to go a little further afield for one essential part of their character. The true people of God who in the time of danger will be preserved are a people who display a humble, patient, present faith in God. They are a praying people, who make their appeal to God under a sense of need; they are not fatalists for they pray, neither are they self-sufficient for they seek help of God. They are not a people who think that God will be gracious necessarily, and that, therefore, they need not pray for mercy, for they are found crying to Him in earnest prayer.

Furthermore, they are a waiting people: "We have waited for thee." If the Lord does not seem to hear their prayer at once, they nevertheless expect that He will do so; and, therefore, they wait expectantly. If at once they have not all the comfort and joy they would desire, they tarry God's pleasure, not rushing into sin to snatch a hasty rescue, nor running away at the first rebuff and saying, "What profit is there if we wait upon Him?" Quite certain that the Lord does hear prayer, and that He waiteth to be gracious, they hopefully abide His time, for His appointments are ever wise.

Our text gives a description of these people, setting out their various features. It first describes or how they walk: "He that waiketh righteously." Faith has an effect upon our entire manhood. When a man believes, his faith affects every part of him; it operates upon his actions, thoughts, wishes, and designs; and it affects both his private and public life. One of the first evidences of a true belief in God is that a man walks righteously. He tries to act rightly toward his God and toward his fellowmen; and thus he is led to be devout before the Lord, and upright among men. The rule of right is the rule for him; not policy, nor the hope of gain, nor the desire to please, much less the lust of the flesh and the pride of life. By the grace of God he labors above all things to walk in the narrow way of true holiness. I want you to notice this, because the promise I am going to speak about belongs only to the people who answer to this description; therefore, see you to it, that you do not take the comfort of the promise if you come not under the character to whom that comfort is given. The man who does not walk righteously shall not dwell on high; there shall be no place of defence for him. I deny that a man is a believer in the Lord Jesus if he remains a dishonest man; I deny that he has real faith in Jesus Christ if he is rotten in heart, unjust in business, and untrue in life. He knows not Christ who delights in iniquity. So you see that the first description of this blessed man who is to dwell on high is very searching, for it does not relate to his profession, but to his walk and conversation from day to day. It is not talk, but action that we have here. Here is no room for the fiction of formality, all is fact, fact of daily life.

The next feature that is described is

HIS TONGUE—

"he speaketh uprightly." No description of a man's character can be perfect which does not include his speech. A man who lies, or who talks obscenely or profanely, is a bad man! A man whose words are arrogant and boastful, cruel and slanderous, unreliable and deceptive, unchaste and impure, is no child of God. The grace of God very speedily sweetens a man's tongue, and if his religion does not operate upon his speech, surely it is not the religion of the pure and holy God. The doctor says, "Put out your tongue," and he judges the symptoms of health or disease thereby; assuredly, there is no better test of the inward character than the condition of the tongue. God grant that we may prove by our conversation that the Lord has renewed us in our inner man.

The next feature is the heart—"he that despiseth the gain of oppressions." Not only does he not oppress any man, nor wish to gain anything by extortion or by grinding the faces of the poor, or by any act of unrighteousness; but he thinks such gain as might be made in that fashion to be utterly contemptible—he despises it. He desires gain if it may come cleanly to him; prosperity is as welcome to him as to another man, for he has his own needs and the needs of his household for which he is bound to provide; but if any should say to him that there is gold to be gotten through pinching the laborer in his wages, or through grasping by law that which is not morally his own, he abhors the thought.

Dear friends, it little matters what our outward life may be, or even what our speech may be, if our heart is not affected by our religion. If grace only lies skin-deep in thee, it has only saved thy skin, but not thy soul. Until grace touches the mainspring, it has done nothing to purpose; the heart must despise evil, as well as the lips denounce it. Until the well-head is sweetened, the streams are foul. Not only must I do right, but love right; not only must I avoid wrong, but I must hate wrong; not only must I refuse unrighteous gain, but I must utterly despise it. See, my brethren, how much is needful ere any one of us can claim the choice blessings which are spread before us in the second part of our text.

The portrait does not omit the hands, those important members of the body—those prominent actors both for good and for evil. In Isaiah's days bribery was connected with every high and low; but the good man "shaketh his hands from holding of bribes." If money was slipped into his hand before he was aware of it, he shook it off with indignation. He would not take what was offered or keep what was given. There is much of bribery abroad still; in indirect ways men are offered advantages if they will wink at evil, or frown on good. Clean hands are as needful as renewed hearts. If your hands clutch the reward of a sinful trade, or a dishonest transaction, or if you hold a profit by countenancing wrong, or forbearing from right, you are not among the people whom the Lord has sworn to guard with His own right hand.

Thus we have described the feet, the tongue, the heart, and the hand. Now comes the ear—"that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood." Men who delighted in war in olden time were apt to regale one another with their cruel deeds—whom they slew, and how they slew them; they rolled the dainty morsels of cruelty under their tongues. In Hezekiah's times, I warrant, tales were told blood-red with horror that would have made our ears to tingle, and these were greedily listened to by those of a coarse spirit; but the good man in Jerusalem would not hear them. Now it is not the hearing of blood alone that you and I must avoid, but the hearing of anything that is tainted, prurient, sceptical, depraving. This has much to do with the health of a genuine Christian's soul—that he puts an embargo upon unclean conversation, counts it contraband, and will not allow it to enter his soul by the gate of the ear. He wisely shuts the gate, lets down the portcullis, and pulls up the drawbridge, so that no filthy communication may come in by Ear-gate. The same sacred prudence prevents our reading books which are corrupt, or false. As soon as we reach a page which has an ill savor about it, we drop the volume and return it to its owner; or if it is our own we cast it into the fire that it may do no harm to others. The righteous man "shutteth his ear."

The picture is complete when the eyes are mentioned—"he shutteth his eyes from seeing evil." He cannot help seeing it as he goes along his pilgrimage through life; but he seeks not such a sight, and as much as he can he avoids it. He takes no pleasure in the most brilliant displays of folly. Vain pomps and glories charm him not. He does not seek his amusement in gazing upon bedizened wickedness. If there be a turmoil in the street he is not the man that will be called as a witness to it, for he discreetly walks the other way, leaving off strife before it be meddled with. When others crave "to see life," he judges such life to be death, and pursues a nobler path. He wishes to see only that which is good, and true, and helpful to his progress to heaven. You know of how Ulysses caused his sailors to pass the rocks of the Sirens in safety. The sweet enchanting song of the fatal sisters would have fascinated the mariners, and drawn them upon the rocks, and so the crafty Ulysses sealed the ears of all his mariners with wax, lest the sweet deluders should destroy them.

> "Then every ear I barr'd against the strain,
> And from access of frenzy lock'd the brain."

To be blind and deaf and dumb in some places would be far better than to hear and see and speak to our own condemnation; better infinitely to enter into life halt or blind or deaf, than, having all our powers, to use them to sinful purposes, and fall into hell fire at last.

Shortly, the text means just this, that a true believer is a man who has himself well in hand, having mastery over his whole manhood. He has a bit in the mouth of all the steeds which draw the chariot of life, and he holds them under due control. He will not let his ear or his eye delude his fancy, nor his foot or hand deface his conduct, nor his heart or tongue betray his spirit; he will have nought to do with evil, he has no fellowship with it, his spirit is redeemed, regenerated, renewed. He will not be flattered into pride, nor bribed into deceit, nor allured into unholiness. The Holy Spirit has wrought in him a holy spirit, and integrity and uprightness preserve him.

II. We have reached our second head. I ask you to follow me while, concerning these godly men, we observe

THEIR SECURITY.

Observe it, first, as it is pictorially described in the text. The times are those of war; the battle rages in the plain, but "he shall dwell on high;" aloft upon the craggy rocks shall be his citadel. In times of invasion men resorted to the highest mountains and rocks, that there they might be sheltered among the lofty fastnesses. While others flee, this man shall dwell—dwell at ease, in permanent peace; and that dwelling shall be on the heights, far beyond the reach of the invader. Is not this glorious? The bands of robbers ravage all around, but they cannot plunder him; he looks down upon them and defies their power. There upon the inaccessible rock stands the city of peace, its quiet walls gleaming in the sunlight, and flashing back a calm defiance to the foe. "Mark ye well her bulwarks." A believer dwells on the heights, his life is hid with Christ in God, he cannot be reached by the darts of the adversary.

"Yet," saith one, "the enemy may starve a man out of his citadel; rock cities have been captured at last because the inhabitants have been pinched with hunger." There has been nothing for the men-at-arms to eat, and therefore they have sold their castle for bread. But this also is provided for: "His bread shall be given him." God will take care that the godly shall not want. As the Lord's chosen cannot be driven out, so they shall not be starved out. The believer shall hold the fort till Christ shall come, for the bread of angels shall be rained upon him sooner than he shall lack.

"Ah, well," saith one, "but even if bread could be conveyed into the fortress, yet you know these elevated positions cannot be readily supplied with water, and by thirst they may be forced to yield." The promise has thought of that also, for it is written, "his waters shall be sure." Do you remind me that all this is poetry? I answer, It is a poetical description, but it is true in every jot and tittle, and so I ask you to accompany me while we consider this thing as it may be actually experienced.

It is a matter of fact that the man who believes in the Lord Jesus Christ, and lives as a Christian should live, DWELLS ON THE HEIGHTS.

His mind is lifted up above the common cares, and worries, and vexations of life. I am sure that many of you know what it is to ride on the high places of the earth, and to look down upon the world as a poor, paltry thing. Thus has it been true of you, "he shall dwell on high." You have also found that you have had a place of defence in time of trouble. Though often assailed you have never been really injured; unto this day the rage of man has caused you no real loss. Even Satan himself has not been able to overthrow you; you have trodden upon the lion and the dragon; in the name of the Lord you have resisted the devil, and he has fled from you. All things have worked together for good to us up till now, and we know it; we have had a place of defence, and in this we will rejoice to be glad.

I must not fail to notice that the poetic utterance, "Thy bread shall be given thee," is also literally true. It has been true to you, my brethren, concerning your daily bread. That word is true, "Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." At times there has been little on the table, but all-sufficiency has still filled the storehouse. When God multiplied the oil and the meal of the poor woman at Zarepta, I do not believe that at any one moment she ever had more than sufficed for a single meal; every day that Elijah lived with her she had to scrape the bottom of the barrel, for she had never more than a handful of meal and a little oil. We are not told that either the barrel or the cruse were filled up; but we read—"the barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail." You may frequently reach the end of your provision, but you can never exhaust your Provider. If you have earthly provision as you want it, should it not suffice you? If you get as much as you need at this meal, and as much as you want for the next meal, is it not well? There is nothing like living from hand to mouth when it is from God's hand to faith's mouth. Daily bread promotes daily gratitude, and from God's hand hourly providence brings multiplied love-tokens, and is a surer sign of remembrance than if we could have life's mercies all in a lump.

"His bread shall be given him" refers also to heavenly bread, which we have even more cause to think about than about the bread which perisheth; this also shall be given us. If we be driven away from a faithful ministry, if we remove to the utmost ends of the earth where we miss the means of grace, yet the Lord will feed our souls. If His ministers do not feed us, He will Himself minister to us. The word of the Lord shall not cease to nourish us. "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want." As for the waters, the living waters of grace and of the Holy Spirit, these shall always flow; in summer and winter shall the still waters be found at your side; yea, they shall be within you "a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

Words cannot tell the privilege of the man who lives in God, and lives with God! He need not shiver in the damps of earth—he lives on high; he need not fear the fury of the enemy, for he has a place of defence; he need not dread the lapse of time, his munitions are of rock; he need not tremble at famine and drought, his needs shall all be met by the care of heaven.

III. So this brings me to close by urging you, dear friends, to seek

THEIR FELICITY.

First, shall I need to say, "Do not try to obtain it by hypocrisy?" Since they are so happy whom God favors, do not think that by getting your name into their church-book you will necessarily be favored too. Oh, brethren, be true believers and not make-believers. Do not pretend to be what you are not. Sinners in Zion are still sinners, and they will one day be afraid. Hypocrites, though joined with the people of God, are still hypocrites, and will ere long be surprised with fearfulness. Do not hope by a mere empty profession to win the blessedness of God's people; for by such means you will win a curse rather than a blessing.

Secondly, do not hope to win the bliss of the righteous by self-righteousness; for although we have been describing righteous men this morning, yet we have not been describing self-righteous men. The self-righteous is not righteous; the two things are wide as the poles asunder. These very people whom God favored had sinned; for we read in the twenty-fourth verse of the chapter, "The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." The blessing is not to the man who glories in his innocence, but "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." These favored people cried, "O Lord, be gracious unto us." They knew their need of grace.

See to it that you seek unto the Lord by a sincere faith. Again, use the second verse as your guide, and cry, "Be Thou their arm every morning, our salvation also in the time of trouble." Commit yourself to the guardian care of the Lord each day, and specially fly to Him in the hour of trouble; then will He create righteousness in you, and cause you in every good work to do His will. Go, I say, and seek unto the Strong for strength, and to the Righteous One for righteousness, and the blessings of the dweller upon the heights shall be yours.

As for you, my dear brothers and sisters, who are really walking before the Lord aright, straining with your utmost endeavors to do only that which is just and true, at the same time trusting alone in Jesus for your salvation, I would charge you to rejoice exceedingly. If this text be true, that we dwell on high and that our place of defence is the munitions of rocks, and that our bread shall be given us and our waters shall be sure, let us be glad! What a happy people we ought to be! I leave to others the task of showing the beauty of groaning, or the delightfulness of murmuring; it is mine to urge you to shake yourselves from the dust, and put on your beautiful garments. Why are you so cast down?

I have been so long away from England that I do not know where our Queen is residing just now; but if I had the wings of a dove, and could mount into the upper air, I would soon find out. I should look for

THE ROYAL STANDARD.

I should see it floating over Windsor or Osborne, and by this token I should espy the royal abode. Fling out the banner to the breeze when the King is within. Is the King at home with you, dear brother? Do not forget to display the standard of holy joy. Hoist it, and keep it flying. When the Bridegroom is not with us we will mourn; but so long as we see His face no man can make us fast. Rejoice, and yet again rejoice, and thus let the Royal Standard fly at the top of the tower; the King is within us! The Prince of Peace is enthroned in our hearts! The Lord is exalted, for He dwelleth on high, and we dwell on high with Him. Glory be unto His name. Ring the joy-bells! With clamor of united joy let us shout unto our God who maketh us to ride upon the high places of the earth! Let it be known abroad that there is no God like our God and no people like His people. Under heaven there are none so joyous as the Lord's afflicted saints, none so rich as the Lord's poor, none so honored in heaven as those that are despised of men for Christ's sake, none so worthy to be envied as those who to-day are ridiculed for their faith in God. The Lord be with you, and bless every one of you with the full enjoyment of this majestic text, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SUAKIM.

THE city of Suakim, a picture of which appears on the next page, is the chief seaport of the region which, under the name of the Soudan, is now engaging the attention of the whole world. Suakim stands on the western shores of the Red Sea, and from it roads lead to Tokar, about fifty miles off to the south; to Sinkat, about one hundred miles to the west, and thence to Berber and Khartoum, the capital of the Soudan. The importance of Suakim consists chiefly in its position on the sea-shore. To reach Khartoum by land involves a frightful desert journey from Egypt, broken only by an occasional sail on the River Nile. By a voyage of three days from Suez Suakim is reached, and thence the journey west may be pursued with less danger and difficulty.

The city has also attained considerable importance as a base of operations against El Mahdi and his horde of fanatical followers. The British ships in the harbor protect the town with their guns, and would be able to hold it against all El Mahdi's forces if they attacked it. The Mahdi, however, appears to prefer directing his energies to the acquisition of Khartoum and the cities of the interior. The inhabitants do not appear to realize the power of the big black monsters which float outside their city. A newspaper correspondent, writing to his journal, describes a panic caused in the city by the rumor that the Mahdi was approaching and the measures taken by the English general to allay it—measures which appear to have caused more terror than they allayed.

He says: "The port of Suakim itself is safe. Not if all the Mahdi's forces were outside, and General Baker's army annihilated, would the place be in danger, so long as our own vessels of war stand guard. Two gunboats lie anchored, one on either side of the causeway, and an enemy attempting to enter the town would be decimated by their fire. The other night the inhabitants and the enemy outside had a striking example of what the ships could do. Information was brought in that an attack was imminent, and the general asked the senior naval officer to fire a few rounds over the town, as some sort of intimation that we were ready. The request had hardly been made ere signals were flashed from ship to ship. In less time than it takes to write it, although the men were sleeping in their hammocks, the different crews were at their quarters. Shell after shell was sent panting through the moonlight over Suakim and far into the desert beyond, which was illuminated as they burst as if by lightning.

"Landing with Captain Nesham, the senior naval officer, we found the Greek, Italian and Egyptian merchants of the place congregated upon the wharf, where they shivered with fright, and making our way through the silent town to the outside camp the different Egyptian sentries whom we passed seemed hardly able to hold their rifles, so panic-stricken were they. The frequent flight of the shells overhead, the loud reports of the cannon and the distant thuds of the bursting charges soon restored confidence. The sentries, who looked so frightened during our walk out, were, on our return, grinning with restored confidence, and the crowd on the quay were chattering with delight as they listened to the rush of the shot."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Marriage was Announced as a Death in the newspapers of Scranton, Pa., recently. The bride is a Jewess, and her family, indignant because she married a Christian, published the notice of the marriage with a black border around it, explicitly stating that they regarded her as one dead. They have no objection to the bridegroom on the ground of wealth, station, or family, but only because he is a Christian. The affair has caused no little excitement, and Jews of the Reformed school condemn the act as illiberal. If the lady has not been converted from Judaism, there is no doubt that the marriage is imprudent and likely to involve both parties in misery; but if the lady has been converted, her family have reason for rejoicing rather than grief. The day is coming in the which they will desire a far closer union with the despised "Nazarene" than that of a marriage with one of His followers (Zech. 12 : 10).

The Dynamite School held a Meeting in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Sunday, February 24th, when much information was given as to the proceedings of the society. The members were enthusiastic over the news given by Mr. Walker Elliott, whom the president introduced as "a good and true worker" in the cause. Mr. Elliott informed his hearers that the society had secured, through the genius of Professor Mezroff, the possession of a secret which enabled any man to carry a dynamite bomb under his arm with as much safety as a loaf of bread. One such bomb would be sufficient to destroy the Houses of Parliament or Windsor Castle. Mr. Elliott also reminded the members that any of them might be suddenly sent across the water with a bomb at any time. Lists were distributed to the members containing the names of intended victims. Among them were the names of Irish informers, of juries who had convicted Irish "patriots," of Irish judges, and several official personages, including Mr. Gladstone. If any doubt existed as to whether such men should be permitted to go on unchecked, it ought to be removed by the following remarks uttered also by Mr. Eliott: "The time may come," Mr. Elliott said, "when we will have to use these bombs in New York, without crossing the ocean at all; for if railroaders keep on grinding the poor man to earth they will have to pay the penalty. There were men," he said, "ready to do the work now if they were sent the sinews of war." Among the indications given us in the Scriptures, which were intended to warn us of the approach of the close of this dispensation, was the prediction that in the last days such men as the dynamiters would flourish (II Peter 2 : 10).

The Deliberate Suicide of a Dog is Reported from Warwick, N. Y. The dog was a valuable and intelligent pointer, owned by a well-known sportsman, who recently purchased another dog, and as he found some difficulty in domesticating him, showed him extraordinary kindness and attention. The old dog manifested great disapproval of this treatment, and developed a case of unmistakable jealousy. Finally, failing to induce his master to cease his attentions to the new dog, he emphasized his disapproval by attacking the new dog, giving it a bad whipping, and then leaving the premises where he had lived so long. He went to an hotel, and could not be coaxed back to his old home. From the liveliest and most active of animals he became morose and sulky, seldom leaving his quarters in the barroom of the hotel. After he had been at the hotel for a day or so, the railroad cars seemed to become a fascination to him. He would take a position close to the track whenever trains went by and watch the wheels with apparently great interest. A few days ago he was seen standing as usual by the track, awaiting the approach of a train. As it was passing him he sprang suddenly in front of the wheels of a car, and was cut to pieces. The incident shows how highly the dog valued the affection of his master when, thinking he had lost it, he preferred death to life. Worldlings who can understand this cannot understand how a Christian would set such a price on his Master's love, without which life would become intolerable. But that love the true believer can never lose (Rom. 8 : 28, 29).

DR. THURSFIELD'S PATIENT.

(See Illustration.)

Dr. Thursfield stood on the stoop of his house hesitating as to how he should spend the evening. His office hours were over, he had no patients needing his attention, and having been for several weeks working assiduously at his profession, the young physician thought he was justified in giving that evening to recreation. He was undecided whether he would go to some place of amusement or take a brisk walk into the country as a nerve-tonic. As he stood thinking a hotel-messenger ran up.

"Are you Dr. Thursfield?" said the boy.

"That's my name."

"Can you go to the Grand Hotel, right away? One of the guests—No. 35—is sick, and he wants you."

The young man strode quickly in the direction of the Grand Hotel, wondering who the guest could be who knew him by name and desired his attendance in preference to the physicians who resided in the building. He soon entered the patient's room, and found him in a nervous and excited condition. The man had registered as George Martin, of Denver, Col., but no one in the hotel knew anything of him. As soon as Dr. Thursfield entered the room the patient, a strong, wiry, full-bearded man, looked up quickly.

"You are not Dr. Thursfield," he said, in a hoarse but powerful voice.

"Yes, I am Dr. Thursfield," the young man answered. "There can be no mistake; there is no other physician of that name in the city."

"No, no," said the patient, irritably; "Dr. Thursfield attended me in this city five and twenty years ago. You must have been a boy at school then. I want the Dr. Thursfield who prescribed for me before."

"Ah! I understand now. But you cannot have him. He has been dead fifteen years. I am his son, and I follow my father's profession. But there is no necessity for you to have me for your medical attendant unless you wish."

"Well, as you are here, you may as well see what you can do. As Dr. Thursfield is dead, one physician will suit me as well as another, but I wish I could have seen him. I wanted to have told him something of my history before I die." And the sufferer tossed uneasily on his bed, apparently vexing over the disappointment with the querulousness of a man whose system was wrought to a state of tension by physical pain.

Dr. Thursfield examined him, and, in spite of his ungraceful manner, prescribed for him.

The next morning the young physician visited him again, and pronounced the case a critical one. Through three weeks the doctor attended his strange patient, who, during that time, lay hovering between life and death. Neither to the doctor nor to the nurses, whom the doctor hired to attend him, was he communicative. He appeared to be well supplied with money, but no friends came to see him, nor did he desire any one to be summoned. Being asked if he would like a letter written to his family, he answered civilly but curtly, "No, there is no one I desire to see."

Dr. Thursfield and his Patient.

At the end of the three weeks a crisis came in the disease, and Martin grew delirious. During a whole day and night he lost all consciousness of his surroundings, and talked incessantly. Much that he said was unintelligible, but its tenor was always the same. Sometimes he appeared to be pleading with a young man, at others talking to a woman, apparently his wife, but always his words had one burden—the awful power of intoxicating liquor. He dwelt on its seductive influence, on the habit of drinking it and depending on it, unconsciously acquired. He depicted the struggles of the enslaved victim to free himself of his chains and the remorseless tenacity with which it clung to him. Then he would weep and wring his hands, crying, "Another victim! Another victim! I am a murderer!"

During twenty-four hours this distressing scene continued, and at its close Martin sank into the sleep of exhaustion. Dr. Thursfield expected that his waking would indicate the issue of the illness, and his interest in his patient being strangely excited, he resolved to witness the return of consciousness. Sending the nurses away, he watched alone by the side of the sleeping man. At length he saw him open his eyes and look around him inquiringly.

"You are better," said the doctor, cheerfully. "Do not talk now. I want you to take this medicine and go to sleep again."

The man was too weak to reply, but, smiling faintly, he took the proffered draught, and was soon sleeping peacefully. Then calling the nurse, the doctor told her that he should send wine and medicine to be administered alternately to support the enfeebled patient, whose recovery would now depend on the regularity and care with which he was attended.

Returning the next day the nurse met him outside the door with a grave face. "Martin," she said, "stubbornly refused the wine. He would take the medicine, and had taken it willingly, but no persuasion would induce him to touch the wine, and when urged to do so his excitement had been painful to witness."

"That is nonsense, nurse," the doctor said; "he must take it. I will give it to him myself."

Entering the room Dr. Thursfield congratulated the patient on his improved condition, and told him that his recovery was now assured, if he would obey orders. Moving to the foot of the bed, where the table stood on which the wine was placed, the doctor said:

"I have obtained some special wine for you—new wine, nourishing and not intoxicating. It will do you more good than any medicine I could prescribe. I want you to take a glass now."

Martin raised himself on his elbow, and, extending his hand argumentatively, said: "Doctor, you have had your own way all through, but now I shall resist. If my life depends on my taking that wine I will accept death in preference. You see I am perfectly calm and collected; I know I have been wandering, but I am sensible now. Feel my pulse; there is no fever. I calmly and deliberately say I consider my life would be dearly purchased at that cost."

"Do not be fanatical, Martin; this is no time for nonsensical scruples. You must take the wine."

"Come and sit down, doctor," said Martin. "Let me tell you about my nonsensical scruples."

The doctor obeyed, prepared to hear that his patient was a temperance lecturer.

"I will tell you briefly," said Martin, "the story I wanted to have told your father that night when I sent for Dr. Thursfield and you came to me. Twenty-five years ago I was in this city and was struck down with an illness similar to this. Your father watched me through it with more than professional kindness. When the crisis was passed he did as you are doing. He ordered me wine and I took it. I never knew before that time that a demon was slumbering within me. But there was, and he awoke. As I recovered, the wine became a necessity. I lived upon it. It was my sole dependence. I could not let it alone. I had to wind myself up with it as if I had been a machine that would stop without water, only my water was intoxicating spirit. My wife, a dear, good woman, doctor, pleaded with me, but I could not resist my craving. She died neglected and heartbroken. My two sons became drunkards through my example, and one of them is dead—killed by drink. The other is in prison for an offence committed when he was intoxicated. When all that evil was done, and I was a degraded, miserable drunkard, I was saved, miraculously saved. The demoniac in the Gospel from whom the devil was cast out by the Saviour was a fit type of my case. I was delivered. But my hands were stained with the blood of my wife, whose heart my conduct broke, and my boys were ruined. Do you wonder now that I, a desolate man, thinking of the past and all I have lost, would rather die than drink? Your father was not responsible. He acted according to his principles, but the result was worse than death. He knew not what he did."

Dr. Thursfield listened with feelings deeply moved. He pitied the man from his heart. Was it possible, he asked himself, that such ruin and desolation might be produced by a prescription incautiously given? In this case, certainly, he would give no wine, and when he found that Martin recovered without it, and that tonics might take its place with equal effect and greater safety, the young doctor resolved that never again would he prescribe the dangerous remedy which wrecks homes and lives.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Dangerous Ground.

SUDDENLY Rose Morley stopped, with an exclamation of surprise, and with a movement as if she were about to take flight—a pretty and graceful movement which, with her heightened color and parted lips, lent to her an additional charm at a moment when an additional charm was not needed. They had just turned a bend in the drive, which was hidden by a cluster of trees, and came unexpectedly upon a young man, strolling idly along with a gun upon his shoulder. Though he wore a velveteen shooting jacket and thick boots, and had no gloves on, he had an air of ease and rank, almost amounting to dignity, which often characterizes those who have never been in a dependent position. He was handsome, and his appearance was well cared for. His face resembled a little that of Mr. Waldron; but he was only twenty-two years old, and his expression was more self-satisfied and careless than that of the busy great man.

"Rose!" exclaimed this young man, in an accent of wonder, as he came face to face with Mrs. Morley; and the next instant he stretched out his hands, and caught hers in them, as if to prevent her taking the flight which her movement seemed to threaten.

"Robert! O Robert!" she answered with a bright smile and blush upon the face she lifted up to him, in an attitude of childish and forgetful delight, while he spoke again in quiet and hurried tones.

"Whatever in the wide world brings you here?" he asked, and a fine ear might have detected a slight tone of vexation in his voice. "It is two years since we bade one another farewell forever at Oxford, and I fancied that you were still there. Are you angry with me yet, Rose? But no; you are too good, too amiable, to be angry long. You were never angry with me, I remember, when my behavior was worst. Rose, I never met such a dear girl as you!"

"Upon my word," he continued, taking one of her gloved hands again in his," you are prettier than ever, Rose. There is some change in you. What is it? You have lost that little governess primness I used to tease you about, which never sat well upon your face. And your dress is more tasty than it used to be. Have you come into a fortune? Has that rich uncle you told me of died, and made you his heiress? Tell me what wind has blown you into this part of the country?"

"I am married," said Mrs. Morley, with downcast eyes.

"Married!" repeated the young man, an exclamation which he followed by a low, long whistle, that brought his dogs bounding about him, but he kicked them away with something of peevishness and irritation in his manner. "Married, Rose!" he repeated, gazing into her conscious face. "Ah! well, we were no more than friends, you remember; and we can be that still. And who is the good man?" He tried to speak in an easy tone of indifference, but there was an air of chagrin upon his face, which escaped the downcast eyes of Mrs. Morley. She blushed, and stammered; but at last was compelled to speak reluctantly.

"He is a very good man," she answered; "his name is John Morley."

"John Morley the bookseller!" ejaculated the stranger. "Why, Rose, where are your old ambitions flown to? Do you forget that two years ago nothing short of some thousands a year would satisfy you, and I had not that to offer you? I, a poor spendthrift, with a hard-hearted father, and not even an entailed estate, so that he could cut me off with a shilling if he chose. Oh, what fools we were!" He spoke in mingled mockery and regret, with a smile of bitterness, which it was impossible for Rose to comprehend; for catching the brighter glitter of his eyes, and the curl of his lip, she smiled back again gayly.

"Ah!" she said, with one of her most childish pouts, "but nobody else cared a straw about me; and I might have remained a governess all my life."

"Perhaps so," he answered coldly; "but are you really the Mrs. John Morley I am running away from? Miss Waldron said at breakfast she expected you this morning, and I made haste to take myself off; never thinking—who could think?—that it was my old friend, Rose. We were no more than friends, were we? Do you remember our stolen walks together, when everybody believed you were safe in bed? Ah, Rose! you were not made to be a governess."

"No, I was not," she said; "oh, I remember well! But what brings you here, Robert? Are you visiting at Aston Court?"

"Ah!" he said, with some embarrassment, "you only knew me as Robert Hall; but my full name is Robert Hall Waldron!"

He tried to speak as if it was the most ordinary thing in the world to suppress one's chief name; and Rose, who was not critical, accepted the explanation with no other feeling than one of surprise.

"Then you are Mr. Waldron's son!" she exclaimed. "Why, you made me believe he was a shocking, cruel old ogre! Oh, for shame, sir! I have seen him, and spoken to him, and I like him very much; and I am sure, quite sure and certain, that he likes me. He was at our house yesterday, and he would make Mr. Morley call me to speak to him, and he said he should like to see me sometimes at Aston Court, and he hoped Miss Waldron would be my friend. There now! And you always told me he was such a dreadful, bad, hard-hearted old Turk!"

"Ah, Rose!" said Robert Waldron, "you are the same sweet-tempered creature as ever. I could swear to that gay voice of yours amid a thousand—so clear, and merry, and sweet. I should like you to speak to me forever. Do you sing as you used to do? Will you sing for us at Aston Court? It will not be so dull there now you are near us. You must let me come and see you in your own home, or I shall never believe you are married. I cannot feel that you are John Morley's wife."

"But I am," she answered, with a clear little laugh; "and I have a daughter, too, Mr. Robert Hall Waldron. This is my very own little daughter, sir! Hester Morley."

He had not been altogether unconscious of the child's presence before, for it had imparted to him a feeling of more ease and freedom in this unexpected meeting with Rose. But now he looked at her more attentively. The grave and noble face of the child was full of wonder, which had something of a vague sadness in it; and her large earnest eyes were raised to him with an expression of innocent reproach. He felt in an instant that he had wounded her, and it was no part of his nature to hurt any one intentionally. There was no malice in his temperament. He had spoken perhaps slightingly of her father—a slight which Rose had not felt, and he wished to efface the painful impression.

"Hester Morley," he repeated, as if long familiar with the name, "the little girl I have seen sometimes at chapel! Ah! I know you again, you see. Your father is quite a friend of mine, as well as your new mamma. Do you love her very much?"

"Yes, very much," answered Hester, earnestly; "and my father loves her dearly as well. We are a great deal happier than we were before."

She spoke with a childish fervor which touched the impressible nature of Robert Waldron, and for a moment made him feel hardly innocent in his interview with John Morley's silly young wife. Perhaps it would be better to let this first encounter be the last. Yet no harm could come of their intercourse except a little dissatisfaction and discontent on the part of Rose. There had been no positive love-making between them in the old times; but now that she was married, to a tradesman, too, she might possibly compare him with her husband, to the disadvantage of the latter. Still, he did not quite like to lose sight of an old friend; and his own home was very dull. The decision was too much trouble for him, and he resolved to cast it upon a chance. If this grave and innocent child gave him permission to enter their secluded home, he would take it as a sign that no harm could come of it. He would not for the world disturb the peace of John Morley or his wife; but he could not quite make up his mind to see no more of Rose. Hester should decide it.

"May I come to see you at your own home, little Hester?" he asked, with his most pleasant smile and voice.

"Would you like to come very much?" she asked, with a wistful look into his eyes.

"Very much," he answered.

"Then we shall like you to come," answered Hester, holding out her hand to him, as if to assure him of a welcome. Robert Waldron clasped the little fingers in his own, with a strange feeling of reverence for the child's faith in him; and when he released them he took off his hat with an unaccustomed deference, and bidding them good-by, pursued his way along the park, while Hester and Rose Morley went on to Aston Court.

Miss Waldron received them with a distant approach to cordiality, which was more than enough to satisfy Rose. She enjoyed being in the spacious rooms, with a wide garden and park stretching before the windows. There was nothing narrow, confined, or sordid in this place of wealth; and her spirit expanded in it. She felt more at home, even here in Miss Waldron's austere presence, than in the close, dark, built-in rooms of her husband's house. Happily, both she and Hester gave satisfaction, upon the whole, to their patroness. In the amiable yielding of Rose she saw material for moulding a Christian after her own model; and Hester would soon be old enough to appreciate her teaching and become a convert of whom she might boast. Mr. Waldron came in before they left; and Miss Waldron graciously seconded his invitation to come again soon to Aston Court. Naturally, the fresh charm of Rose Morley's pretty face had more effect upon the elderly hard-worked man than upon his daughter; but both were well pleased to have her appear occasionally to relieve the tedium of a country life.

Both were always conscious of the difference between their own station and that of Mrs. Morley. In English society that distinction is never overlooked. The man who gets his living by buying and selling again is always made to feel that he belongs to a grade inferior to that of the men who "toil not, neither do they spin." Nevertheless, they were disposed to tolerate Rose Morley whose "manners were above those of her class." Rose, too, was so desirous of having aristocratic acquaintances that she forgave the Waldrons for their supercilious patronage, which often galled her.

The result was that the acquaintance thus opened between Miss Waldron and Mrs. John Morley ripened into a kind of intimacy which, however, continued crude and raw at its nearest approach to mellowness; a sour grape which would have set on edge any other teeth than those of the dull and weary young wife. It was the first winter of her married life, and she seized eagerly upon every chance and every excuse for going to Aston Court. It was at least an opportunity for displaying the too costly and elegant dresses which were lost in the seclusion of her own home. Miss Waldron sharply reproved her for them, and Rose meekly promised to buy no more when they were done with; but in order to wear them out, it was needful to wear them, and Miss Waldron was compelled to acknowledge the logic of her argument. Mr. Waldron liked to see the pretty girl about his house, and to hear her pleasant voice, now speaking, now singing, just as he willed; while Robert, in sheer idleness and without thought, loitered at home, instead of going off on some autumn tour as usual, satisfied with the little ripple of excitement which the near vicinity of Rose kept stirring gently about him.

Nor was John Morley at all discontented with his wife's new friendships. They had restored her old brightness and buoyancy, and they afforded her a pleasant society without entailing upon him the dreaded necessity of receiving and entertaining guests in his own house; for it is needless to say, that it entered into the imagination of no one to conceive the idea of Miss Waldron visiting familiarly under the tradesman's roof. Robert Waldron came often; and Mr. Waldron, whenever he had business to transact with his brother deacon, no longer tarried in the shop, but entered the room behind; when by opening the door, and calling in sonorous tones for Mrs. Morley and Hester, he was always sure of securing a few minutes' lively chat, such as had a wonderful flavor for the dry, hard mind of the puritanical man. But Miss Waldron came never.

Still, John Morley was not disturbed. He was too liberal to trouble himself with questions of superiority and inferiority in the social scale. He believed, and he had no reason to believe otherwise, that Miss Waldron was a young woman of eminent piety; all the church said so, and every word and look of her own asserted it. She was interesting herself in the conversion of his young wife, so beloved, yet so worldly, whose condition weighed heavily upon his spirit, and caused him hours of painful and accusing thought. He thanked God fervently for this intimacy; and a brighter glow of brotherly feeling toward the Waldrons was kindled in his heart.

About this time, also, there were new hopes cherished by Mr. Waldron for his son. There had been such hopes before, brooded over and fostered in secret; but while they were still callow and unfledged, some fresh outbreak of Robert's had always caused them to perish. He was not vicious; he had never yet been guilty of any flagrant crime; and in the eyes of most fathers he would have seemed a sufficiently promising son. But Mr. Waldron, like John Morley, could not be content with anything short of a decided change from the careless freaks of youth to the complete devotion of himself to religion.

Robert, however, had given no sign of such a change. He had even shown much impatience whenever his father or sister had urged upon him the necessity of attending to the affairs of his soul. He had always been anxious to abridge his visits at home, and prolong those listless sojourns abroad which he professed to enjoy. But this autumn he seemed in no hurry to quit Aston Court. He submitted himself to the rigorous rules of his father's house; was quiet and thoughtful; attended chapel regularly every Sunday morning, and not unfrequently in the evening. In fact, his conduct was blameless, except that he would not listen to the exhortations and reproofs of his sister. This was an improvement which encouraged Mr. Waldron to hope for better things still.

The visits of Robert Waldron to John Morley's house were ostensibly paid to Hester. The child attached herself to him with a very frank and very warm affection; and his easy nature, which found great delight in the admiration and love of others, returned her fondness. Never did a man—he was scarcely more than a boy yet—drift more aimlessly into a strong current of temptation. He very seldom saw John Morley, who kept close to his business; but Rose's drawing-room became his most frequent resort.

CHRISTIAN COMPANIONSHIP.

S. S. Lesson for March 23, II. Thess. 3 : 1-18. Golden Text, Prov. 13 : 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Biblical Injunctions about Companionship—Examples of Unholy Alliances—Unequal Yoking Forbidden—In Marriage—In Business—In Companionship—With Believers of Disorderly Walk—Christian Loafers—A Modern Example—Paul's Example—A Dressmaker's Profession and Practice—Paul's Prescription for Idleness—Noble Faith Workers—Christian Offenders not to be Counted Enemies—Honor in Menial Labor.

"He that walketh with wise men shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed" (Prov. 13 : 20). So speaks the man who "was wiser than all men" (I Kings 4 : 31). "A man is known by the company he keeps" is the world's own estimate of the influence of companionship. "Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord?" (II Chron. 19 : 2) was to Jehoshophat when he had joined affinity with the wicked Ahab, King of Israel. "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder" (Matt. 19 : 6); but on the other hand, let not man join together what God has put asunder. All through Scripture God has divided the wicked from the righteous. The first great judgment which came upon man was the deluge in the time of Noah. It was sent when the sin of man culminated in an unholy alliance of the sons of God (converted men) with the daughters of men (unconverted women). The sin of Sodom had reached its height when one child of God [Lot] went to dwell among, and so in a sense to have fellowship with, the ungodly inhabitants. He had accepted a position among them, and sat in the gate, which was the judge's seat. Then the place was ripe for destruction.

The Apostle Paul is most clear in his witness on this point, "Be ye not together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God. . . . Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing" (II Cor. 6 : 14-17). Here is clear direction; it matters not what the yoking may be, whether of marriage, or of partnership in business, or of friendship and companionship—the direction is clear as daylight, Be ye not yoked together with unbelievers. As under the law it was forbidden to yoke together an ox and an ass, whose steps are by nature unequal, so God forbids the union of those who are following Jesus with those whose steps are not only unequal, but turned in another direction.

How often we have seen the curse of God upon an unequal marriage! First, contention as to the way of living; time and strength lost over it; then patience and temper giving way, and then, because of having thus failed, the enemy taking advantage, and the unconverted one gaining the day; while the converted one loses all hope, and becomes a wretched backslider. And so with unequal yoking in business; a man of God, who is honorable, straightforward, and conscientious, enters into partnership with a man of the world; the ideas of the two are diametrically opposite; the child of God is forced into positions which gall his spirit, wound his conscience, and condemn him; and yet there is no way out but to lose all he has invested, and become penniless. Better that than maintain such a position. And the same principle applies with regard to companionship. A young man, who is a child of God, is constantly coming in contact with an unconverted young man of his own age. Their natural tastes are very similar—both are readers, and enjoy comparing notes as to their studies, but the one reads with the idea of the advancement of Christ's kingdom, the other to satisfy his own ambition. The child of God meets with no sympathy, and the influence of the other tells upon him, until he finds that his aim has become just the same as the other, that self, and not Christ, is the end of all his studies.

So far as to companionship with the unconverted. How about unfaithful believers. "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that

WALKETH DISORDERLY."

What is it to walk disorderly? That which numbers of half-hearted believers are constantly doing, especially if they can lay claim in any measure to be workers for the Lord. Paul does not speak of them as thieves, or liars, or adulterers, or swearers—they are those who shirk work, and expect honest, hard-working Christians to support them in idleness. This Paul calls "disorderly." "We hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies." "Well, brother," said a Christian man to such an one, when he met him in the street, "what are you doing now?" "Nothing," said the other; "I don't mean to work as long as Mr. —— will keep me." He worked upon the generosity of the gentleman referred to, pleading that he could not get work, and that he had a large family, and thus money which might have been used to send missionaries to the heathen, or to support real hard workers among our home heathen, was wasted on a "disorderly" believer from whom we are commanded, in the name of Jesus, to withdraw.

Paul says, "We behaved not ourselves disorderly among you; neither did we eat any man's bread for naught; but wrought with labor and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you." No one could accuse Paul and his companions of mercenary motives; whatever else might be the motive for coming to preach the Gospel—it was not for money. He had a right to expect that those to whom he ministered should support him while he labored, as he clearly shows (I Cor. 9 : 6-15); but he would not use this right, so that he might glory in that he made the Gospel of Christ "without charge." One day who often gives her testimony in meetings as being in a high state of grace, called on a well-known Christian worker, and said to her that as she was a child of God it was the duty of God's children to support her, and begged for some money, saying that God had shown her she was to apply to her. The Christian worker, having met with disorderly brothers and sisters before, told her that she was sinning against God to lead the life of an adventuress, under the garb of religion, and told her that if she worked at her trade there was no reason for her to be without food. This was simply obeying the apostle's distinct command.

If such are brethren, they are doing untold harm to the cause of Christ. Infidels, who may have some sense of honor, when they see these professors of religion living by duping the credulous, and all under the garb of piety, are utterly disgusted with anything so mean; and they set it down too often to the influence of God's truth, and believe that the truth itself thus demeans a man. Paul's rule for the Thessalonians is a safe one for us now, "We commanded you, that if any would not work,

NEITHER SHOULD HE EAT."

It would be an immense gain to the cause of Christ if the distinct command to withdraw from idlers or "disorderly" Christians, or religious beggars, were obeyed.

But what about faith work? are none called to work for souls in dependence upon God alone, while their time is too occupied with distinct teaching to allow of earning a living? Yes, thank God, there are such, like the eminent Mr. Müller of Bristol, and many in different parts of the world, who have followed in his footsteps. But not one of these will ever go in debt—not one of these will make known their need—even when the trial of faith is tremendous, as in the case of Miss Wheeler and Miss Charlotte Sisson in Bassius, India, who after going without any food whatever for three days and three nights, yet neither begged nor went in debt, but trusted God until succor came, unasked, except from God. There is nothing "disorderly" in faith such as this; and such faith is God-given and God-sustained. Mrs. Guiever, with her eighty orphan children, has known something of this trial of faith, but would count it an entire departure from the principle of faith to make her requests known to any but God; and He has never let the trial be more than could be borne.

Paul commands the "disorderly" that with quietness they work and eat their own bread, "and if any man obey not our word, . . . note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." To count such disorderly believers as enemies is to show personal feeling. The Lord calls us always to hold out hope to the erring. "If a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou be also tempted" (Gal. 6 : 1).

Some may say, "It is no use to admonish such; they will always plead that they cannot find work." The Lord never commands impossibilities, and we are quite sure that if He says,

"LET HIM WORK,"

He will be responsible to find work for him. It may not be work to which he is accustomed, but if a man really wants to serve God and finds he has grieved Him by idleness, he will find that, though he has been used to writing, it is an honor to carry parcels for the Lord's sake rather than be counted disorderly. A governess will rather become a nursemaid than be counted disorderly, if she has the love of God at heart. It is indeed a precious privilege to "give to him that needeth" as God gives ability, but one who can work and does not is not recognized by God as one that needeth, and we hinder his good in helping him to dishonor God. There are numbers of hard-working, honest people who will rather starve than go in debt, and who are always ready to help others when they want; it honors God to assist such. Let us learn the lesson, and be firm in our withdrawal from idle Christians for God's sake and for theirs.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Policy of England in Regard to the Soudan is said to have been declared in a despatch sent on March 7th from the British Foreign Office to Sir Evelyn Baring, its representative in Egypt. Its programme for the settlement of the Soudanese trouble is that the Egyptian frontier, which the English forces will maintain, shall not extend beyond the First Cataract; second, that Zobehr Pacha or some other ally of the Mahdi shall be appointed viceroy at Khartoum with the understanding that he shall maintain the trade routes between Khartoum, Berber, Korosko and Suakim; third, the Mahdi shall be appointed Sultan of Kordofan, with sovereignty over the regions of the White Nile, Darfour and Bahr Gazelle; fourth, that the Red Sea littoral, from Kasseir to Ansley Bay, south of Massowah, shall be a dependency of England; fifth, England will cede to Abyssinia two harborage ports upon the Red Sea, with a band of territory in Southern Soudan. It is believed by the government that the inhabitants of the Soudan will be satisfied with this arrangement. The fact that the Mahdi has been preaching his commission to establish universal dominion will, however, operate with his more fanatical followers to prevent such a settlement.

The Discussion Respecting General Gordon's proclamation to the Soudanese that he does not propose to interfere with domestic slavery is raging fiercely in England, where the general and his proclamation have been denounced by the opponents of the government. It is explained that General Gordon has not lost any of his antipathy to the slave trade, but that his mission being to tranquillize the Soudan he prefers to limit his operations to the political storm stirred up by the Mahdi. It was necessary to explicitly proclaim that he would not interfere with slavery because the inhabitants of the Soudan know him chiefly as the suppressor of the slave trade and naturally supposed that he came with the object of acting against it. To allay their hostility, and to enable him to effect the object of his mission, he issued his proclamation. In a letter he recently wrote he explicitly states his attitude on the slave trade as distinguished from slavery. He said: "If it suits me I will buy slaves. I will let captured slaves go down to Egypt and not molest them, and I will do what I like and what God in His mercy may direct me about domestic slaves, but I will break the neck of slave raids, even if it cost me my life."

In the German Reichstag, which was Formally opened on March 6th, the action of the American Congress was noticed in spite of Prince Bismarck's conduct and the efforts of the President of the Chamber to stifle the discussion. Herr Rickert, an independent, speaking, as he explained, on the order of the day, expressed thanks in the name of Herr Lasker's friends for the numerous tokens of sympathy which had been received. He was particularly grateful to the American Congress for the action of the House of Representatives. Herr Lasker's work will not be allowed to fall on account of his death. Baron Stauffenberg has taken up energetically the policy of the late leader, and is urging the union of all sections of the national liberals. Since the opening of the Reichstag distinct progress has been made toward the coalition of the progressists and the secessionists. This is fighting Prince Bismarck with his own weapons. He has hitherto been able to carry his measures by engineering a coalition of two of the many sections of German politicians by making adroit concessions to one or other as occasion demanded. The programme of the new party is thus stated in a telegram from Berlin to the New York Herald: "The new combination will be called the German liberal party. Its programme embraces strict adherence to the constitution, annual budgets, universal suffrage, secret voting, the payment of members of the Reichstag, the liberty of the press, of public meetings and of association, equality before the law, religious liberty and perfect equality of all creeds, economic progress, the suppression of State socialism, just assessment and taxation, with the exemption of articles of consumption. It will oppose any economic customs of policy which shall favor special interests, is against monopolies and advocates unimpaired maintenance of the national defence, with universal military services of short period and with an annual fixing of the peace contingent of the army. It further declares that progress must be based upon allegiance to the Emperor and to the federal constitution."

French Operations in Tonquin have been Resumed. A telegram from Paris, dated March 7th, says: "General Millot, the commander of the French land forces, with his staff, has crossed from Hanoi to the right bank of the Red River, and is advancing along the right bank of the canal of the rapids to effect a junction with General Negrier, who has left Haidzuong for Bacninh. Another column is advancing to the north so as to cut off the retreat of the Chinese. Fighting at Bacninh is imminent."

The Perpetrators of the Dynamite Outrages in England were not captured at the close of last week. The police continue their investigations, and are convinced that they are upon the track of the right men. Two Americans who landed at Southampton on February 20th and proceeded to London are the suspected parties. It is believed that after the explosions they fled to Paris. The French police are assisting the English officers in a search for them. An Irish member of Parliament, in a speech in the House of Commons, denounced the use of dynamite. He said he thought it tended to retard the progress of Ireland, and would prejudice the English people against the Irish—an opinion which is very likely to be true.

The Discontent of the Russian Peasantry has assumed a violent form in White Russia, which includes the provinces south of St. Petersburg on both sides of the river Dwina. The centre of the agitation is Pskov and Vitebsk. So intense is the irritation of the peasants in the latter province that the governor has telegraphed to St. Petersburg asking that the troops specially sent to Vitebsk be withdrawn, as a collision is feared. Appeals addressed to the educated classes have appeared in White Russia urging them to join in the struggle against absolutism.

Conflicting Rumors of the Movements of the Mohammedan False Prophet are in circulation. The inhabitants of Khartoum are in constant dread of his approach. Colonel Burnaby who has had considerable experience among the Arabs, in the course of a lecture he recently delivered said: "The danger to England does not consist in the Mahdi's forces, it consists in the Pan-Islamic movement, in the feeling of the Egyptians, of the Mohammedan world, of men ground down by European usurers in Egypt, ground down by taxes on salt in Hindostan, and who catch at the False Prophet even as a drowning man catches at a straw. Each day this movement is growing throughout the East. We have a vast number of Mohammedans and idolators beneath our rule in India. They have seen us unfriendly to the Sultan, they have seen us strangle in Egypt the aspirations of the national party, they know that the Sultan is powerless, they look upon the Ilbert bill and the Bengal Tenancy bill as signs of the weakness of our government. With another success they will regard the Mahdi as a deliverer."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Completed their three weeks' mission at the London Suburb of New Cross on March 2d. It was attended with increased blessing. The services were largely attended, and the interest was sustained to the close. Lady Beauchamp and her son and her two daughters have taken a prominent part in the services, singing in the choir and assisting in the after meetings. The usual custom in public meetings of reserving seats for the wealthier classes has been reversed by the evangelists, twelve rows of chairs all across the hall having been reserved for workingmen. On one occasion a large manufacturer attended and brought seven hundred of the factory hands and their families. Dr. Thorold, the Episcopal Bishop of Rochester, who recently visited America, and who has been an enthusiastic friend of the evangelists, was present on February 18th. He occupied a seat beside Mr. Moody, and remained until the close of the after-meeting. Messrs. Moody and Sankey have now completed just half the time apportioned to the work in London. In four months they have held meetings in the districts of Islington, Wandsworth, Stepney, Battersea, Stratford, and New Cross. They have held over two hundred meetings exclusive of overflows, with an average attendance of 5000, which gives a million of hearers. Their next station is King's Cross.

An Instance of Remarkable Philanthropy has just been made known in England. A gentleman advertised some months ago, offering $5000 to any person who would introduce him to Christian work in a Christian institution for poor children. Dr. Barnardo, in response, placed the claims of his well-known East-end work before the advertiser, the result being that the gentleman in question became so interested in the work that he has now devoted himself solely to its furtherance. He was formerly a partner in a large and wealthy brewery in the provinces, his partner and relative representing in Parliament the county in which the brewery is situated. Under the influence of religious conviction the gentleman referred to relinquished his share in the business at a sacrifice of many thousands a year income; and since his introduction to Dr. Barnardo he has left his estate in the Isle of Wight and personally promoted the Canada emigration scheme, which is one of the agencies at work in connection with the Stepney Homes. He has just bought an estate of 8000 acres at some distance from the British Metropolis, which he intends to devote to farm-work, to be carried on by poor boys.

The Coronation of Queen Ranavalona III., of Madagascar, is graphically described in a narrative recently published by the London Standard. It says: "The Queen was conducted to the Chair of State, on a small table by her side being a large, handsomely-bound Bible. A salute was fired, and the whole people assembled shouted their welcome. After this the Queen rose and addressed her people in a remarkably clear and sweet voice. She said briefly that she had succeeded to the throne, with all its duties, which she engaged to fulfil; the people, on their part, were to fulfil theirs. She had received the whole island—not part of it—its boundary was the ocean on all sides; not a bit of this would she give to any one—no, not the breadth of a hair; and, woman though she was, she would be like a man in the defence of her kingdom. Her Majesty went on to say that the foreigners who were on friendly relations with them would be well treated, and, finally, she declared that she only recognized Jehovah as her God. Upon Him she also rested her kingdom, and the fear of Him was the beginning of wisdom.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

On Friday, March 7th, the Rev. John S. Inskip breathed his last, at his home, at Ocean Grove, N. J. Since his paralytic seizure, some months ago, encouraging reports have been issued from time to time, leading to the hope that his life-work was not wholly closed. That his activity of tongue and pen would be resumed could not be hoped, but it was thought that he might recover sufficiently to perform some portion of the duties with which his name has for many years been identified. That, however, was not the Lord's will. He to whom Mr. Inskip gave himself for use and service has called His servant from the harvest-field on earth to rest and reward.

The movement in which Mr. Inskip labored has aroused widely different feelings in the religious world. He believed that Christian perfection might be attained instantaneously by an act of faith, and his constant effort was directed to inducing Christians to seek that blessing. Even in the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he was a minister, a large proportion of the members have little or no sympathy with the doctrine Mr. Inskip taught, and have no confidence in the experience he and his friends professed to have enjoyed. In other denominations the opponents of the doctrine are still more numerous. They contend that progress in holiness is a continuous growth, the result of prayer, discipline, watchfulness, and a constant looking unto Jesus; that perfection is never attained in this life, but always there is a higher point of attainment still ahead, beckoning the Christian aspirant onward and keeping him humble. Many of our readers, as we find from their letters, belong to this last-mentioned class; but even to them such a life as that of the late preacher must be of interest. The desire for holiness is paramount in the heart of every Christian, and doubtless those who believe with Mr. Inskip that sanctification is, like justification, instantaneous, are conscious of growth in grace afterward, and still seek day by day to become more like their Lord. The difference between Christians on this subject, as on many others, is less radical than either party believes, and will vanish wholly when, in the presence of Christ, the whole Church universal joins in the song "Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood . . . to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever."

Mr. Inskip was an Englishman by birth, but an American by education and life. He was born in Huntingdon, England, the birthplace of Oliver Cromwell, on the 10th of August, 1816. When he was five years of age, the Inskip family emigrated to America and settled, first in Wilmington, Del., and afterward in Chester County, Pa. There the boy was converted under the ministry of the Rev. Levi Scott, the senior bishop of the M. E. Church.

Mr. Scott preached on the words, "They began with one consent to make excuse" (Luke 14 : 18), and looking down casually at John Inskip, said, "That lad will say he is too young." The young man had imbibed infidel views from his father, who was a sceptic, and had never been in a church, but the preacher's direct remarks went home to his conscience. Mr. Inskip senior was very angry at his son's conversion, and, after trying in vain to make him renounce his faith in Christ, of his house. The lad of sixteen went forth homeless, carrying his possessions in a bundle, vexed at heart but strong in faith, cheering himself with the song:

TURNED HIM OUT

"Oh! how happy are they
Who their Saviour obey,
And have laid up their treasure above!"

His father saw him go out of the house, not knowing whither, and was so affected that he went after him and brought him back. There is reason to believe that the sceptical man was deeply impressed by his son's conduct. The fact that religion had so much power, even over one comparatively new to its influence, as to induce the sacrifice of a home was a proof to him that it was no delusion. Ultimately the father himself believed in Jesus and lived and died a faithful Christian man. As the time drew on for the son to make a plan for life, he chose the ministry for a profession, and in 1836 he was received into the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Church. He continued there for about nine years, and was then transferred to the Ohio, or what is now the Cincinnati, Conference; and in other seven years he was transferred to the New York East Conference; then to the New York Conference; from thence to that of Baltimore; and finally, back to New York East, of which Conference he continued a member.

Mr. Inskip was four years President of the Preachers' Meeting at New York, and when stationed at Baltimore, he became prominent as a preacher and pastor. It is related that on one occasion, when he was addressing a large audience with remarkable power, a politician of note put his head in at the door, and after looking on a little while, said, "What a man to raise a mob!" So struck was the man, in his own standpoint of a platform orator, by Mr. Inskip's power of influencing an assembly. Having thus laid the foundations of a reputation, Mr. Inskip, accompanied by his wife, paid a short visit to Europe in 1859 or 1860.

HIS SPECIAL WORK.

But it was as one of the foremost exponents of the higher life of sanctification that Mr. Inskip was best known, and any history of the man would be misleading which did not exhibit him most conspicuously in that character. The following is an account of the process Mr. Inskip underwent prior to his making the teaching of this doctrine his chief business, as given by Rev. W. McDonald who was his close friend and hearty coadjutor in the mission:

"The subject of entire sanctification early attracted his attention; and he became profoundly interested therein at the time of his ordination, when the bishop asked him the solemn and heart-searching questions usually put on those occasions: 'Do you expect to be made perfect in love in this life?' 'Are you groaning after it?' etc. At that moment he came very near to this great salvation. . . . His mind, it is true, adhered to the doctrine [of entire sanctification] as a peculiarity of his creed. He was supported in his adherence by a kind of denominational tenacity which led him to contend for the doctrine while discarding the experience. The doctrine he found in all the standard authorities [of the Methodist Church]; and, knowing it as a 'specialty' among Methodistic ideas, he was constrained to protect and advocate it on all suitable occasions.

"Notwithstanding this, he became exceedingly hostile to a profession of the experience. His hostility assumed a more reprehensible form than doubt or scepticism. It became, in fact, a deep-seated and unyielding prejudice, and sometimes developed in the most uncharitable criticisms upon those who professed the blessing and the methods which were adopted to promulgate it. . . .

"He was [during the two years immediately preceding his profession of the experience] living a more devout life than at any former period of his history. His personal religious state had been more prominently in view, and excited a larger measure of attention and effort than usual. This was not, however, with any special reference to the attainment of the definite blessing of purity. He was seeking 'a closer walk with God,' and frequently was conscious of extraordinary power in the pulpit and divine communion in the closet. His religious experience during this period was of an improving character. He was under the control of the sentiment expressed in the line,

"Nearer, my God, to thee; nearer to thee!"

Yet the idea of seeking entire sanctification as a definite blessing did not enter his mind."

This was Mr. Inskip's state of mind when at the Sing Sing camp-meeting, on August 19th, 1864, his wife, publicly professed to have received the blessing of perfect sanctification. She had been deeply interested in the subject before setting out for the camp-meeting, and had been present at most of the meetings in which the subject of holiness was specially presented. Her entire time had been given to the great matter, and all the energies of her soul had been aroused and drawn toward it.

At length, on the morning of the last day of the meeting, the question was suggested to her mind, 'Will you be willing to acknowledge this blessing to your husband and others?' She said within herself, "Yes;" and after prayer and much self-examination she resolved in faith and dependence on divine strength, to make the profession. Upon returning home, Mrs. Inskip took the first opportunity to testify in the church of what she believed God had done for her, and immediately a number of persons came forward to the altar seeking a similar blessing.

The impression made on Mr. Inskip's mind was such that it led him to call to God for a larger measure of the influence of "the Spirit of truth" (John 14 : 17; 15 : 26; 16 : 13), that he might be a more efficient laborer in the vineyard. He was wonderfully enlivened, and his whole soul was stirred within him. Yet he did not at once determine to seek definitely the blessing of holiness.

He was at that time pastor of South Third Street M. E. Church, in Brooklyn, and on the Sunday morning after Mrs. Inskip's public confession (August 28th), he preached on Heb. 12 : 1, and while pressing the point of the text upon his audience, he frankly acknowledged that he was himself no better than with God. His appeals were, nevertheless, very urgent and direct. He cried out in a vehement manner, "Brethren, lay aside every weight. Do it now. You can do it now, and therefore you should. It is your privilege, and therefore it is your duty, at this moment to make a consecration of your all to God, and declare you will henceforth be wholly and forever the Lord's." He repeated these and similar words several times with increasing force and earnestness, when all at once his conscience seemed to say to him, "Do yourself what you wish the people to do."

He saw the inconsistency of his own position in a moment, and, throwing off his backwardness, he put forth strong faith and exclaimed, "Come, brethren, follow your pastor. I am determined to lay aside every weight. I call heaven and earth to witness that I now declare I will be henceforth wholly and forever the Lord's." Then he cried out with his eyes toward heaven, "I am, O Lord, wholly and forever Thine!"

"In this act of commingled consecration and faith," writes the Rev. W. McDonald, "the wondrous work was done, and he was at once divinely assured of its consummation. The bliss, the peace, the triumph of that hour will never be forgotten.

"The effect upon his congregation was truly amazing. Up to this time there had been no marked indications of any revival interest among the people. But in the evening of the day referred to the altar was filled with penitents, and eight souls were happily converted to God. The work went on with wondrous success and power. Over three hundred persons were onverted during a series of protracted meetings eld in the church."

It will be of interest to mention here that ome years subsequently, when Mr. Inskip was astor of Greene Street M. E. Church in New ork, the colored evangelist, Mrs. Amanda mith, attended and derived fresh spiritual life nd energy from the blessing of God on Mr. nskip's labors.

A year or two after these events the Rev. W. . Osborn, now a presiding elder in the South ndia Conference of the M. E. Church, sug- ested to Mr. Inskip that a camp-meeting ould be held specially for the promotion of oliness. The idea was taken hold of and a ll was issued to all persons favorable to hold- g such a meeting to assemble in Philadelphia make arrangements for it. A number of rethren responded to the call, among whom as the late Rev. Dr. Roberts, of Baltimore, ho presided on the occasion. Vineland, N. J., as fixed upon as a suitable place, and there, due time, the camp-meeting was held.

It was a time of great prayer. We are told at all the business of the meeting was trans- cted by the brethren on their knees. The mented Rev. Alfred Cookman was there, and voked God's presence and blessing with his ual fervor. And thus, in these hallowed cir- mstances, was formed the hich has spread over all the land. Mr. Inskip as chosen President, and the Rev. W. cDonald, Vice-President of the Association. From that time the prominent members of the ssociation received calls to hold special ser- ces in various parts of the country, and in the ring of 1871 Mr. Inskip was invited by Bish- Ames to accompany him to his conferences the West. He accepted the invitation, and d good service in leading ministers and people to the enjoyment of perfect love, after which joined a party of Association members at naha, and went with them to the Pacific ast. These brethren had a large audience-tent th them, and they held meetings in Sacra- ento, Santa Clara, and San Francisco; and on eir way back they held a meeting in Salt Lake ty. Immediately after their return they ined a larger body of their members and held rvices at Round Lake and at Urbana, where r. Inskip was temporarily prostrated by sun- oke.

RETIREMENT FROM THE PASTORATE.

The success of these and other such labors led r. Inskip to retire from the work of the pas- rate, and ask to be placed on the supernume- ry list of the Methodist ministry. The follow- g is an abridgment of his own explanation of e step, which he made and printed at the ne: "For many years past the conviction on mind that the Lord called me to a larger ld of operation than that furnished by the gular pastorate has been increasing in clear- ss and strength. Many of my most devoted d confiding friends, both of the clergy and ty, have frequently urged that I ought to ve upon a line of evangelistic effort, insisting at I could serve the cause of the Redeemer tter in that way than any other.

"The demand upon my time and energies ade by the National Camp-meeting arrange- nt has been full as much as I could endure in dition to the labors of a heavy pastoral arge. The recent invitation to the Pacific ast, and a call from the other side of the lantic, and numerous other urgent solicita- ns for special service, presented to the mem- rs of the National Association a state of facts ich convinced all that some of us were vinely called to meet the emergency. Upon oking candidly and prayerfully into the pecul- qualifications, circumstances, and surround- gs of each, all seemed to be perfectly agreed at the undersigned ought to give himself to s special work." Mr. Inskip's friend, Mr. Donald also resigned his pastoral work at same time, and for similar reasons. After t time these two gentlemen were able to give their whole time to preaching and holding meetings for the promotion of holiness.

We must now turn to the subject of Mr. Inskip's

LITERARY CONNECTIONS.

The Advocate of Christian Holiness, a well-known monthly magazine, was started by the National Camp-meeting Association at Boston, in July, 1870, not to record the proceedings of the Association, nor to further its interests, but to further its object. The Vice-President of the Association, Mr. McDonald, was appointed its editor.

The other journal of the Association, of which Mr. Inskip himself was the editor, is the Christian Standard and Home Journal, published by the Rev. Andrew Cather, at 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia. This is a weekly paper, an eight-page sheet, which succeeded the Methodist Home Journal formerly published by the Rev. Mr. Wallace, editor of the Ocean Grove Record. These two organs of the Association have now a circulation of about 18,000.

The subject of this short sketch was a man of unusual mental abilities and of peculiar energy and individuality of character. His industry was great, his conscientiousness in fulfilling engagements was remarkable, and he was methodical in all his habits. His manner was genial and his kindness great. The conspicuous feature of his daily life was loyalty to God; he sought to know God's will and to do it. On this principle, he, some years ago, broke off the habit of smoking. He enjoyed excellent health, and had much power of endurance. During a tour through some of the Southern States, in the winter of 1879–80, he preached ten or twelve times a week, besides frequently making short addresses, from the beginning of November to the end of March, with only two intervals of a few days each.

He was very sociable and conversational with his friends, and he made friends of all the Lord's people. He held all he possessed at God's service, and gave largely out of his slender means. In all his work for God he was aided and supported by his excellent wife, who survives him, and is a ready and impressive speaker at meetings, and to whom he had been married above forty years. He had an only son, but lost him about twenty years ago.

THE ROUND LAKE CAMP-MEETING.

The Rev. W. B. Osborn, who was the first to suggest a camp-meeting for the promotion of holiness, about six years ago, just before he went to India, proposed to Mr. Inskip that he and a party of members of the Association should make with the view of stirring up the churches to an earnest endeavor after the standard of holiness. The guidance of the Holy Spirit was sought in prayer, and the idea was deemed to be practicable. It was submitted to all friends and well-wishers of the Association, and funds sufficient to warrant preparations for the long journey were received. These preparations were completed, and the party, consisting of the Revs. Mr. Inskip, W. McDonald, and J. A. Wood, and their wives, sailed in the National Line steamship, The Queen, on June 23d, 1880. Other ladies and gentlemen accompanied them of their own choice, and paying their own expenses, but the friends of the Association were responsible for the six persons we have indicated, who, however, received no remuneration for their mission.

After working some time in the United Kingdom, the party proceeded directly to India, to which they were cordially invited by the Methodist Conferences, and which was the principal field of their testimony and labor. From India the party went to Australia and so made their way home. The time of their absence was about eighteen months. The tour was specially indorsed by the New York East and New England Conferences of the M. E. Church, and by several eminent servants of God, one of whom, Bishop Simpson, gave Mr. Inskip the following letter of commendation;

"It gives me pleasure to say that Rev. John S. Inskip is a minister of good standing, as well as of age and experience, in the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. I have known him well for many years as an active, devoted, and efficient laborer in the Lord's vineyard. In his visit to foreign countries he is accompanied by Mrs. Inskip, who is also well known to the Church as an earnest and successful Christian lady who has been of great service in assisting in protracted and revival services. They are both commended to the courtesy of Christian friends, and the blessing of God is invoked upon them.

"M. Simpson, Bishop M. E. Church."

The departure of this Christian band was celebrated by a camp-meeting of extraordinary interest at Round Lake, which began June 12th, 1880, under the presidency of Mr. Inskip. It was a time of special encouragement to the clergymen and their associates who were to travel twenty-four thousand miles of sea and land before they set feet on their native shores again.

Mr. Inskip's appearance before his death became more venerable than it was when the portrait from which our cut is made was taken, but in other respects the likeness will be recognized as a faithful one.

A FATALITY AVERTED BY A HORSE.

The Rev. James Somerville, whose name is fondly and gratefully cherished by the inhabitants of New South Wales, was one of the most indefatigable missionaries who ever labored in that land. He was a man who never seemed to need rest. After preaching and conversing for hours he would mount his horse to ride twenty or thirty miles to another station to continue his labor. Every day in the week had its appointed journey, and often the journeys were of prodigious length. Some of these journeys were remarkable for their narrow escapes from accident, for the country is wild, and many of the inhabitants were, at the time of his residence there, of a desperate character.

One remarkable incident, notable as an evidence of God's especial care over His servants, is recorded by Mr. Somerville, who frankly describes it, though telling against himself.

Numerous salt-water creeks pervade the Shoalhaven district. They were much affected by the tides, and were great impediments to travel, and there were no bridges. Mr. Somerville was well acquainted with the numerous fords, but floods often altered them, and in that fact lay a great danger to the traveller. On one occasion Mr. Somerville came to a crossing-place where his horse could ordinarily slip in gently, and, carry his rider over without swimming, or, at worst, gently lose his foothold, and swim steadily through the still water. All appeared as usual to the sagacity of man, but not so to that of the horse. The horse was naturally obedient and fearless of water, but on this occasion he steadily refused to enter the stream. The rider urged the horse to enter, and, irritated by what he supposed to be obstinacy, he raised his arm to strike the animal, but desisted, and gave his horse the rein to go and do as he liked. The animal immediately commenced a course along the bank of the creek until he came to what appeared to be a far less inviting spot, and there safely crossed, scarcely wetting his rider.

Mr. Somerville afterward discovered that the crossing-place he had first attempted had been washed away, and examination at low water proved that had the horse been prevailed upon to enter, he must have plunged at once down an almost perpendicular bank into about twenty feet of water; in this case he, of course, would have sunk with his rider to the bottom, and his rider's life would have been placed in imminent peril. In all probability horse and man would both have perished. Mercifully—for nothing happens apart from divine supervision—this servant of God was riding a peculiarly sagacious beast, and to that fact, under God's providence, he doubtless owed his preservation from death.

THE HORNET'S MISSION.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage.*

"The Lord thy God will send the hornet."—DEUT. 7 : 20.

IT seems as if the insectile world were determined to extirpate the human race. It bombards the grain fields and the orchards and the vineyards. The Colorado beetle, the Nebraska grasshopper, the New Jersey locust, the universal potato-beetle, seem to carry on the work which was begun ages ago when the insects buzzed and droned out of Noah's Ark as the door was opened.

In my text, the hornet flies out on its mission. It is a species of wasp, swift in its motion and violent in its sting.

ITS TOUCH IS TORTURE

to man or beast. We have all seen the cattle run bellowing under the cut of its lancet. In boyhood we used to stand cautiously looking at the globular nest hung from the tree-branch, and while we were looking at the wonderful covering we were struck with something that sent us shrieking away. The hornet goes in swarms. It has captains over hundreds, and twenty of them alighting on one man will produce certain death.

The Persians attempted to conquer a Christian city, but the elephants and the beasts on which the Persians rode were assaulted by the hornet, so that the whole army was broken up, and the besieged city was rescued. This burning and noxious insect stung out the Hittites and the Canaanites from their country. What gleaming sword and chariot of war could not accomplish was done by the puncture of an insect. The Lord sent the hornet.

My friends, when we are assaulted by great Behemoths of trouble, we become chivalric, and we assault them ; we get on the high-mettled steed of our courage, and we make a cavalry charge at them, and, if God be with us, we come out stronger and better than when we went in. But alas for these of life—these foes too small to shoot—these things without any avoirdupois weight—the gnats, and the midges, and the flies, and the wasps, and the hornets ! In other words, it is the small stinging annoyances of our life which drive us out and use us up. In the best-conditioned life, for some grand and glorious purpose God has sent the hornet.

I remark, in the first place, that these small stinging annoyances may come in the shape of a sensitive

NERVOUS ORGANIZATION.

People who are prostrated under typhoid fevers or with broken bones get plenty of sympathy ; but who pities anybody that is nervous ? The doctors say, and the family say, and everybody says, "Oh, she's only a little nervous ; that's all !" The sound of a heavy foot, the harsh clearing of a throat, a discord in music, an inharmony between the shawl and the glove on the same person, a curt answer, a passing slight, the wind from the east, any one of ten thousand annoyances, opens the door for the hornet. The fact is that the vast majority of the people in this country are overworked, and their nerves are the first to give out. A great multitude are under the strain of Leyden, who, when he was told by his physician that if he did not stop working while he was in such poor physical health he would die, responded, "Doctor, whether I live or die, the wheel must keep going round ; and though I may be disappointed in it, if before I die I don't surpass Sir William Jones in profound Oriental literature, may no tear of grief for me ever profane a borderer." These sensitive persons of whom I speak have a bleeding sensitiveness. The flies love to light on anything raw, and these people are like the Canaanites spoken of in the text or in the context—they have a very thin covering, and are vulnerable at all points. "And the Lord sent the hornet."

Again, the small insect annoyances may come to us in the shape of

who are always saying disagreeable things. There are some people you cannot be with for half an hour but you feel cheered and comforted. Then there are other people you cannot be with for five minutes before you feel miserable. They do not mean to disturb you, but they sting you to the bone. They gather up all the yarn which the gossips spin, and retail it. They gather up all the adverse criticisms about your person, about your business, about your home, about your church, and they make your ear the funnel into which they pour it. They laugh heartily when they tell you, as though it were a good joke, and you laugh too —outside.

These people are brought to our attention in the Bible, in the Book of Ruth. Naomi went forth beautiful and with the finest of worldly prospects, and into another land ; but after a while she came back widowed, and sick, and poor. What did her friends do when she came to the city ? They all went out, and, instead of giving her common-sense consolation, what did they do ? Read the Book of Ruth and find out. They threw up their hands and said, "Is this Naomi?" as much as to say, "How awful bad you do look !" When I entered the ministry I looked very pale for years, and every year, for four or five years, a hundred times a year I was asked if I had not the consumption ; and passing through the room I would sometimes hear people sigh and say, "A-ah ! not long for this world !" I resolved in those times that I never, in any conversation, would say anything depressing, and by the help of God I have kept the resolution. These people of whom I speak reap and bind in the great harvest-field of discouragement. Some day you greet them with a hilarious "good-morning," and they come buzzing at you with some depressing information. "The Lord sent the hornet."

It is astonishing how some people prefer to write and to say disagreeable things. That was the case when, four or five years ago, Henry M. Stanley returned after his magnificent exploit of

FINDING DAVID LIVINGSTONE.

When Mr. Stanley stood before the savants of Europe, and many of the small critics of the day, under pretence of getting geographical information, put to him most insolent questions, he folded his arms and refused to answer. At the very time when you would suppose all decent men would have applauded the heroism of the man, there were those to hiss. "The Lord sent the hornet." And now at this time, when that man sits down on the western coast of Africa, sick and worn out, with perhaps the grandest achievement of the age in the way of geographical discovery, there are small critics all over the world to buzz and buzz, and caricature and deride him, and after a while he will get the London papers, and as he opens them out will fly the hornet. When I see that there are so many people in the world who like to say disagreeable things, and write disagreeable things, I come almost in my weaker moments to believe what a man said to me in Philadelphia one Monday morning. I went to get the horse at the livery stable, and the ostler, a plain man, said to me, "Mr. Talmage, I saw that you preached to the young men yesterday." I said, "Yes." He said, "No use, no use ; man's a failure."

The small insect annoyances of life sometimes come in the shape of local

which does not amount to a positive prostration, but which bothers you when you want to feel the best. Perhaps it is a sick-headache which has been the plague of your life, and you appoint some occasion of mirth, or sociality, or usefulness, and when the clock strikes the hour you cannot make your appearance. Perhaps the trouble is between the ear and the forehead, in the shape of a neuralgic twinge. Nobody can see it or sympathize with it ; but just at the time when you want your intellect clearest, and your disposition brightest, you feel a sharp, keen, disconcerting thrust. "The Lord sent the hornet."

Perhaps these small insect annoyances will come in the shape of a

DOMESTIC IRRITATION.

The parlor and the kitchen do not always harmonize. To get good service, and to keep it, is one of the great questions of the country. Sometimes it may be the arrogancy and inconsiderateness of employers, but whatever be the fact, we all admit there are these insect annoyances winging their way out from the culinary department. If the grace of God be not in the heart of the housekeeper, she cannot maintain her equilibrium. The men come home at night and hear the story of these annoyances, and say, "Oh, these home troubles are very little things !" They are small, small as wasps, but they sting. Martha's nerves were all unstrung when she rushed in, asking Christ to scold Mary, and there are tens of thousands of women who are dying, stung to death by these pestiferous domestic annoyances. "The Lord sent the hornet."

These small insect disturbances may also come in the shape of

BUSINESS IRRITATIONS.

There are men here who went through 1857, and the 24th of September, 1869, without losing their balance, who are every day unhorsed by little annoyances—a clerk's ill-manners, or a blot of ink on a bill of lading, or the extravagance of a partner who overdraws his account, or the underselling by a business rival, or the whispering of store-confidences in the street, or the making of some little bad debt which was against your judgment, just to please somebody else.

It is not the panics that kill the merchants. Panics come only once in ten or twenty years. It is the constant din of these every-day annoyances which is sending so many of our best merchants into nervous dyspepsia and paralysis and the grave. When our national commerce fell flat on its face, these men stood up and fell almost defiant ; but their life is going away now under the swarm of these pestiferous annoyances. "The Lord sent the hornet."

I have noticed in the history of some of my congregation that their

and that they have a hundred where they used to have ten. The naturalist tells us that a wasp sometimes has a family of twenty thousand, and it does seem as if every annoyance of your life brooded a million. By the help of God to-day, I want to set in a counter-current. The hornet is of no use ? Oh, yes ! The naturalists tell us they are very important in the world's economy ; they kill spiders, and they clear the atmosphere ; and I really believe God sends the annoyances of our life upon us to kill the spiders of the soul, and to clear the moral atmosphere into the skies.

USES OF THE HORNET.

These annoyances are sent on us, I think, to wake us up from our lethargy. There is nothing that makes a man so lively as a nest of "yellow jackets," and I think that these annoyances are intended to persuade us of the fact that this is not a world for us to stop in. If we had a be of everything that was attractive and soft an easy, what would we want of heaven ? W think that the hollow tree sends the hornet, o

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday ; we therefore publish a sermon by him which has never before appeared in this journal.

we may think that the devil sends the hornet. I want to correct your theology. "The Lord sent the hornet."

Then I think these annoyances come on us to CULTURE OUR PATIENCE.

In the gymnasium, you find upright parallel bars—upright bars, with holes over each other for pegs to be put in. Then the gymnast takes a peg in each hand and he begins to climb, one inch at a time, or two inches, and getting his strength cultured, reaches after a while the ceiling. And it seems to me that these annoyances in life are a moral gymnasium, each worriment a peg with which we are to climb higher and higher in Christian attainment. We all love to see patience, but it cannot be cultured in fair weather. Patience is a child of the storm. If you had everything desirable, and there was nothing more to get, what would you want with patience? The only time to culture it, is when you are lied about and cheated, and sick and half dead.

"Oh," you say, "if I only had the circumstances of some well-to-do man I would be patient too." You might as well say, "If it were not for this water I would swim;" or, "I could shoot this gun if it were not for the caps." When you stand chin-deep in annoyances is the time for you to swim out toward the great headlands of Christian attainment, so as to "know Christ and the power of His resurrection, and to have fellowship with His sufferings. Oh, let patience have its perfect work.

Nothing but the furnace will ever burn out of us the clinker and the slag. I have formed this theory in regard to small annoyances and vexations. It takes just so much trouble to fit us for usefulnesss and for heaven. The only question is, whether we shall take it in the bulk or pulverized and granulated. Here is one man who takes it in the bulk. His back is broken, or his eyesight put out, or some other awful calamity befalls him; while the vast majority of people take this thing piecemeal. Which way would you rather have it? Of course in piecemeal. Better have five aching teeth than one broken jaw; better ten fly-blisters than an amputation; better twenty squalls than one cyclone. There may be a difference of opinion as to allopathy and homœpathy; but in this matter of trouble I like —small pellets of annoyance rather than some knock-down dose of calamity. Instead of the thunderbolt, give us the hornet. If you have a bank, you would a great deal rather that fifty men would come in with cheques less than a hundred dollars than to have two depositors come in the same day, each wanting his ten thousand dollars. In this last case you cough and look down to the floor, and you look up at the ceiling, before you look into the safe. Now, my friends, would you not rather have these small drafts of annoyance on your bank of faith than some all-staggering demand upon your endurance? But remember that little as well as great annoyances equally require you to trust in Christ for succor, and for deliverance from impatience and irritability. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

HOMŒOPATHIC DOSES

IN THE VILLAGE OF HAMELIN, tradition says, there was an invasion of rats, and these small creatures almost devoured the town, and threatened the lives of the population; and the story is that a piper came out one day and played a very sweet tune, and all the vermin followed him—followed him to the banks of the Weser, and then he blew a blast and they dropped in and disappeared forever. Of course this is a fable; but I wish I could, on the sweet flute of the Gospel, draw forth all the nibbling and burrowing annoyances of your life, and play them down into the depths forever.

How many touches did Mr. Church give to his picture of "Cotopaxi," or his "Heart of the Andes?" I suppose about fifty thousand touches. I hear the canvas saying, "Why do you keep me trembling with that pencil so long? Why don't you put it on in one dash?" "No," says Mr. Church, "I know how to make a painting; it will take fifty thousand of these touches." And I want you, my friends, to understand that it is these ten thousand annoyances which, under God, are making up to be hung at last in the galleries of heaven, fit for angels to look at. God knows how to make a picture.

If you had your own way, you would probably desire all possible worldly prosperity. You would have a garden and a river running through it, geranium and cactus on the sides, and the grass and flowers as beautiful as though the rainbows had fallen. Then you would build yourself a house—a splendid mansion with costly upholstery, and every hall in it set with statues and statuettes; and you would have the four quarters of the globe pour in all their luxuries on your table, and forks of silver and knives of gold, and expensively appointed equipages, with high-stepping horses; and you would desire to live, if possible, a hundred years, and not have a pain or ache until the last breath.

LIFE A VESTIBULE.

You say, "Why does not God give us all these things?" Ah! the reason is because He is wiser. It would make fools and sluggards of us if we had our way. No man puts his best picture in the portico or vestibule of his house. God meant this world to be only the vestibule of heaven, and heaven itself is the great gallery of the universe, toward which we are aspiring. We must not have things too good in this world, or we should be content to remain always in the vestibule without penetrating into the gallery of heaven. You are surprised that aged people are so willing to go out of this world. I will tell you the reason. It is not only because of the bright prospects in heaven, but it is because they feel that seventy years of nettlesomeness is enough. They would lie down in the soft meadows of this world forever, but "God sends the hornet."

My friends, I shall not have preached this morning in vain if I have shown you that the annoyances of life, the small annoyances of life, may be subservient to your present and your

ETERNAL ADVANTAGE.

Polycarp was condemned to be burned at the stake. The stake was planted; he was fastened to it; the wood was planted around about the stake; it was kindled; but, by some strange current of the atmosphere, history tells us the flames bent outward like the sails of a ship under a strong breeze, and then, far above, they came together, making a canopy; so that, instead of being destroyed by the flames, there he stood in a flamboyant bower planted by his persecutors. They had to take his life in another way, and by the point of the poniard.

And I have to tell you this morning that God can make all the flames of your trial a wall of defence and a canopy for the soul. God is just as willing to fulfil to you as He was to Polycarp the promise, "When thou passest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned." In heaven you will acknowledge the fact that you never had one annoyance too many, and through all eternity you will be grateful that in this world the Lord did send the hornet. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." "All things work together for good to those who love God." The Lord sent the sunshine. "The Lord sent the hornet."

INCIDENTS OF CHRISTIAN WORK AMONG THE CHINESE.

In Search of a New God.—"Mr. McCarthy, a missionary in China, relates the following: "A woman heard that the foreigners had a new idol which she had not seen, and she, being a religious person, travelled a long distance to see and to worship it. Her disappointment was great when she found there was no image, no sign of authority, or other outward emblem. We explained to her that God was a Spirit, and that it was wrong to worship images. It was long ere she could be made to understand; but at length it became clear to her mind that Jesus was her Saviour, and she let Him into her heart."

A Leper's Remarkable Confession.—The Rev. Mr Baillie says: "There is solid work being done among the lepers in China. I remember seeing a group of lepers holding a prayer-meeting under a clump of trees. It moved me to see these poor diseased men worshipping Jesus in the open air. I was particularly interested in one man who lived in the Lepers' Hospital, and asked the attendant, 'How is ——?' He answered, 'Oh, very bad; he has gone home, and can't leave the house.' I went to the poor hut which he called home, and the poor fellow crawled out to see me; he was in a pitiable state, his flesh and bones gradually wasting away. I said, 'How are you?' He replied, 'Very well!' 'How is it that I find you in such a dreadful state?' His answer was, 'Ever since I knew Christ, nineteen years ago, I have never known pain of body or mind.'"

An Indignant Chinese Congregation.—"A missionary was preaching in the city of Ning Po, in China, just as you do here; he was in the open air, and then invited the people into the hall. Mr. Gough read out the first chapter of Romans, then he told them the same story you hear every night. When the sermon was preached, he went down to speak to the people, and found that they were very angry with him. Some of the people said: 'You do very wrong; you come professing to preach a heavenly doctrine, and you go round our city picking up all the bad things done in it, then put it into a book. You get us in here, and when we can't very well get out, you read it all out to us; you do very wrong.' The chapter he read was an exact description of Ning Po. Mr. Gough had much trouble in getting them to believe that it was a book written hundreds of years ago."

A Soul Worth More than Twelve Houses.—"The vain repetition of which our Lord spoke is well shown in heathen lands. I had a boy thirteen years old in our school who, when he first came, would for hours at a time strike a wooden gong, repeating over and over again one word. He had an excellent memory, and in a year or so learned the Bible well, and in three or four years he understood the plan of salvation. The boy soon knew that the Jesus he read about in the New Testament was his Saviour, and humbly asked the Lord to save him. Before his conversion he used to steal and lie; after this eventful change his life was most consistent. He desired to be publicly baptized and to make an open profession of Christ. This meant a great deal to him, for he was entitled to get some ten or twelve houses as his share of his father's estate, on condition that he worshipped idols; if he did not do so he lost all the property. I did not press him in any way, but pointed out what the Scriptures said on the subject. After much prayerful consideration he said to me: 'Mr. McCarthy, I think it won't be of much value to me to get those twelve houses and lose my own soul.' I replied, 'You think right; I have been praying for you; there is nothing so precious as your own soul to you.' He wrote to his friends: 'As I cannot get these houses without being an idolator, I give them up, as I worship only the true God.' Did God let him starve? No; the lad got a situation, and for years preached the Gospel, and died praising God."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Enlightened Infidel said at a Recent meeting: "Two years ago I was an infidel, a drunkard, and a terrible smoker. I went to Mr. Moody's meetings, and there the Lord caught me, and graciously led me to see myself a lost sinner, and thanks be to His name, He also showed me that He was my Saviour. I trusted in Him. All my infidel notions were swept away; the desire for drink left me, and I was so filled with joy that I never thought of it. My pipe I gave up because I did not see how I was to be a temple of the Holy Ghost, pure in the sight of God while using it, especially as it had previously exercised such power over me."

Strange Freaks of the Devil.—Mr. Graham related: "In the revival of 1861 in Ireland, a Roman Catholic priest wrote, saying that the spiritual excitement then raging was the work of the devil. A little Irish boy, who was beginning to love Christ, replied to the effect that if the priest's statement was true, then the devil must be converted, for from what he had noticed the devil generally made men drunkards, liars, thieves, and fornicators, but that these converts were living good, holy lives. These were singular freaks for the devil to do. So the little boy silenced the priest, thus fulfilling the Psalmist's words, 'Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength because of Thine enemies, that Thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger'" (Ps. 8 : 2).

A Christian Ploughman Testified: "I was wandering in a dark country. Up till a few months ago I thought that, 'If I am to be saved, I will be saved; I have nothing to do with it.' Now the Saviour has brought me into a bright land, where I see things in a new and glorious light. I always lived a decent, moral life, only getting drunk now and then; and on the whole, I felt that I was much better than most men. I learned that this idea was a wile of the devil by seeing some living, earnest Christians. Their lives were so different from mine, and they were so happy when singing hymns and psalms, and talking to one another about the love of Jesus and their work for Him, that I could not shut my eyes to the difference. Now Jesus has saved me—gloriously saved me, and He is with me during the morning, noon, and night. His presence is my chief, my only joy."

The Might of a Mother's Prayers.—Mr. Oatts related: "I was in Chicago about fifteen months ago, where I met a young man from Glasgow, who had sunk as low as one could sink into the slough of sin. Often though almost starving himself through his own excesses, he sent home something to his praying mother who lived in the Gallowgate, so that she might not know that her son had gone off the lines on which she thought he was travelling. The Christian mother did not know that her boy had really gone astray, yet she always prayed for him, and her prayers followed him wherever he went. God has lifted that young man from the slough of sin into which he had fallen, and made him a new man in Christ Jesus. The mother's prayers are answered, furnishing a new and striking proof that 'praying breath was never spent in vain.'"

A Son's Head in a Lion's Mouth.—"A Lady called upon an eminent minister in Glasgow, and requested his special prayers on behalf of her son. The minister inquired, 'Why should I pray for him specially?' The reply came: 'He has got such a splendid opening abroad for getting on in the world, but he will have no opportunity of meeting with Christians or of enjoying Gospel ordinances.' Looking solemnly at the lady, the minister replied, 'You put your son into a situation where he will have no chance of mingling in Christian society, or of hearing the Gospel, and ask me to pray for him! You have no right to do so. As well put his head into a hungry lion's mouth, and ask it not to bite him. A mistake often made by parents is to put their sons into positions where they are almost certain to go astray, and then they wonder how their sons have fallen. Do not, for the sake of a few pounds extra in the year, put your children into such places.'" "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

A Saved Drunkard's Testimony Blessed.—A reformed inebriate testifies thus: "I am glad that I am able to stand here to bear witness to the saving power of God. Before my conversion I was not a man who ever cared for divine things. Drinking, swearing, and Sabbath-breaking were my delight. Between four and five years ago, I went into a small place of worship, where I heard the testimony of a man whom I knew to have been a thorough drunkard. At the time I was very miserable in mind and body so much so, that I felt that my life was lost to all that was pure and holy, and that I only lived to come to a bad end. I listened to this man telling how God had given him power over the craving for strong drink. I thought, 'If he can be saved, so can I,' and that very hour I found salvation through faith in Christ, cleansing in His precious blood, and have been preserved from the drink and sin ever since."

All Night in a Mountain Mist.—"One Afternoon a party of tourists were travelling up a mountain. A dense mist came on, and caused them to lose their way. All night long they wandered farther and farther, not knowing where they were. Just before dawn they came to a halt, worn-out with fatigue and cold. One of the party, a lady, overborne by the exposure, lay down on the ground and died. When the rising sun dispelled the darkness of night, and caused the mist to lift, they saw that they were within a hundred yards of the hotel, and that they had roamed near it all night. Their feelings were somewhat similar to the sensations experienced by some anxious souls, when they enter into light, by simply trusting in God. They feel 'We were so near, yet so far off.' Yes, your nearest friend is not so close to you as Jesus is. He stands at the door of your hearts. Let Him in. In Him alone is light, and comfort, and eternal salvation."

Presenting an Unsigned Check.—Mr. Reid said: "Some time ago a friend handed me a check on the National Bank. At a first glance it seemed all right: 'Pay to William Reid such-and-such a sum.' I presented it at the bank, duly indorsed by my own hand, with my own name, but the pay-clerk said, 'I can't cash this.' 'Why not? are there no funds?' 'Yes, plenty. 'Then why not pay it.' 'Mr. ——gave you this?' 'Yes.' 'He has not signed it.' 'Oh, I did not notice that; I will soon get that put right.' I got the check signed, presented it again, and got my money without a word. We might have heard of and read the Gospel and the whole Bible, but unless Christ had risen from the dead, we should not have the signature of God to His work of salvation. The resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ is the signature of God to His own promises. He was 'declared to be the Son of God with power, when God raised Him from the dead.' He says: 'Because I live, ye shall live also.'"

The Dying Comforting the Living.—The Rev. Mr. Goodall related: "Not very long ago a young woman spoke to me about the eternal interests of her soul. It was a very long and weary struggle for her to escape from the devil's meshes, but I shall not forget the expression of her face when she did enter into the perfect peace of Christ through trusting herself to His atoning sacrifice and redeeming blood. One Sabbath, she sat down at the Lord's Table for the first time, and told me afterward that she enjoyed it so much. On the next Tuesday night a man came to my door and asked me to come with him to attend the deathbed of the young woman. As the old father stood at the bedside with tears flowing in streams from his eyes, his dying daughter comforted him with the words, 'Oh, father, is it not well for me that I have not to make my peace with God now? Is it not well that I am dying in the rest of His Son?' It is a grand thing to see a Christian die! Oh, that we could all say, 'To me to live is Christ,' then to die will be everlasting gain."

NOTES OF MR. MOODY'S MEETINGS IN LONDON.

AT some of the meetings at Battersea, testimonies from converts were invited, and from among those that were given we select the following:

"In 1863 the Lord had to break my leg in order to break my heart, and I thank Him for doing both."

"For thirty-eight years I have been a wanderer, but my wife was taken off her crutches at Bethshan, and the Lord used that fact to restore my soul a short time ago."

"In 1876 I found Christ. I had gone to a music hall, and I am sorry to say I came home very drunk. When I awoke the next morning from the effects of the drink, I was so convicted of my sin that I had to seek Christ, and I gave myself no rest till I had found Him as my Saviour, and He has kept me from the drink ever since."

"I had for years clung to the old-fashioned idea that conversion was a very gradual process, but I thank God that, through Mr. Moody's preaching, I have been able to understand clearly that it is only one step to Christ for salvation."

"I got into the large hall one evening last week, but, unfortunately—or rather, I suppose, I should say fortunately—I got into such a bad position that I could not hear a word of Mr. Moody's sermon. God thus gave me time to see myself and to think, and I saw how awful a sinner I was. I was led to seek and find Christ that very evening."

A man, forty-four years of age, who had been with the same employers thirty-five years, laid hold of the Lord Jesus as his Saviour very definitely. He is a carman, and says he finds the Lord Jesus with him in his daily work, blessing him in it. He has been spending his Sunday afternoons in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, with an intemperate man who has no other friend, but has now recovered from his accident and is going on better. The man has bought a beautiful accordeon, on which to play the well-loved hymns, while the wife, with the little baby in her arms, sings with him. He hopes to be able to get off a little earlier on Tuesday evenings, to attend a class for instruction in music, so as to be able to play from note by and by. He is happy and contented, and the peace of God has blessed the house.

A man and his wife gave themselves to the Lord at the Priory meetings. Alone in London—his wife delicate in health—the husband, an engineer by trade, but unable to do his proper work through a paralyzed arm, has to rise daily at four to do work of an inferior kind. Both are thoroughly happy in the Lord, and so full of rejoicing as to be lifted above these circumstances. Another man, crippled by rheumatism in his feet, who has to rise at three every morning, as watchman of some buildings, testified to the rest and joy the meetings had brought him; for though a communicant for years, he had never seen the way of life so clearly before.

A man, by trade a carpenter, and his wife, were both brought to Christ at the Priory. He was a sad drunkard, she, a broken-hearted, desolate woman. Her testimony now is, "I little knew what God was; we have had nothing but mercies since."

A parlormaid in service in one of the south-western suburbs was invited by an elderly Christian woman in Highbury to come and hear Mr. Moody. She could only attend one meeting, and her friend took her, silently pleading with God for her. Prayer was answered, and the maid returned to her place of service rejoicing in the Lord.

A servant girl told a lady calling on her that at one of the meetings a gentleman had asked her to promise to give her heart to God, but thought he fancied she had been very bad, whereas she had always been respectable. He told her of the broken law, and of God's tender love; this quite broke her down, and she knelt to thank God for giving Jesus for her, and went home rejoicing and grateful.

THE SOUDAN AND HOLY SCRIPTURE.

By Rev T. J. Malyon, LL.B.

The Magnitude of the Soudan—Its Physical Characteristics—Its Peoples and Government—Once Highly Civilized—The Ethiopia of Scripture—A Jewish Tradition Preserved by Josephus—Moses' Marriage with a Woman of Cush—Its Ancient Wealth and Power—Home of the Queen of Sheba—Its Military Power in Ancient Times—Asa's Fear and Prayer—Other Scripture References to it—Its Predicted Conversion.

THE Soudan is a large tract of country stretching away from the south of Egypt into Central Africa, which, as yet, has not been accurately surveyed and mapped. It is without roads or canals, and its capital is inaccessible by sea, save by crossing a belt of sandy desert of some 280 miles. It has no navigable river except the Nile for a portion of the year. It stretches 1600 miles in one direction, and 1300 miles in another. It is the abode of wandering tribes, friendly, or fighting each other, as the case may be—a region where government is simply chaos.

Yet it has been, especially in the northern parts, the scene of high civilization in the past. For this was the Cush or

ETHIOPIA OF SCRIPTURE.

In Genesis 10 : 6, the origin of the nations springing from Ham, the son of Noah, is given. Whatever was to be the working of the curse, for one or two thousand years the descendants of Ham appear to have prospered. Mizraim founded Egypt; Phut probably colonized Lybia or the regions about Tripoli to the west of Egypt; Canaan, Palestine to the north or east; and Cush to the south, the Soudan. Cush means black. It is generally translated Ethiopia in Scripture. One of the earliest references is incidental. It is that the wife of Moses was an Ethiopian woman, which gave offence to Miriam and Aaron, and appears to have been at the root of much of the trouble of the Exodus. So that it is no new thing for perplexity to arise from the Soudan.

The Ethiopia of the Bible, as it was known to Josephus, covered precisely the area which the British Government has lately counselled the Khedive to abandon, for we learn that the northern boundary of Moroë was masked by Syene—the modern Assouan—and the southern by the juncture of the White and Blue Niles, where now stands Khartoum.

A JEWISH TRADITION, preserved by Josephus, associates the Soudan with a very early period in Hebrew history. When Moses had arrived at man's estate, Egypt was invaded by an Ethiopian army, which successfully laid waste the country as far as Memphis. In their despair the Egyptians prayed to their oracles for aid, and the advice they received was that they should offer the leadership of their armies to "Moses the Hebrew." This they did. The great difficulty of the campaign was to traverse the roads which led to the Ethiopian camp, in consequence of their being infested with dangerous serpents.

The wily Israelite provided his advance guard with a number of ibes in baskets, and instructed the soldiers to let the birds loose on the serpents. By this ingenious expedient the roads were speedily cleared, and Moses was enabled to suprise the Ethiopians, and defeat them with great slaughter. Carrying the war into Meroë itself, Moses then laid siege to the capital, Saba. The obstinate resistance offered by the defenders prolonged the siege for some time, but eventually the city was delivered up by Tharbis, the daughter of the Ethiopian king, who had watched Moses from a distance, and, from admiring his valor, had fallen in love with him. The story ends with the marriage of Moses and Tharbis. Whether this legend really obtained among the ancient Israelites, or whether Josephus invented it to account for Moses' marriage with a Cushite woman, recorded later on in the Bible, is difficult to say.

THE EMPIRE ROSE

to great wealth and power. It became renowned for its merchandise. Ezekiel (27 : 22) speaks of its merchants as "occupied in the fairs with chief of all spices and with all precious stones and gold;" Job (28 : 19) refers to its jewels; the Psalmist (72 : 15) to its gold; Jeremiah (6 : 20) to its incense. So, also, Isaiah says, "All they from Sheba shall come, they shall bring gold and incense, and they shall show forth the praise of the Lord." And the same prophet, in another place (43 : 3), when seeking a strong expression of the cost of redemption, speaks of it as a gift of Ethiopia and Sheba. And, again (45 : 14), there is mention of "the merchandise of Ethiopia and the Sabeans, men of stature." It was thence that came that she might prove Solomon with hard questions, "with a very great train, with camels that bare spices, and very much gold and precious stones" (1 Kings 10 : 2.)

Its military power in ancient times appears to have been very great. Nahum (3 : 9) speaks of it as infinite. In the fourteenth chapter of the Second Book of Chronicles we read of the invasion of Palestine by Zerab, the Ethiopian, with a million soldiers and three hundred chariots. Asa, the king, was terribly alarmed, and uttered the famous prayer, "Lord, it is nothing with Thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power; help us, O Lord our God, for we rest on Thee, and in Thy name we go against this multitude. O Lord, Thou art our God; let not man prevail against Thee." A renowned victory with a complete rout of Zerab followed.

On one occasion the Prophet Isaiah "walked naked and barefoot three years for a sign and wonder upon Egypt and upon Ethiopia," indicating the greatness of their fall and the shame of their captivity. In the 11th chapter of the Book of Daniel we have the narrative of another great defeat under Antiochus. And Ezekiel, in the 30th chapter, foretells the downfall of Ethiopia with Egypt: "Thus saith the Lord: They also that uphold Egypt shall fall, and the pride of her power shall come down;" a passage that might be pondered, perhaps with advantage by statesmen to-day. "In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Ethiopians afraid, and great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt; for lo, it cometh." It is probable that at that time the empire included Abyssinia and extended to the coast of the Red Sea.

Then Habakkuk, in his wondrous prayer-vision (3 : 7), "Saw the tents of CUSHAN IN AFFLICTION."

Isaiah prophesied (11 : 11) that the Lord would set His hand a second time to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left, from Cush among other places. And Zephaniah says (3 : 10), "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering." There is no mention of this territory being represented at the Day of Pentecost. But to it is found in the simple and instructive narrative of the conversion of the eunuch, the treasurer of Candace, the Queen of the Ethiopians.

In the 68th Psalm David sings, "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God." The translation by Ewald of the passage is noteworthy. Its instruction is the direct contrary to the opinion just now rather noisily proclaimed by a certain party in England. He reads: "Scatter the people that do love war, that nobles may come out of Egypt, Cush in haste lift his hand to God." In effect, this would mean: Let us get rid of those counsellors who desire military operations, then we may expect some nobility of character to develop in Egypt, and prayer to arise from the inhabitants of the Soudan.

LAWLESSNESS AND THE COMING LAWLESS ONE.

By the Rev. Dean Vaughan.

(Extract from Sermon in the Temple Church, London.)

"The day of Christ shall not come, except there come the falling away (the apostasy) first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition. . . . For the mystery of iniquity (lawlessness), doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked (lawless one) be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming."—II THESSALONIANS 2 : 3, 7, 8.

ST. PAUL speaks of a certain particular growth and spirit of evil, which must have full scope and play before the Advent. Nor does he leave us in any uncertainty as to the direction in which we must look for the rise of that state of things which will bring down upon itself God's latest, sorest, and direst judgment. He selects for it a particular name, not one of the common names for sin in Scripture, but a name which he only uses twice or thrice in all his writings, and which has always a very definite and precise meaning. Our English version has somewhat lost sight of the peculiarity. It renders this word in one verse as "iniquity," and in the next verse "the wicked one;" but in the original the word is substantially the same in both verses—in the one "the mystery of lawlessness doth already work;" and, in the other, "then shall the lawless one be revealed."

This "lawlessness" of the seventh verse passes into the "lawless one" of the eighth—"then shall the lawless one be revealed"—unveiled or disclosed in all his features of horror and blasphemy—"whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming." St. Paul seems to prepare us for a sort of incarnation of lawlessness; principle, power, or person, sitting, as it were, in the very temple of God, "showing Himself that He is God," and yet, in reality, deriving from the devil all the "powers and signs of lying wonders" by which he deludes the unhappy victims who are not fortified and preoccupied by the devout love of the truth.

The important thought for us all is this, that lawlessness is the predicted characteristic of the last age, as the time of the end draws on, to be stimulated and exasperated into a terrible virulence. I ask this congregation, Is it not now—is it not abroad on the Continent of Europe, is it not abroad in one integral portion of what we still fondly term "the United Kingdom?" Is it not abroad among ourselves in the family and the Church; in the workshop and in the study; in the literature of a "science falsely so-called;" and in the lurking-places of political fanatics, who count not their lives dear if they can but embitter an existence or topple down a throne?

A mystery of lawlessness is working everywhere with ingenious industry among the time-honored institutions of society itself. Frightful outbreaks of lawlessness have startled us again and again, until they have almost ceased to startle. We expect them; we look for them. Soon the paper will be flat and dull which records not one of them—assassinations and attempted assassinations of rulers crowned and uncrowned, despotic, constitutional, or democratic—it matters not. These are but samples and specimens of a system which spares neither high nor low, which strikes not at oppression, but strikes at order, the determined foe of superiority, by one hair's breadth, of man over man. The owner of the decent home, the wearer of the decent coat, is an offence, an affront, to the evil eye that watches it.

Yes, the reign of lawlessness is begun, though a few years may yet intervene before the actual unveiling of the lawless one, who is to be destroyed by the personal advent of Christ.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President has Directed the Attorney-General to issue a circular to the United States district attorneys and marshals on the subject of dynamite exportation. The circular, which was sent out last week, states that " it is reported that certain persons are aiding in the prosecution of heinous crimes by shipping to foreign ports explosives dangerous in the highest degree to life and property. No proof has been adduced that this rumor is founded upon fact, and the President cannot believe its truth. The honor of this nation, however, requires that it should not be open to the imputation, unfounded though it be, of the slightest appearance of tolerating such crimes, whether to be committed against our people or those of other countries." The attention of the officials addressed is therefore called to the sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which regulate the shipment of explosives, and the punishment of those who infringe their provisions, and the officials are instructed to be diligent in endeavoring to prevent the offences described, and to detect and prosecute those who commit them. The statutes referred to impose a fine of from one to ten thousand dollars for shipping dynamite, and if any one is killed by an explosion during shipment, the person shipping the explosive is to be indicted for manslaughter. The boastings of O'Donovan Rossa and his colleagues, and the evidence found in England showing that the outrages were planned here, rendered this action of the President necessary for the preservation of our national honor.

Secretary Frelinghuysen has Displayed Con-siderable diplomatic tact in dealing with the resolution of condolence recently passed by the House in reference to Dr. Lasker's death. The House requested that two copies of the resolution be prepared, one of which was to be sent to Dr. Lasker's family and the other, through the proper channel, to the legislative body of which Dr. Lasker was a member. The latter was sent to Prince Bismarck, who did not agree with its eulogium of the deceased statesman, he having been a persistent opponent of the Chancellor's policy. Bismarck refused to present it to the Reichstag, and sent it to the German minister at Washington to be returned to the government. Secretary Frelinghuysen declined to receive it, and said to the German minister: " My duties of courtesy to the House of Representatives ended with forwarding the resolution through the proper channel to the hands of the officer charged with the administration of the foreign affairs of Germany. This government is not disposed to inquire into the relations existing between different branches of another government. The sentiments of the resolution are now generally known; their merits or demerits can be judged; and its non-transmission officially, as it was intended and claimed on its face to be of friendly interest, while a matter of regret, is not one of concern to either branch of the Government of the United States." There the matter may fitly end. The House by passing another resolution reiterating the sentiments of the first, as it is proposed to do, will only emphasize its original blunder.

The Apprehensions Excited by the Decision of the United States Supreme Court affirming the legal-tender value of the greenbacks, have found expression in three proposals to amend the Constitution by limiting the powers of Congress in that direction. The most important of the three is that introduced in the Senate by Mr. Bayard, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to report, as soon as practicable, as to the expediency of amending the Constitution so as to preserve the federal principle and nature of the government, by maintaining due limitations upon its powers, and to that end provide that Congress shall not have power to make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender for the payment of debts, nor pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Mr. Potter, of New York, proposed in the House a similar amendment with the difference that he would permit Congress to exercise the power of issuing legal-tender greenbacks " after a declaration of war, when public safety may require it."

A Minority Report from the Ways and Means Committee accompanied the majority report which favorably reported the Morrison Tariff Bill. The minority say that there is no demand from any industry in the country for a reduction of the customs duties; but that, on the contrary, every interest heard by the Ways and Means Committee, except the representatives of the Free-Trade clubs, opposed it. They also declare that the mere discussion of the bill has hurt business; to pass it would increase the trouble and reduce workingmen's wages. They state, too, that the bill is not a carefully matured measure—the result of a studious consideration of the people's interests. It must be remembered that the classes it is designed to benefit cannot go to Washington to be " heard " by the committee. There are indications, however, that they will be " heard " from in November.

The Greely Relief Expedition will, it is An-nounced, be ready to start by the time agreed upon. The necessary arrangements are advancing satisfactorily, and it is expected that the Bear and Thetis will be ready to sail for the Arctic seas by May 1st, and that the supply-ship Alert, presented to this country by the British Government, will be ready to sail a few weeks later. About seventy-five men have already been accepted to man the vessels. Some valuable information and suggestions have been placed at the disposal of the expedition by officers of the British navy.

The New Project for Promoting Education, known as the Morrill Education Bill, was favorably reported last week in the Senate. It provides for the setting apart forever of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands, and annually of a sum of money equal to one half of the moneys paid into the Treasury in each year by Pacific Railroad Companies, for the education of the people, to be apportioned to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, upon the basis of population between the ages of five and twenty years, as an educational fund, and to bear interest at the rate of four per cent, the interest only to be paid for educational purposes. Two thirds of the income arising from this fund to be annually appropriated to the free and impartial education in public schools of all children between the ages of six and sixteen years; one third to be appropriated to the endowment and support of agricultural colleges until the annual income of such colleges shall have reached the sum of $30,000, when only that sum shall be appropriated to them.

The Progress Mormonism is Making in the Western States is alarming, and should lead to prompt measures to restrain it. A Mormon missionary in Wisconsin recently said: " We have six or eight elders in Minnesota, and expect more in the spring. I am the only one in Wisconsin, and shall soon return to Minnesota. From Indiana, Iowa, and Minnesota I know of twelve who have gone, or will go, to the territory. We have a good many Mormons in Minnesota who will stay there. They believe in polygamy, but do not practise it. We would rather they would come West, but not to Utah. Colorado and Arizona are better for newcomers, because the land is cheaper. You know, I suppose, that we have our people in Wyoming, Idaho, and Montana." It must be remembered that these settlers have votes and are controlled by the Mormon hierarchy, which thereby is extending its political power and influence.

A Fearful Mining Disaster Occurred on March 13th at Pocahontas, Tazewell County, Va. Soon after midnight a loud explosion was heard, and the whole neighborhood was shaken. When the crowds of people who were awakened rushed from their houses to ascertain what had happened, a scene of havoc and desolation met their view. A column of smoke ascended from the shaft of the principal mine, and scattered around within a radius of a quarter of a mile were broken timbers and broken mining machinery of every description. Upon every side lay fragments of human bodies, some of which were lodged upon the top of sheds and in the branches of adjoining trees. The shrieks of the women and children filled the air, and added more horror to the scene. One hundred and fifty men were said to be in the pit, and an effort was made to descend and endeavor to rescue any who might be living. It was, however, found to be impossible, and in a short time flames began to issue from the shaft, destroying the last vestige of hope. The mine was sealed up to smother the fire, and it is not intended to open it again for two weeks. The families of the dead miners are in the utmost distress. It is expected that the Virginia Legislature will vote an appropriation for the relief of their immediate necessities.

Prohibition in Georgia is Managed with Less difficulty than in other States. The Rev. J. W. Lee, in the course of a letter from Rome, Ga., thus describes its operation and its influence: " In Georgia there are ninety counties out of one hundred and thirty-six with partial or entire prohibition, but the question has never got into politics. No party can claim the credit of the work. We have accomplished it as citizens. Nor do we expect to cease our efforts till the sale of whiskey is prohibited in every county in the State. The success of the movement has been so great here, so helpful to trade, to morals, to education, that it is hardly necessary to make an argument in favor of it in places where liquor is sold. We have only to point to those counties where it has been in operation a few years, their factories, their better schools, their improved farms, their increased trade, to settle it. There are counties in the State that, ten years ago, were noted for their ignorance and thriftlessness, which have absolutely been revolutionized in tone, in business, in appearance, by the influence of prohibition. Whenever prohibition is established in a town first-class men are elected to the positions of Mayor and Aldermen. Loafers and 'dead beats' either move away or go to work."

The National Reform Association has Summoned a convention at Association Hall, Philadelphia, to begin on Monday, March 24th, and to continue the next day, for the purpose of discussing the principles and aims of the National Reform movement. The call says the movement "seeks to strengthen Christian elements in our national life, as Christian Sabbath and marriage laws and the Bible in the public schools. It opposes the carrying of the mails on the Lord's day, which has been the fruitful parent of nearly all our public Sabbath desecration: polygamy and the easy divorces now so common, and the license of the liquor traffic under any form." One object of the movement is "to secure an amendment to the Constitution recognizing Christian laws as the fundamental law of the land."

Miss Clara Barton and her Colleagues of the Red Cross Society are laboring indefatigably among the destitute of the flooded districts. A telegram from Paducah, Ky., says: "The Red Cross relief steamer chartered last Friday at Evansville, Ind., by Miss Clara Barton, president of the National Association, arrived here at three P.M. It started with 135 cases of clothing and bedding and nearly two thousand bushels of coal. Agents of St. Louis, Chicago, and National Red Cross societies, also five ladies, one of them from New York State, constitute the party. The most needy and deserving have been sought out in every town. New York State has contributed generously of excellent clothing. The steamer goes to Cairo, then returns. It is thought that no further supplies will be needed on this route."

The Funeral of the Late Rev. John S. Inskip took place on Tuesday, March 11th, at the Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church, New York. A solemn feature of the service was the singing of the favorite hymn of the deceased minister, "The Sweet By and By," which he sang on his death-bed. Over a hundred of his fellow-clergymen were present, several of whom took part in the services. The Rev. Dr. A. McDonald, who had been intimately associated with Mr. Inskip in all his labors, paid a tribute to the earnestness and devotion of the dead man. The Rev. Dr. Pepper, of Philadelphia, also delivered a funeral address. He read a despatch from Bishop Simpson, expressing his sympathy and his regret at not being able to be present. The body was interred at Greenwood.

Mr. Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, is now laboring at Dillon, Beaverhead County, Montana. The Dillon Tribune says: "Ben Hogan is making a telling fight for temperance. The audiences for three evenings were large. Upward of one hundred and eighty persons signed the pledge, and among that number were fifty daily drinkers. The end is not yet. A Reform Club is to be organized, and already fifty names are down for membership."

Mrs. M. F. Shipman has Closed a Most Successful series of services at Scranton, Pa. The churches in which the meetings were held were crowded every night, and a large number made a profession of faith as the result of God's blessing on Mrs. Shipman's labors. Mrs. Shipman is now laid aside from the work by a severe attack of diphtheria. She asks an interest in the prayers of Christians that she may recover and be enabled to resume work for Christ.

The Temperance Crusade in New Jersey is extending rapidly. Montclair has followed Plainfield in the campaign. There is no diminution in the progress at Plainfield since Messrs. Maybee and English have removed, but the work is being carried on by the local leaders. The pledge roll now contains the names of three thousand signers, and the Reform Club organized by the evangelists has six hundred members, most of whom have been drinkers. One grog-shop keeper who had applied for a license has withdrawn his application. The red ribbon—the temperance emblem—is worn by nearly every one in town. The president of the Reform Club, one of the leading merchants, said recently that he believed the time would soon come when the man in Plainfield who had not signed the pledge would be looked upon as a curiosity. Negotiations are now in progress for the purchase of a building, and the club will soon have a permanent location. It will contain rooms for the use of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. At Montclair the largest hall in the place is crowded every night, and at every meeting numbers of converts are made.

A Home for Discharged Convicts is Being organized in San Francisco by Mr. Michael Dunn, whose Home for Discharged Convicts in Houston Street, New York City, has been so successful. Friends of the enterprise are preparing a house to accommodate lodgers, and a workshop, in which from twenty-five to thirty men can find employment. It is expected that the buildings will be ready for occupancy before the close of the present month.

A Misfortune not Entitled to Sympathy, happened to some litigants in Chicago recently. The lawyer they engaged to defend them in the courts appeared, when the trial was called, in a state of intoxication. He was not uproariously drunk nor "dead drunk," or some other lawyer would have taken charge of the case, but he was so bemuddled and stupefied that, though he could perform his duty after a fashion, he did it so clumsily that his clients lost their case. Such things have happened before, and deplorable results involving ruin to the litigants have ensued, for which the sufferers deserve our sympathy. But in this case the losers were all saloon keepers, who thus had an opportunity of realizing, under most favorable circumstances, the evils produced by the beverage they vend. This is not the first time men have fallen into the pit they dug for others (Prov. 26 : 27).

A Septuagenarian Converted at a Sunday-school service is an incident related by a missionary of the Sunday-school Union, who has been laboring in Kentucky. It illustrates the value of such efforts. He says: "From seven of our schools from which reports have been received of the results of protracted meetings held by me, fifty-nine conversions are claimed, all from the scholars, whose ages vary from ten to seventy years. One man of threescore years and ten who had not attended a church for twenty years on account of quarrels and disputes, came last summer 'to hear the Sunday-school man speak,' gave in his name when we organized the Sunday-school, and has never missed a session. This winter he confessed Christ by joining His Church, and says he owes his salvation to the Sunday-school. He is very intelligent, widely known and respected, and some of his sons are among the leading men of Kentucky."

A Passenger was Blown from a Train in New Jersey, a few days ago, during the prevalence of a blizzard. The train was going from Trenton to Newark, and while it was passing through an open section of country, the Secretary of State of New Jersey, who is a man of slight build, attempted to pass from the smoking-car to the parlor-car. As he stepped on the platform between the two cars, the wind, which was blowing a hurricane at the time, lifted his hat. He raised his hand to keep it on his head, and the next instant the wind lifted him, too, off his feet. It carried him clear of the train and sat him down on a bank of frozen snow a few feet from the track. The train was stopped, and when his friends reached him they found that he had sustained no dangerous injuries. His arms and legs were somewhat bruised, but he was able, with a little assistance, to make his way to the train again and continue his journey. His escape from death seemed almost miraculous. In the storms of political life the statesman's intellectual capacity enables him to hold his own, but in resistance to the elements, physical capacity is essential to success. A storm is coming in which neither physical nor intellectual power will avail, but only those will be safe who are strong in faith. Of all others it will be said: "The east wind carrieth him away: a storm hurleth him out of his place" (Job 27 : 21).

FIRST KING OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, AND AFTER THAT KING OF PEACE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"First being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is King of peace."—HEBREWS 7 : 2.

A Fit Type of Christ—Doubly Regal—Righteousness before Peace—I. Admire this King—A King Like God is—Obliterated Divisions in Society—A Sign of the World's Depravity—A Christlike King—No Peace without Purity—A King Desired by the Right-Hearted—A King God Desires His Children to be—No Compromise—II. Enjoy the King—Righteous in His Merit—Realize the Peace—The Elder Brothers.

WE will not enlarge upon the story of Melchisedec, nor discuss the question as to who he was. It is near enough for us to believe that he was one who worshipped God after the primitive fashion, a believer in God such as Job was in the land of Uz, one of the world's gray fathers who had kept faithful to the Most High God. He combined in his own person the kingship and the priesthood; a conjunction by no means unusual in the first ages. Of this man we know very little; and it is partly because we know so little of him that he is all the better type of our Lord, of whom we may inquire, "Who shall declare his generation?" The very mystery which hangs about Melchisedec serves to set forth the mystery of the person of our divine Lord. "Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; he abideth a priest continually. Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils."

Melchisedec seems to have been, first by name, and then by place of office,

DOUBLY DESIGNATED A KING.

First, his name is Melekzedek, which signifies by interpretation, "king of righteousness." His personal name is "king of righteousness." As a matter of fact, he was also the monarch of some town called Salem; it is not at all likely to have been Jerusalem, although that may have been the case. The interpretation of his official name is "king of peace." A teaching was intended by the Holy Spirit in the names; so the apostle instructs us in the passage before us.

"First, King of righteousness." How early that "first" is I cannot tell you. "In the beginning was the Word," but when that beginning was, who knows—for is He not, indeed, without beginning? First and firstborn, from everlasting Thou art God, O mighty Son of Jehovah! First King of righteousness, and then afterward when men fell, when rebellion, and strife, and war had sprung up—then He came to heal the mischief and become "King of peace." The one matter which I am going to set forth at this time is just this—"First King of righteousness, and after that also King of peace." Note well the order of these two, and the dependence of the one upon the other; for there could be no true peace that was not grounded upon righteousness; and out of righteousness peace is sure to spring up. Righteousness is essential to peace; if it were not first, peace could not be second. If there could be a kind of peace apart from righteousness, it would be dank, dark, deadly, a horrible peace, ending in a worse misery than war itself could inflict. It is needful where an unrighteous peace exists that it should be broken up, that a better peace should be established upon a true foundation which will last forever.

I shall ask you—and may the Spirit of God help us to do it—first, to admire the King, and, secondly, to enjoy Him—to enter with holy delight into the full meaning of His name and character as King of righteousness and King of peace.

I. First, I ask you to ADMIRE THIS KING.

This Melchisedec, whom we exhibit as a type, is such a king as God is. He is according to divine model. He is priest of the Most High

God, and he is like the Most High God, for the Lord Jehovah Himself is, first, King of righteousness, and after that also King of peace. The great Creator entered the garden of Eden in that sorrowful hour when our parents had rebelled, and were hiding among the trees to escape His call; and He bade them answer for their fault. When they stood trembling before Him in the nakedness of their conscious guilt, they knew Him as their King and their Judge. At that moment He was not first the King of peace to them, but first the King of righteousness. He pronounced sentence upon the serpent, upon the woman, and upon the man, gently making much of the punishment to fall aslant upon the ground; but yet vindicating justice before He spake a word of peace.

After that discourse, yea, in the midst of His sentences, He spake of peace when He mentioned the woman's seed that should bruise the serpent's head. In beginning to deal with an apostate race the Lord observed the fitting order of our text; He began with righteousness, and afterward went on to peace. At the gate of the garden commenced the dispensation of mercy and peace, but first of all there was the pronouncing of the sentence that man should eat bread in the sweat of his face, and that unto dust he should return. Substantial righteousness was dealt out to the guilty, and then peace was provided for the troubled. At the fall God first set up a Judgment-seat, and right speedily a Mercy-seat. Righteousness must ever lead the van.

Well, the times went on, and men began to sin with a high hand. There were giants in those days, and the people of God were mixed up with the men of the world. This is of the world's depravity when there ceases to be a division between the people of God and the sons of men. There was an unholy alliance between sin and righteousness; and then the King came forth again, and displayed His countenance, and began to judge, and correct, and call to repentance. Men perceived that the countenance of God toward them was the face of one who is first King of righteousness. Noah's teaching taught men to return unto the Lord, or He would surely deal with them in righteousness, and make a full end. Space most ample was given for repentance, but men were mad upon their follies. He is first King of righteousness, and afterward King of peace; and so He dealt with that guilty world. He pulled up the sluices of the great deep which lieth under; He let loose all the cataracts of heaven from above, and He swept men from off the face of the earth. Then afterward He hung the rainbow in the sky, and He smelled a sweet savor of rest; and there was peace once more between God and a race that had to begin again with father Noah instead of father Adam. Righteousness ruled first, and washed out with a flood the traces of ungodliness, and then peace set up her gentle reign upon a new world.

All along, in the history of God's dealings with men, He kept to this unvarying rule. God has never forsaken righteousness, not even for the sake of love. All over the world, and everywhere, this is God's way of dealing with men. Do not imagine that God will ever lay aside His righteousness for the sake of saving a sinner—that He will ever deal with men unrighteously in order that they may escape the penalty due to their transgression. He has never done so, and He never will. Glorious in holiness is He forever and ever.

And now, next, the type is especially meant to teach us that he was for when the Lord Jesus Christ came into the world, He came with this everlasting and unchangeable rule girt about Him—that, though He should be a King, yet He would be first King of righteousness, and after that also King of peace. Why did He not set up a kingdom here below among the Jews? Many spirits would have welcomed Him. If He had only set Himself up to be a king, promising them sure conquest and abundant plunder, the zealots of the Jewish nation would have fought like tigers at His side. But, no; He came first to be a King of righteousness, and that was a topic for which they cared nothing.

They wanted an unrighteous kingdom, but He would not have it. His fan was in His hand, and He would thoroughly purge His floor. His laws were not to be like those of Cæsar; His soldiers were not to fight with carnal weapons. He came not to set up a kingdom of power and force, but a kingdom of love and truth and righteousness; and hence His own people knew Him not, and rendered Him no homage. His holiness stood in the way of such a kingdom as the Jews desired, and hence they turned upon Him and cried, "Let Him be crucified." Though they would not acknowledge His sovereignty, He was their King; and at His death He bore above His head the superscription, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." He would not set up a carnal kingdom of their sort; Church and State, truth and force united in some form or other, must have been suggested to Him; but no; He must be first King of righteousness, and then King of peace. He preached

NO PEACE APART FROM PURITY.

He never made little of vice or error; He was the deadly foe of all evil. He said, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." Until there is righteousness there must be conflict, and peace can only enter when righteousness has won the field.

But ah, methinks He was most King of righteousness when He said unto Himself, "My Father's law has been broken: I will restore its honor. Men have defied it and trampled on it: I will pay to it the highest homage." With this strong desire upon Him He went up to the cross, and gave His hands and feet to the nails, and His side to the spear, and with a thorn crown upon His dying brow He became in very deed the King of righteousness. He knew that He could not be King of peace to us till, first of all, He had woven a perfect righteousness in the loom of His life, and dyed it in His own heart's blood in His death; but when He had achieved this, then He became King of righteousness, demonstrated to be so before the eyes of all, and then to you and to me He became henceforth the King of peace. How glorious is His name! Oh, for a voice of thunder with which to praise Him!

THE COMING KINGDOM.

To-day our Lord and Master has gone His way up to the eternal hills where He reigns; but His kingdom, for which we daily pray, is coming; and, mark you, it will come by righteousness. I say no word against those who endeavor to bring peace to the nations by the extension of commerce, facilities for travel, and so forth; but it is not thus that the sword of war shall be broken. Would God the sword of the Lord were quiet in its scabbard forever; but I never anticipate the reign of universal peace on earth till first the King of righteousness is acknowledged in every place. I do not think that we shall ever see the fruits without the tree, or the stream without the source, or peace without the enthronement of the principle of righteousness from which it springs. There shall come a day when the lion shall eat straw like the ox, and the wolf shall lie down with the lamb—when they shall hang the useless helmet in the hall, and study war no more; but that reign of the joyous King, that era of plenty, love, and joy, can only commence as a reign of righteousness. It cannot be anything else; and until sin is dethroned, till iniquity is banished, we shall not see the divine fruit of peace upon the face of the earth. Wherever Jesus is King He must be first King of righteousness, and after that King of peace.

Note, next, that He is such a king as right-hearted minds desire. I say "right-hearted minds." I mean not only those who are saved, but those in whom there is some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel. There is an honest and good ground not yet sown, and we know what that soil waiteth for. I remember what my thoughts used to be when I was seeking the Lord; I longed to be saved; I desired to escape from my sin; but with it there always went this thought—"God must be just." I had ever a certain trembling sense of guilt, but at the same time a deep reverence for righteousness. In my heart of hearts I said, "Let not the Lord even for my sake do an unrighteous thing. I am nothing; but God and His righteousness are all in all. I did not know at that time of substitution; but when I did know it, no music ever sounded so sweetly in the human ear as that sounded in my heart. When I saw that, by the interposition of the Son of God, and His bearing my guilt, God could be sternly, strictly, severely just, to the letter, in every jot and tittle, and yet could put all my sin away, and take me to His bosom, and let me be His child, then I said, "This must be of God.

This divine secret bears upon its own face its own warranty of truthfulness, for no man could have invented a system at once so just to God, so safe to man. To be able to look for mercy as just, and receive pardon on the ground of righteousness, is certainly a high ground to reach; and yet every believer stands there before God. I say that every right-minded man feels a deep concern for the righteousness of God, when he is soberly in his senses, and thinking the matter over. He longs to be saved, that is no more than natural; but he does not wish to be saved in a way that would derogate from the supreme splendor of the righteousness of God. Let the Lord God be glorious in justice, and then, if I can be saved, well and good. Blessed be God, we can be thus saved.

And I am sure, again, that no right-hearted man wants Christ to come and be to him the King of peace, and then to let him live in sin. Brothers, I want no peace in my heart concerning any fault. If I know myself before God, my heart's inmost prayer is that I may never be able to rest till I am rid of every relic of evil. I do not want to make myself happy and yet to live in a single known sin. If I could have the offer of heaven, and be a drunkard, I wish not for a drunkard's heaven. What could it be but a scene of riot, strife, and obscenity? If I could have heaven and be a liar, I want not a liar's heaven. What could the heaven of falsehood be but hell in truth? Nay, there can be no heaven for me till evil in every form is expelled from my nature. My God, my longing is not for happiness first, but for purity first, and happiness afterward; and hence it is my delight to read that my King is first the King of righteousness, and then the King of peace.

Again, this wonderful Melchisedec is such a king as Jesus must be to every one of you who have not yet known Him, if you are ever to receive Him as your Saviour. Let me not sew pillows to all arm-holes by preaching salvation to those who do not repent of their evil ways. I do not come here to chant in dulcet tones sweet lullabies to men who sleep in unrighteousness. If you would have peace with God, you must repent of sin. If you love evil you cannot love God.

THERE MUST BE A DIVORCE

between you and sin, or there can be no marriage between you and Christ. When Jesus comes to a soul, He comes as King of righteousness first, and after that as King of peace. We must have a positive righteousness of life, a cleanness of heart and hand, or we shall not be found at the right hand of the Judge. Let no man deceive himself. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." He that comes to Christ, and takes Christ to be his Saviour, must take Christ also to be his Ruler.

I know that I speak to many who long to be saved; but will you give up your sin? for Christ has come to save His people from their sins. If you do not wish to be saved from sinning, you will never be saved from damning.

Do you hug your Delilah? Then shall you lose your eyes like Samson. Do you hold to the viper, and press the asp to your bosom? Then shall the poison boil within your veins. Christ cannot save you while sin is loved and followed after, and has a reigning power in you; for it is an essential of His salvation that He should deliver you from the mastery of evil. I would to God that many here would cry, "That is the very thing I want. I long for it. Can I be helped to renounce sin?" O poor heart, if thou hungerest after righteousness, thou shalt be filled! Thou shalt be helped to conquer evil; thou art being helped by the very desire which has been breathed into thee.

I have closed this first head when I have noticed that that is the kind of king that God would have every one of us to be. We ought all to be, first, kings of righteousness, and then kings of peace. The Lord has appointed each man his kingdom; let us see to it that we reign for good and not for evil. On all sides we hear voices inviting us to peace apart from righteousness. "Oh," they say to us, "a confederacy, a confederacy." What mean you? You are to preach a lie, and we are to preach the truth, and yet we are to call each other brothers. We are no brothers, and we will not by our silence aid the fraud. "Oh, but," say they, "be charitable." Charitable with what? Charitable with God's truth, flinging it down into the mire of error? Charitable by deceiving our fellowmen? That we cannot be. "Hold your tongue," says the world. "Do not fight against error. Why need you speak so loudly against a wrong thing?" We must speak, and speak sharply too, for souls are in danger. We must uplift the banner of truth, or we shall be meanest of all cowards. God has made us kings, and we must be first kings of righteousness, and after that kings of peace.

God's people are tempted sometimes to be a little too peaceable. Remember that our Lord Jesus has not come to make us live at peace with sin. He has come to set a man against his brother—to divide a household where iniquity holds sway. There can be no peace between the child of God and wrong doing or wrong thinking of any kind.

II. Now my time has fled, but I must occupy a little upon the best part of my subject. I have asked you to admire the King. I now beg you to ENJOY THE KING.

Our Lord Jesus Christ is first King of righteousness. You know what it means. Shall I tell you what it includes? All who are in Him, and one with Him in His kingdom, are righteous in His righteousness. His is a righteous kingdom, and those who obey it will be found to have done rightly. If we follow Christ's rule we need never be afraid that it will mislead us. We are righteous, certainly, when we are doing His bidding. If any cavil and say, "Why doest thou this?" quote the King's authority. Do not thou be afraid if thou doest the King's bidding.

He is a King of righteousness, and thou art righteous in obeying His righteous ordinances. He who religiously obeys Mahomet may yet be doing grievous moral wrong; but it is never so with the disciple of Jesus; obedience to Jesus is holiness.

Notice, next, that if we trust this King of righteousness we are righteous in His merit. I want you to believe this. If you had always kept God's law and had never sinned, you would have been conscious of righteousness. Now, by faith, as many of you as believe in the Lord Jesus Christ are as righteous as He is righteous in the sight of God—as righteous as if you had never sinned. Oh, I want you to feel this. "Being justified by faith we have peace with God;" but there must first be this justifying righteousness before there can be peace. What Christ did He did for His people. I say not that what Christ did is imputed to His people, though I believe that it is so; but it belongs to His people, for they are part and parcel of Him, and so are partakers with Him.

Now, then, dost thou believe in Christ? Then thou hast no sin. Thy sin was laid upon Christ of old, and He bore the punishment of it, and thou canst not be punished for it. Divine righteousness cannot exact a double penalty for the same offence. Dost thou believe in Jesus? Then He hath made an end of all the sin which was once written against thee. He has buried thy transgressions forever in His own sepulchre. If thou art in Christ, His perfect righteousness is wrapped about thy loins, and thou standest this day "accepted in the Beloved." Oh, it is a glorious standing, Jesus the King of righteousness, and we in our King made righteous. We are comely through the comeliness of Christ which is put upon us.

And then, next, He is after that

KING OF PEACE.

I want you to try to-night—nay, I do not want you to try, I want the Holy Spirit to do it for you—I want you to enjoy the King of Salem, the King of peace. Do you know that at this moment, if you are a believer, you have peace with God through Jesus Christ our Lord? There is no quarrel between you and God to-night. You are one with Him, your delight is in Him. I know not now in my own soul of aught that I could say against the Lord's dealings with me throughout the whole of my life; nor, let Him deal with me as He wills, do I feel any repugnance to putting myself entirely into His hands. For weal or woe, for wealth or poverty, for life or death, I am content to hand myself over to the Lord absolutely.

"Why," says one, "I have not been a believer more than a week." I do not care if you have not been a believer more than ten minutes; he that believeth hath everlasting life and everlasting love. As soon as the prodigal son was home, what did his father do? Upbraid him? No, he kissed him. Had his father no fault to find? No, not any. He said, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him. Put a ring on his hand and shoes on his feet. Let us eat and be merry." Why did he not say, "Come, my dear son, I must have a little sharp talk with you, for your good. You know you have behaved very badly to me. I must chide with you and upbraid you?" No, no. Not a word of the sort. Not a syllable or even a look after that fashion. He giveth liberally, and upbraideth not. He puts his dear child at perfect ease with himself, and says, "Be at home. Be happy. Eat, drink, and be merry with me; for you are my child, and though you were lost, you are found. You were dead, but you are alive again. Let us rejoice together in this blessed salvation which glorifies my Son."

I want you to sit in those pews—you that really believe in Jesus, and receive this bread and wine in perfect contentment, saying within yourselves, "It is well. It is all well. It is well from beginning to end—from top to bottom. Being justified by faith, I have peace with God. The peace of God that passeth all understanding doth keep my heart and soul by Jesus Christ." Come. If you have never enjoyed it before, enjoy it to-night, and do not be afraid. You cannot drink too much of this heavenly nectar. Oh, that you would but have grace to take in all that you may have! I know what you will do. You will come to-night into my Lord's treasury, and He will say, "Take what you will." There will be mints of gold and silver before you, and you will look all round and take up some brass farthing or other and say, "Bless the Lord for this!" Such gratitude is right enough. Bless the Lord for anything. At the same time, why not take something better? "Oh, I have been a mourner," you say, "all my days." Whose fault is that? "Oh, but I have never had any great light or any great joy." Whose fault is that? Is it not your own? The Lord seems to me to say to-night even to here, "Rejoice and be glad." I do not think that many grumblers come to the Tabernacle, but there are certain grumpy elder brothers that are apt to say, "Neither at any time transgressed I thy commandments, and yet thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends. I never have any joy. I am a regular seat-holder and a member. I go to the communion; I do all I can; but I never get any of these holy raptures and spiritual delights. These reformed thieves and converted rascals when they are converted seem to monopolize all the music and the dancing. I never have a dance to myself at all."

But the father was in such a blessed humor that night that he did not even upbraid the elder brother; but he said, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. If you have had no kid wherewith to make a supper for your friends, why did you not take it? All that I have is thine." Come in, dear elder brother, as well as you younger ones, and let us eat and drink and be merry this night in the name of Him who, having been the King of righteousness upon the bloody tree, is now to-night the King of peace upon His glorious throne; who upon this table shows you how He wrought out perfect righteousness, breaking His body and pouring out His blood for you, and now bids you come and see how all this is wrought for your peace, for His flesh and blood are now your bread and wine to make you glad. Wherefore, rejoice in the Lord! and again I say, Rejoice! Amen.

A MISSIONARY'S ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

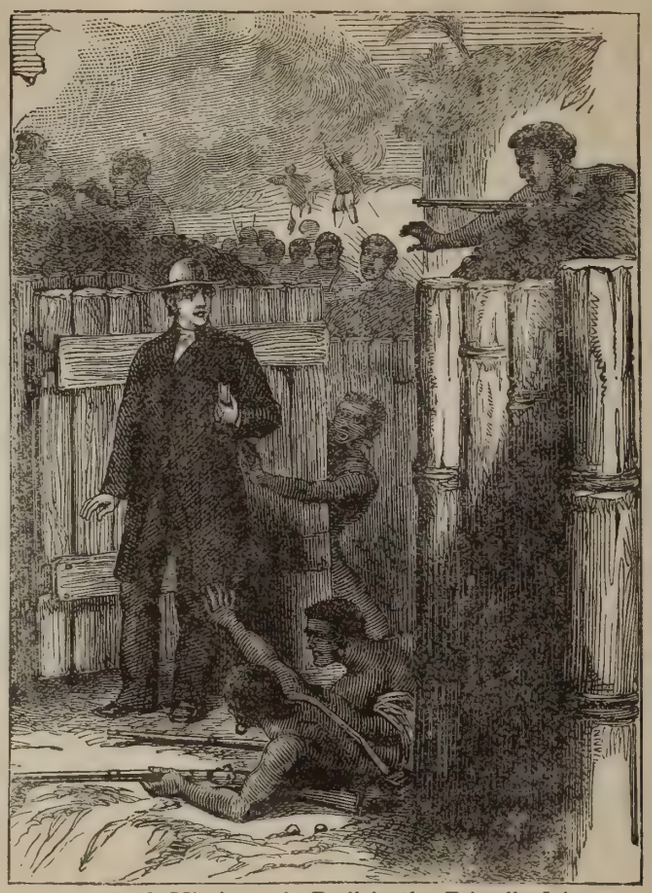
DURING the Dutch subjugation of the native chiefs in 1852, of Tongataboo, the largest of the Friendly Islands, the Rev. Mr. Amos, a missionary, was the subject of a singular deliverance from death. The arena of the warlike proceedings lay about four miles distant from the mission-house occupied by Mr. Amos. Shouts, and cries, and rattling of musketry, both by day and by night, were anything but melody to the ears of the missionary and his family. Mr. Amos, however, incurred a greater share in the dangers of the fray while pursuing his spiritual duties. He visited the scene of conflict continually, comforting the sick and wounded, and exhorting those who were in health to prepare for death. Four forts were erected to overthrow a hostile fortress, and to these Mr. Amos went daily to converse with the soldiers, and to preach the Gospel inside the stockades. The following is from a letter sent by Mr. Amos describing the occurrence. He says:

"These stockades were made by cutting the trunks of cocoa-nut trees in lengths, and planting them upright in the ground. Outside this barricade a deep trench was dug, and the earth was used to embank the fort. Beyond was hollow ground, in which the rebel forces were stationed, and their rifle-pits were within musket range of the forts. I preached at the camp within musket-shot of the rifle-pits, but screened by the embankment. The bullets rattled against the trees around during the service. My pulpit was the stump of a cocoa-nut tree. In the afternoon I preached at the Vavau Fort. Just before the service I incautiously went to the front gate, and stood near the trench, forgetting that I was a mark for the enemy. Immediately I was shot at, and the musket-balls whizzed about. The warriors around me lay flat on their faces, but I, unused to such scenes, remained standing, unconscious of my danger. I afterward felt under very special obligations to God for this preservation of my life."

This escape of Mr. Amos from a violent death was indeed most remarkable and merciful. When the rifle of the European is placed in the hand of the native of Australia and her islands, his keenness of sight and wonderful dexterity of hand soon make him terribly proficient in its use. He becomes an excellent marksman, and, realizing the superior forces of his newly-acquired weapon, soon becomes familiar with it. It was, therefore, not without good reason that Mr. Amos attributed his escape from death to God's special care.

A Rider's Life Saved by his Horse.



A Missionary's Peril in the Friendly Isles.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Wedding Party in a Tree-Top was the strange spectacle witnessed in Indiana during the recent floods. Two well-known persons were married one afternoon last month at Yelvington, Ky., and after the ceremony they started with two horses and a buggy for Rockport, Ind. While they were crossing the river on a hand ferry-boat the wind and water came upon them. They were then about three quarters of a mile from dry land on the Kentucky side and a mile and a half from Rockport. Knowing that their boat could not ride such waves as the storm was making, they cast their anchor, and happily it took hold close to a half-submerged tree. The waves were coming so high that they saw that their boat would sink, so they climbed into the tree. No sooner had they done so than the boat sank, and the horses were drowned. Night came on, and the wind continued howling and the sleet and snow falling, and the newly-married pair were drenched to the skin and almost frozen to death. Fortunately for them persons in the city knew they must be in peril, and a party went in a large skiff early in the morning in search of them, and they were rescued. It was a strange place in which to pass the first hours of married life. We may hope that their experience may suggest to them the truth that in the storms of life, which the happiest couples do not wholly escape, there is a safe refuge provided where they have only to be still and wait with patience for deliverance (Isa. 25 : 4).

The Peculiar Disturbance of a Ship's Compass caused much curiosity during a recent voyage. Captain W. R. Smith, who commands the steamer Delaware, observed, on going on board his ship during his last trip from New York to New London, that the compass became strangely affected when he approached it. Whether he stood on the right or the left, or immediately in front of the compass, the needle would invariably point to him. The compass was worse than useless when he came near it. It was dangerous and might wreck the ship. The thing was incomprehensible for some time, until the captain, finding that his watch was out of order, took it off and left it in his cabin. After that the compass paid no attention to him when he approached it. The secret attraction was evidently in the watch, not in the captain himself. Then the captain recollected that before putting to sea he had accepted an invitation to inspect an electric light dynamo-machine, and had spent an hour in examining all its parts closely. The machine had magnetized his watch, and that, in turn, had affected the ship's compass. Those who read infidel books and who go into vicious haunts, impelled by a curiosity "to see life," do not know how seriously the subtle influences to which they expose themselves may affect the compass of their lives. The Psalmist's benediction suggests the safe rule in such matters (Psalm 1 : 1).

LIZZIE APPLETON'S COUNSEL.

(See Illustration.)

"It is a beautiful evening, mamma, and it will be bright moonlight; may I not walk down to the station to meet papa? He is always so pleased to have some one to walk home with him."

"There is no need for you to go, Lizzie," said Mrs. Appleton. "You had better send one of the boys."

"I will wrap up well and be very careful," said Lizzie. "I should so much like to go."

The mother saw the daughter's desire, and being one of those mothers who do not unnecessarily thwart their children's inclinations, she consented; and Lizzie, wrapping herself up warmly according to promise, walked away through the village to the little country station. She was a tall girl of eighteen, bright and cheerful, well educated and gentle, and an unobtrusive, modest, but very sincere Christian. Her desire to go to the station that night was not solely, though it was chiefly, on her father's account. She wanted to meet some one else who she knew would be at the station that night to meet an outgoing train. That was her cousin Claude, who had been her friend from childhood. He was married now and living in a city about thirty miles from Churchville. But he was always running down to his old home for a day's shooting or any business or sport that might serve as an excuse for a holiday among his old friends. Claude, Lizzie felt sure, was going wrong, and it was the desire to use her influence for his good which prompted her to seek an interview with him that evening.

"Ah! Lizzie, is that you?" said the well-known manly voice as she passed through the ticket office on to the platform. "Where are you travelling to to-night?"

"Nowhere, Claude; this is the extent of my journey. When papa comes by the next train I shall walk home, so you see my excursion is a very short one."

"It will be half an hour before the train is in," said Claude. "There has been a block, and all the trains have been delayed. I wish I had known of it; I might have waited in a place a great deal more lively than this wretched station."

"That is not complimentary, Claude. Should you not congratulate yourself on having gained an opportunity for a friendly chat with me?"

"You are too old a friend, Lizzie, to care for compliments, and I cannot pretend to be very delighted at a prolonged talk with you. I have a presentiment that I shall have to undergo a scolding, and I have had a horror of that from my boyhood."

"Why do you think I would scold you, Claude? That is the last thing I should think of doing. I am afraid your conscience tells you you deserve a scolding or you would not suspect me of the intention. Now confess, and instead of reproving you let me help you, if I can, to get right. Years ago, you know, you used to come to me for advice."

"I expect my conscience has something to do with it, Lizzie. This matter, however, is beyond your power to set right. But if you care to hear about it, I will tell you. You always sympathized with me in my troubles, and it will be a relief to talk to you."

The two had been walking up and down the platform during this conversation; but now Claude lowered a little luggage-truck which was reared against the wall and made a seat for Lizzie, while he, leaning on its back, bent over and told his story.

"I scarcely know where to begin," he said.

"Let me help you by a question," said Lizzie. "Why do you come down here once or twice a week, alone, and stay idling your time away, instead of working at your profession? Or, if you have time for a holiday, why do you not bring Louie down with you?"

"Yes, that question opens the case very neatly; but, as a lawyer, I should regard it as somewhat of an indictment. Now, I am expected to plead. Is not that so?"

"That is so."

"Then I plead guilty with extenuating circumstances. I will state my case. I think it is the meanest thing a man can do to say anything against his wife to a third person; so you must understand that in what I am about to say I am regarding you in the light of a social physician, and am merely explaining the symptoms of a malady with the hope of gaining a prescription or suggestion that may tend to alleviate the pain. I know there is no fear of making you unfriendly to Louie; you love her too well; and as for myself, I hope you will take as favorable a view of my conduct as you can."

"I understand, Claude; now let me know frankly and briefly, as time is flying."

Lizzie Appleton's Counsel.

"There is an estrangement, then, between Louie and myself. When we were married, two years ago, we were very happy. During the first three months I left the office early every day and went home to take her out for a walk or a drive or to spend the evening together in some other way agreeable to herself. But that necessarily came to an end. My partner had a serious illness, and I had to work for both. My day was lengthened at both ends. Often, when I closed the office, work remained to be done that kept me there until nine or ten o'clock. I was very sorry, for I knew Louie was at home alone waiting for me. But I expected she would understand it. But she did not. She resented it. She complained that I was losing my affection for her; that I could not have business to keep me so late; that I might get through earlier if I would; that she ought not to be kept in the background for other people; that I ought to get another partner with better health, etc. That seemed to me very unreasonable, and so—and so—"

"And so I suppose you spoke sharply to her and told her she must not interfere with your business arrangements," said Lizzie.

"Yes, that was about it. And one sharp word led to another, and that brought retorts, and both of us said more than we meant to say or than we really felt. Anyhow, the quarrelling was inaugurated, and it became only too common. Then we had trouble with the hired girls and trouble with the house we had taken, and every night when I went home she had a string of complaints and a whole catalogue of petty annoyances of her own to pour into my ears. I was having rather a bad time then, too, at the office. One or two cases went wrong, principally because I had done my work hastily through having more to do than I could do well, and so I was worried and left the office every night in a nervous, irritable condition. As I went home I looked forward to my reception there with foreboding. I had my load of trouble on my shoulders. I knew I should be upbraided for being late, and after that should hear Louie's repining and complaining over her infinitesimal worries. Then, I own, I did wrong. With that prospect before me I did not go home, but went somewhere else—to a friend's house or to some place of amusement until I could forget my worries."

"That would make things worse," Lizzie interjected.

"It did so, and things have been growing worse ever since. When my partner recovered I had lost my desire for quiet home evenings. The place was associated with unseemly bickering, and I used words in my irritation I never thought I could have used, and, in short, I drifted off into a condition of which I am heartily ashamed. I am neglecting my profession, neglecting my home, and caring for nothing but amusement."

"'That is your case,' as you would say in court," said Lizzie. "Well, it is a bad case, and I am sorry for you. You need not apprehend scolding. But it must be changed, Claude. Or, rather, you must change. You can see, as I do, that you are on the high road to matrimonial disaster. There is no time to spare for details now, so I must go to what I consider is the root of the matter. You would regret serious trouble with Louie, and you love her still?"

"Yes to both questions, most decidedly."

"Then let me ask you whether you have not omitted from your narrative one point. Have you, as a Christian man, continued your communion with God?"

"No, Lizzie, I acknowledge I have not. When I have been irritated and vexed I have frequently omitted prayer altogether. I have been so ashamed, too, of my violent language that I could not pray."

"I expected that. Now, let me earnestly beg of you to get back to that for the first step. I most sincerely desire your happiness as well as Louie's, and I am sure that is the foundation. Not only private prayer, but family prayer. I know that after prayer you will be more ready to fulfil the injunction, 'Bear ye one another's burdens,' and to bear patiently being misunderstood occasionally. I should not be surprised if Louie has drifted away from prayer, too. Your example cannot fail to influence her. Get back to Christ, Claude. Depend upon it, that is the true remedy for all this misery. Will you try that?"

"I will, Lizzie. I believe you are right. It will be a struggle, but I will try."

"And you will succeed, Claude. It will be easier than you expect. If you had carried your trouble to Christ in the first place you would not have drifted into the trouble."

The two shook hands cordially as the train entered the station, and Lizzie went to meet her father, while Claude took his seat thoughtfully in the car. A letter went the next day to Louie privately from her Christian friend, full of counsel similar to that administered to her husband, and a breach that might eventually have been aired in the divorce court was healed by the only remedy that for all difficulties and troubles is equally efficacious. A trial once sincerely and faithfully carried to the throne of grace is already near to its vanishing point.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Nearing the Rapids.

ONE Sunday evening in the depth of winter a keen, bitter wind was whistling around the house, and moaning under the gables, and a thick carpet of snow scarcely trodden, lay in the narrow street. John Morley was gone to chapel without his wife, who had been slightly ailing all the week; and Hester had stayed at home to be her companion. The drawing-room, where she was sitting with Hester, was well lit up; and a passer-by, if there were any, could not fail to notice the brightness of the light within. Apparently some one had seen the light, for there was a knock, twice repeated, at the house door.

Hester lighted a candle, and went down-stairs alone, for she had promised her father faithfully not to let Rose be exposed to any cold air during his absence.

"Is your father at home, dear little Hetty?" inquired Robert Waldron.

"Oh, no!" answered Hester, still holding the door in her hand, and keeping the untimely visitor on the outside; "he went to chapel nearly half an hour ago, and he will not come home till late, because there is some meeting after the sermon. Do you want to see him very much, Mr. Robert?"

"Not particularly," he said; "only Miss Waldron, who is not able to come up to chapel to-night, told me to inquire how your mother is. Is she at home, my dear Hetty?"

"Yes," replied Hester; "did you not hear her playing before you knocked?"

"I suppose she is too poorly for me to come in and see her?" he said.

"Oh, no!" she said gayly; "she is not so very poorly, and she will be very glad to see you, and so shall I. Please to follow me up-stairs."

She tripped up lightly before him, holding the candle high above her head, and looking back now and then with a half-childish, half-womanly smile. He was in Rose's drawing-room, speaking to her, while Hester held both his hands to prevent his touching her, before he had well collected his thoughts. He sank into the seat Hester placed for him near the fire, feeling himself in a kind of dream, in which his mind or conscience dare not stir, for fear of dispelling the fleeting vision. He was afraid to think; but from time to time he glanced, almost timidly, at the sweet pallor of Rose's face, and the clear but gentle lustre of her eyes. How much more lovely she was than when he had known her three years ago!

They had not much to say to one another; but Rose sighed at times, and then his eyes were raised to her face with an air of perplexity and sadness. He took Hester upon his knee, and read to her that charmng child's book, "The Story without an End." Though he read well, he was not conscious of a word beyond the title; but he knew that Rose was listening; and Hester's arm round his neck, and her soft cheek upon his shoulder, made him feel weaker than a reed, with some subtle and clinging influence winding about him he knew not how. The sound of his own voice was the only sound that could be heard; for if there were any footsteps in the streets on a Sunday night at this hour of divine service, they fell noiselessly upon the snow. Suddenly, upon the utter quiet, there came the sharp and noisy bang of a door falling to in some part of the house; and Robert started nervously from his chair, and looked about him as if for some means of escape, or place of concealment.

"Why, it is only a door slamming somewhere," said Hester, with a little laugh of amusement; "I must go and shut it, or else it will be frightening you again."

"Shall I come with you?" asked Robert.

"No, thank you," answered the child, assuming a fine tone of superiority, "I am not frightened. What is there to be afraid of? Besides, I must go and see that the kitchen fire is not gone out, and you must not go there with me."

She lighted a candle, and went out into the dark passage, screening the scarcely lit flame with her hand. Down-stairs ran her small, nimble feet; and then Hester almost uttered a shrill scream of terror. In the middle of the lobby stood a bent and spare figure, more sprinkled with snow than Robert had been, and with a faint halo of light shining about it from a little lamp, which was on the point of dying out. In another moment she had recognized Lawson, her father's faithful workman, whose sunken eyes were glancing restlessly around him, as he drew off his heavy boots, and set them cautiously on one side.

"Is that you, Lawson?" asked Hester, her heart still beating fast with fear.

"Yes, it's me," he answered; "I'm uneasy to-night, and I came down to see that all was safe. Let us look in here first."

Upon the other side of the lobby was a door into Mr. Morley's own room; and he stole noiselessly across the quarried floor, and opened it without a sound. There was the light only of a low fire, of embers glowing without flame, and everything looked dim and indistinct by it. He looked around the room eagerly and keenly, and then turned to Hester, who had followed him closely.

"Miss Hester," he whispered, in thick and hurried tones, "I thought I should find your mother here."

"She is up-stairs in the drawing-room," she answered; "only Mr. Robert is there, too."

"No, not her! not her!" he said impatiently; "I mean your own mother. Don't you know, deary, I've never set eyes on her since John Morley brought a strange woman into the house—never? Though my work all goes wrong, and my hand has lost its cunning, she never comes back to show me what to do. But to-night, while I was at chapel, it came all at once into my mind that I should find her sitting here alone in the house, crying and sobbing, with her face hidden in her hands. I fancied she'd be there in her own old place; but maybe she is up-stairs in my work-room."

"But didn't you know she was ill?" asked Hester, not venturing to call Rose "mother" in Lawson's hearing.

"No. Ill, is she?" he said eagerly; "perhaps she'll die. Your mother died easily, Miss Hester. But I'm going up-stairs. Will you come with me, little one?"

He called her "little one" in a tone of such strange and pathetic tenderness that Hester put her hand in his, though she was trembling with an undefined fear. They went out together into the snowy court first, to look up to the lattice window in the high gable. The snow hung about it with a ghostly gleam, and the moon shining wanly upon its diamond panes made them glimmer as if with some feeble, unearthly light within.

Lawson lifted Hester in his arms and mounted the outer staircase, which led to the old printing-office. Passing through this they came to the foot of the attic steps, winding up into the pale darkness above. Still carrying her in his arms, Lawson ascended them swiftly but soundlessly, as if fearful of scaring away some timid and easily startled presence. The room was full of light from the moon, which shone directly upon the casement—a visionary light, in which the most familiar objects assume an unreal aspect. There stood his press, and his tools growing red with rust; and there the shelves of books, whose gilded bindings shone palely in the gloom. But the room was empty. There was no shadowy figure, sitting alone, with its tearful face hidden in the hands. Hester looked around with mingled dread and love of this unknown mother, so often felt to be present by the man whose heart she could feel beating strongly with anticipation. But neither of them could detect the form they sought in the dimness; and Lawson put down Hester and walked to and fro in the attic, with gestures of lamentation and despair.

"If she would only come again!" he cried, wringing his hands; "if she would but bring me back the cunning of my right hand! But I have lost it, and nobody can restore it to me, save her. Oh, come back! For the sake of your little child, come back!"

A fantastic paroxysm took possession of the usually silent and reticent man. He fell upon his knees, and prayed with groans and cries and strong wrestlings of the body, as if he could prevail by those. He called aloud upon the shadow to return and to take form again before his eyes. He bemoaned the loss of his art, as if it had gone from him forever, while Hester stood at his side, terrified yet brave, willing to welcome this vision, if his prayers should be heard and granted. But no answer came. The pale light fell steadily into the room, but it revealed no apparition. Lawson's voice grew faint, and his sobs feeble; but no spectral messenger came to assuage his passion; and at last, worn out and exhausted he clasped Hester's hand again in his own nerveless fingers, and descended the stairs in silence.

Upon the second floor there was a door of communication between the work-room and the rest of the house, and through this Lawson and Hester passed. A thin line of light from beneath the drawing-room door shone across the farthest end of the passage, and caught Lawson's eye.

"Miss Hester," he whispered, "just let me look into the other room, where the light is—the grand new room, you know."

"She is there," answered Hester, with a shrewd look upon her white face.

"Ah! but your mother may be there as well, who knows?" persisted Lawson; "you open the door quietly, and I'll peep in over your shoulder. I saw her as plain as could be only an hour ago."
